A remark of the prosecuting attorney in arguing to the jury, the effect of which, standing alone and segregated from its context, was to incorrectly state the law, was not ground for reversal, where the jury was properly instructed by the court, and the court certified that accused was not prejudiced by the language used.

9. EMBEZZLEMENT — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution of a justice, under Code 1904, § 3717, for embezzling money collected by him as a fine, evidence held sufficient to authorize a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 8127.]

Error to Circuit Court, Warwick County.

Charles H. Robinson was convicted of embezzlement of public funds, and brings error. Affirmed.

C. C. Berkeley and F. S. Collier, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, Wm. A. Anderson, and Ashby & Read, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. An indictment was found in the circuit court of Warwick county against Charles H. Robinson, which charges that he, being a justice of the peace of Newport magisterial district, in said county, by virtue of his office aforesaid, had the custody of a certain sum of money, public funds of the state of Virginia, to wit, the sum of $5, which he was required by law to pay to the clerk of the circuit court of the county aforesaid, and which he "feloniously and knowingly did misuse and misappropriate, * * * and did then and there feloniously and knowingly dispose of the said money and public funds otherwise than by paying the same to the clerk of the circuit court of Warwick county, Virginia, in accordance with law, and so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Charles H. Robinson then and there in manner and form aforesaid feloniously and knowingly did steal, take, embezzle, and carry away, the said money and public funds aforesaid, to wit, the sum of five dollars, currency of the United States, of the value of five dollars, the money and public funds of the state of Virginia. Against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Virginia."

There was a motion to quash and a demurrer interposed to this indictment. We deem it necessary to consider only the demurrer.

The plaintiff in error contends that the indictment is based upon section 723 of the Code of 1904, which provides:

"If any fine is received by the justice imposing it, he shall pay the same, with the cost, within thirty days thereafter, to the clerk of the circuit court of his county or corporation court of his city. For failure to make such payment within said time, without good cause, he shall forfeit twenty dollars, which, together with the money so received, may be recovered by motion."

This statute fixes the duty of the justice. When he imposes and collects the fine, he must, by its terms, pay the same, together with the costs, within 30 days to the clerk of the court of his county or corporation; and for failure to make such payment he forfeits $20, which may be recovered from him by motion, together with the money so received. But that is not the offense with which plaintiff in error was charged. He was prosecuted under section 3717, which is as follows:

"If any officer, agent, or employé of the state or of the city, town or county or the deputy of any such officer having custody of public funds knowingly misuse or misappropriate the same or knowingly dispose thereof otherwise than in accordance with law, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years, and if any default of such officer, agent, employé, or deputy in paying over said funds to the proper authorities when required by law to do so shall be deemed prima facie evidence of his guilt."

The two sections are wholly dissimilar. The first refers to the failure to pay over; the second to the knowing misuse or misappropriation of the funds of the state. It is true that the detention of the money is one of the elements constituting the offense punished under section 3717, but it does not constitute the offense itself; for money may be detained without being misappropriated, which is the evil for which section 723 was designed as a remedy. But it may also be detained with fraudulent and felonious intent to misuse and misappropriate, which brings the case within the terms of section 3717.

We are of opinion that the indictment is sufficient, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

While the jury were being selected for the trial of this case, plaintiff in error challenged one of the veniremen who had been sworn upon his voir dire, and asked him if he had not, at a time and place named in the question, said, "Charley Robinson don't want me to sit on any jury that tries him, and would know that he is a goner if I sit on any jury that tries him." To which the juror replied that he had made such a statement, and meant that, if the evidence was as strong in this case as it was in the one before the grand jury on which he sat when Robinson was indicted on a former occasion, he would convict him. The grand jury here alluded to was not connected at all with this prosecution. The court then asked the juror if there was any impression on his mind made by what he had heard about the accused, or by what he had heard on the grand jury in the case referred to, that would require evidence to remove it, to which he replied that there was not, but that he could give the accused a fair and impartial trial without reference to what he had heard about the accused, either on the grand jury or otherwise. Thereupon the juror was received by the court, and the plaintiff in error excepted.

This subject was recently considered by this court in the case of McCue v. Commonwealth, 103 Va. 870, 49 S. E. 623, and the conclusions reached are thus stated in the syllabus: "The trend of recent decisions is in the direction of limiting, rather than extending, the disqualification of jurors by reason of mere opinion, hence the courts inquire into the character of that opinion. If it is a decided or substantial opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, no matter upon what ground formed, the juror is incompetent; but if the opinion is merely hypothetical, and the court is satisfied from an examination of the juror on his voir dire, or otherwise, that he is not biased or prejudiced, and that he can give the prisoner a fair and impartial trial according to the law and the evidence, he should be accepted. No fixed and invariable rule can be laid down whereby to test the competency of jurors, but each case should be determined by its own facts and circumstances, and great weight should be attached by an appellate court to the opinion of the trial judge."

Applying this principle to the case before us, we are of opinion that there was no error in the ruling of the circuit court.

The third assignment of error is to the exclusion of certain evidence offered by the accused.

The bill of exceptions is as follows: "That at the trial of this cause, after the accused had been arraigned and the jury impaneled to try the issue, and while the accused was testifying in his behalf, relative to the reasons why he had not paid the fine and the costs, shown in the evidence, to the clerk of the court, he started to state that it was his practice, and that of other magistrates and police officers down there. To further testimony along this line the commonwealth here objected, by counsel, which objection the court sustained, to which ruling and opinion of the court in sustaining the said objection the accused by his counsel excepted, and tenders this bill of exception, which he prays may be signed," etc.

If the prisoner's conduct was in accordance with the law, it did not need to be supported by the practice of others. If it was not in accordance with the law, the fact that others violated the law would furnish no justification or excuse to him. We see no merit in this assignment of error.

After the evidence was introduced, the court, at the instance of the commonwealth, gave the jury two instructions. The first instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that a payment made to the clerk 30 days after the receipt by a justice of public funds does not excuse a crime, if any, committed because of the failure of an earlier payment."

If the crime was complete, if the prisoner had knowingly misused or misappropriated the funds of the state, his subsequent restitution of the fruits of his crime could not relate back, so as to efface the wrong.

The second instruction is "that the law requires that a justice of the peace, within 30 days after the receipt of any fine imposed by him, do pay such fine, with the cost, to the clerk of the circuit court of his county; and if the jury shall believe from the evidence that C. H. Robinson, while a justice of the peace for this county, received a fine of $5 of Charlie Sacrience, imposed by him as such justice, and instead of paying the same within 30 days after such receipt by him [Robinson] to Mr. Burnham, clerk, knowingly misused or misappropriated the same, or knowingly disposed thereof otherwise than in accordance with the law, it is the duty of the jury to find him guilty, and to fix his confinement in the penitentiary at not less than 1 nor more than 10 years."

This instruction raises again the question considered with respect to the demurrer to the indictment. It is a correct statement of the law as set out in sections 723 and 3717, in the first of which it is made the duty of officers to pay over the fine within 30 days after its receipt, and in the last of which the knowing misuse or misappropriation of public funds is made a felony, punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than 1 nor more than 10 years.

The plaintiff in error offered certain instructions, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, the second of which was given without objection. The fourth, as offered, is in the following words:

"The court instructs the jury, that unless they believe from the evidence that the accused knowingly misused or misappropriated, or knowingly disposed of otherwise than in accordance with law, a fine of $5, collected by him as justice of the peace of Newport magisterial district in the county of Warwick, which $5 were funds of the state of Virginia, as alleged in the indictment, then they must find him not guilty."

The court struck out the words "Newport magisterial district in," and to this action plaintiff in error excepted.

It is true that the words stricken from this instruction are found in the indictment, but they were not material, may be regarded as surplusage, and their rejection was not harmful. To bring the crime within the jurisdiction of the court it is only necessary to show the county in which it occurred; that county being one over which the court has jurisdiction.

Instructions 1, 3, and 5 were refused.

Instruction No. 1 made the guilt of the accused to depend upon his having misappropriated the full amount of $5, and would have required an acquittal, although the evidence had shown the misappropriation of a part of it.

The third instruction directed the jury to acquit, unless they found from the evidence that the accused was a justice of the peace for Newport magisterial district, in the county of Warwick, on the 15th day of August, 1904, as alleged in the indictment, and presents the question already considered in disposing of the modification of instruction No. 4.

The fifth instruction is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, before they can find the accused guilty of the charge alleged in the indictment, they must believe that he knowingly, feloniously, and with an intent to defraud the state of Virginia, misused, misappropriated, or disposed of otherwise than in accordance with law the $5, or funds of the state of Virginia, as in the indictment alleged."

In legal effect, the instruction, as offered by plaintiff in error, is the equivalent of that given by the court, in which the jury were told that, to constitute the crime with which the plaintiff in error was charged, they must believe from the evidence that he, while a justice of the peace of Warwick county, had knowingly misused or misappropriated a fine imposed by him as such justice.

The next assignment of error is that the attorney for the commonwealth, in the course of his argument before the jury, used the following language: "That if the accused knowingly disposed of the fine or any part of the same, like keeping it and putting it in bank, otherwise than by paying it to the clerk of the court within 30 days, it is a violation of the law, and the accused should be convicted as charged in the indictment"—to which the accused, by counsel, objected, which objection the court, being of the opinion that the accused was not prejudiced by the words objected to, they being simply a detached part of the argument, overruled, to which ruling of the court the accused, by counsel, excepted.

As we have said in discussing another branch of the case, the detention of the money is a part, and a necessary part, of its misappropriation. Detention does not necessarily constitute misappropriation, but there could be no misuse or misappropriation without detention, though it is true that detention that continues for 30 days, standing alone, would not complete the offense under section 8717. We have found that the jury was properly directed by the court, and we cannot think that in the face of proper instructions the jury could have been misled to the prejudice of the prisoner by a remark made by the prosecuting attorney, which the court certifies was "a detached part of the argument." That is to say, we are asked to reverse the judgment of the court because a sentence, separated and segregated from its context, is an incorrect statement of the law, when the court, which heard the whole address of counsel and was in a position to consider it, not in its disjointed parts, but as a whole, certifies to us that the accused was not prejudiced by the language used. We are of opinion that this assignment of error should be overruled.

The last assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict as being contrary to the evidence, and in arrest of judgment.

The facts show that the plaintiff in error was a justice of the peace for Warwick county; that he issued a warrant charging Charles Sacriensce with a misdemeanor; that on August 15, 1904, he entered judgment of conviction; that the fine imposed was $5; and that this fine had been paid to him in his capacity as a justice of the peace. These facts appear from the testimony of the clerk of the circuit court of Warwick county, and the report sheet furnished him by the accused. Plaintiff in error, who was sworn in his own behalf, testifies that on Sunday, the 14th of August, Charles Sacriensce was arrested on a warrant issued by him, and brought to the station house, where he bailed him, charging him 60 cents for it, that the accused put up $5 collateral for his appearance the next day; that he did not appear the next day, and witness had never seen or heard of him since; that witness took from the $5 the fees of the constable, amounting to $1.70, and his own fees amounting to $1, the clerk's fees of $1.25, and the $1.05 due the state, and that he afterwards wrote up a mittimus for the man, and credited upon the back of the mittimus the $5 collateral; and that he deposited in bank the $1.05 due the state and the $1.25 due the clerk. He then tendered the $1.05 due the state, and stated that he was ready to pay to the clerk anything more due the state by him. He stated that he had always intended to pay what he had of this fine to the clerk, and certainly would not have made a report of it if he had intended to steal it; that he knew better than that; that he wanted to collect the balance of the fine, but Charlie Sacriensce never was found; that he never did try and convict the defendant; and that his report was wrong in showing that he fined him $5. At this point in the examination of Robinson, the attorney for the commonwealth handed him a warrant, which was in the following words and figures:

"Whereas, John A. Williamson, acting chief of police of the said county, has this day made complaint and information on oath before me, C. H. Robinson, a justice of the peace of the said county, that Charlie Sacriensce of the said county, on the 14th day of August, 1904, in the said county did unlawfully create a nuisance by indecently exposing his person by bathing in a nude condition in the James river between Dawson City and Klondike, of said county, in the presence of divers persons, both ladies and gentlemen, against the statutes made and provided in such cases.

"These are, therefore, in the name of the commonwealth, to command you forthwith to apprehend and bring before me, a justice of the peace of said county, the body of the said Charlie Sacriensce to answer to said complaint, and to be further dealt with according to law.

"Given under my hand and seal this 14th day of August in the year 1904.

"C. H. Robinson, J. P."

Indorsed:

"Commonwealth v. Charlie Sacriensce."

"Warrant of arrest. Executed this 14th August, 1904, by John A. Williamson.

"After hearing the evidence in the case the defendant Charlie Sacriensce was found guilty as charged in the warrant and his punishment ascertained to pay a fine of $5.00 and pay costs of the prosecution. Costs $3.95.

"This the 15th day of August, 1904.

"C. H. Robinson, J. P."

After showing these papers to the witness, the attorney for the commonwealth then said to him: "You said you did not try or fine this man, and this warrant and indorsement thereon show differently. How do you account for that?" And the witness replied: "I did not mean to say I did not fine him. I said he was not found. That he was tried in his absence, and a mittimus was issued for him, but he was never found." The witness further said that the warrant was his warrant, and he entered the judgment on the back of it that he had fined Sacriensce $5 and $3.95 as costs, as appeared on the warrant.

Upon this evidence, after being instructed as we have seen, the jury returned a verdict finding the plaintiff in error guilty as charged in the indictment, and fixing his punishment at one year in the penitentiary. Upon that verdict the circuit court overruled a motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, sentenced the prisoner; and we are of opinion that the record discloses no error.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. PATTERSON.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1906.)

1. RAILROADS — OPERATION — FIRES—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action against a railroad for the destruction of property situated along the right of way by fire communicated from an engine, evidence authorizing an inference that the fire was caused by a red-hot clinker of unusually large size being thrown from the tender by the fireman of the engine, or suffered to fall from the footboard and to roll down the right of way, was sufficient, as against a demurrer to the evidence and in the absence of any explanation or denial by the fireman, to establish defendant's negligence.

2. SAME — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action against a railroad for destruction of property by fire communicated from a locomotive, the burden of proving contributory negligence rests upon defendant, unless such negligence appears by plaintiff's own evidence or may be fairly inferred from the circumstances.

3. SAME—LOCATION OF PROPERTY DESTROYED —CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE— QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

It is not negligence per se for one to build a warehouse used for storing barrels of kerosene oil within a few inches of a railroad's right of way, and the construction of the warehouse in such position does not as a matter of law preclude a recovery, for the destruction of the warehouse by a fire resulting, not from accident, but from the negligence of the operatives of a passing train.

Error to Circuit Court, Pittsylvania County.

Action by T. J. Patterson against the Southern Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Harrison & Leigh, for plaintiff in error.
George T. Rison, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The object of this action is to recover damages from the plaintiff in error, the defendant in the court below, for the destruction by fire of a wooden warehouse and adjacent buildings, and other property of the plaintiff; the origin of the fire being ascribed to the negligence of the defendant.

The company demurred to the evidence, and the case is before us upon a writ of error to the judgment of the trial court overruling the demurrer and awarding to the plaintiff the damages conditionally assessed by the jury.

The warehouse in question was located upon the land of the plaintiff in the vicinity of one of the defendant's stations, and within a few inches of the right of way, and had been used for years as a depository for storing kerosene oil in barrels. The source of the fire was a red-hot clinker of unusually large size, which the jury would have been justly warranted by the evidence in inferring was withdrawn by the fireman from the fire box of the engine, and either negligently thrown off the tender by him or suffered to fall from the footboard and roll down the embankment to a point from which it communicated fire to the building.

We therefore quite agree with the conclusion reached by the learned judge of the circuit court that from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, and in the absence of any explanation or denial by the fireman, the initial negligence of the defendant was clearly established.

But the company denies liability upon the further ground that, even if it be conceded that the fire was primarily caused by the negligence of its employé, the plaintiff was, nevertheless, guilty of such contributory negligence in locating his warehouse immediately along the company's right of way as to bar a recovery.

The burden of proving contributory negligence rests upon the defendant, unless it be disclosed by the plaintiff's own evidence, or may be fairly inferred from all the circumstances, and (inasmuch as this case does not come within the exception, and there is no evidence to sustain the allegation) the question having been withdrawn from the consideration of the jury by the demurrer to the evidence, it must be resolved in favor of the plaintiff, unless this court shall declare as matter of law that the bare location of the warehouse, in such proximity to the right of way, or the manner of its use, constituted negligence per se.

Such contention would seem to be opposed both by experience and observation, for the warehouse had for years escaped the ordinary dangers incident to passing trains, and it is matter of common knowledge that similar structures, devoted to like purposes, are erected along the route of railroads throughout the country.

It is true that the owner of land who elects to establish buildings, or place combustible material, near the track of a railroad, assumes the increased risk from accidental fires, and cannot thereby abridge the right of the company in the lawful use of its property. Pierce on Railroads, 436. But that principle is not to be so interpreted or applied as to exonerate a railroad company from liability for an injury proximately caused by its own negligence.

The case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Simonson (Ill.) 5 Am. Rep. 155, was cited to maintain the rule that the owner who suffers combustible material to accumulate upon his land contiguous to the railroad is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover damages for a fire negligently ignited on the right of way.

That decision is opposed to the great weight of authority on the subject in this country, and contravenes the settled doctrine in this jurisdiction. Railway Co. v. Medley, 75 Va. 507, 40 Am. Rep. 738; Kimball v. Borden, 97

Va. 477, 34 S. E. 45; White v. Railway Co., 99 Va. 357, 38 S. E. 180.

In a note to the principal case numerous authorities are cited to the contrary, and with respect to it the reporter observes: "The latest decision on the subject is that in Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69, wherein, after a most elaborate and powerful argument, the doctrine of contributory negligence by the adjacent landowner was repudiated."

The ultimate limit to which the doctrine seems to have been carried, in connection with the erection and use of buildings, is that the question of the contributory negligence of the owner ought to be submitted to the jury, upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case, a course which was not followed in this instance. 2 Thompson's Com. on Neg. § 2326; Murphy v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 45 Wis. 222, 30 Am. Rep. 721; Kesee v. Railway Co., 30 Iowa, 78, 6 Am. Rep. 643.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the judgment is without error, and it must be affirmed.

FRENCH v. VRADENBURG'S EX'RS et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1906.)

WILLS—RIGHTS OF DEVISEE—DISCHARGE OF INCUMBRANCES.

Where a will expressly directs the payment of debts from the personal property, a devisee of real property, incumbered by testator subsequent to the execution of the will, is entitled to have the incumbrance discharged from the personal estate, to the detriment of pecuniary and specific legatees.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 2149.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mathews County.

Bill for the construction of a will by L. S. French and another, executors of James Vradenburg, deceased, against A. V. French, an infant, etc., and others. From the decree rendered, the defendant named appeals. Reversed.

Wm. W. Old & Son, for appellant. C. B. Garnett and J. Boyd Sears, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The essential question presented by this record for decision involves the right of a devisee of real estate, incumbered by the testator subsequently to the execution of his will, to disappoint legatees, pecuniary and specific, by having the incumbrance discharged out of the personal estate, where the will directs the payment of all the debts of the testator and funeral expenses from any ready money or other personal property that he may have at the time of his death.

From an adverse decree, in a suit by the executors to construe the will and administer the estate, the devisee appealed.

The doctrine touching the order of liability of the assets of a testator's estate for the payment of debts has, in its various aspects, proved a fruitful source of discussion, and in the argument of the present case our attention has been drawn to numerous decisions of the courts, both in England and the United States, bearing upon the question. But, whatever may be the weight of authority elsewhere, we are of opinion that the case comes within the influence and control of a line of precedents in this state so well established and universally followed in determining the order or liability of the assets of the estate of a testator as to have attained the dignity of canons of construction and the sanctity of rules of property.

Since the opinion of Judge Lee, in Elliott v. Carter, 9 Grat. 541, which was delivered more than half a century ago, wills have been written and estates administered on the faith of that decision throughout the commonwealth; and if it, and the decisions of this court which have followed it, are to be overruled, it should be done by act of the Legislature, and not by the courts. That course was pursued in England by Lock King's Act (St. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, amended by St. 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69, p. 706), which in effect declares that when a testator shall die seised of mortgaged property, and shall not by his will or deed have signified a contrary or other intention, lands devised subject to a mortgage or other equitable charge, including a vendor's lien, are primarily chargeable therewith, and such devisee is not entitled to have the mortgage debt discharged or satisfied out of the personal estate.

In Elliott v. Carter, supra, it was held that, in the absence of an express charge, the personal estate constitutes the natural primary fund for the payment of debts. But where, as in that case, both personal property and real property were equally and expressly charged, they stand on the same footing, and each contributes ratably to the discharge of the common burden. The learned judge in the course of his opinion formulates the following rule, determining the order in which the different funds or subjects of property constituting the estate of a deceased testator shall be applied to the payment of debts:

(1) The personal estate at large, not exempted by the terms of the will or necessary implication.

(2) Real estate, or an interest therein, expressly set apart by the will for the payment of the debts.

(3) Real estate descended to the heir.

(4) Real or personal property expressly charged with payment of debts, and then, subject to such charge, specifically devised or bequeathed.

(5) General pecuniary legacies.

(6) Specific legacies.

(7) Real estate devised by the will.

The main case has been since followed and cited in numerous decisions of this court. Crouch v. Davis' Ex'r, 23 Grat. 62; Murphy's Adm'r v. Carter, 23 Grat. 477, 489; Cocker-

Ille v. Dale's Adm'r, 33 Grat. 45, 49; Edmunds' Adm'r v. Scott, 78 Va. 720, 729; Allen v. Patton, 83 Va. 265, 2 S. E. 143; New's Ex'r v. Bass, 92 Va. 383, 389, 23 S. E. 747; Todd v. McFall, 96 Va. 754, 32 S. E. 472; Frasier v. Littleton's Ex'rs, 100 Va. 9, 40 S. E. 108.

The precise question decided in Todd v. McFall, supra, was that a pecuniary legatee, whose legacy had been diminished by the discharge of a vendor's lien resting upon real estate at the time of the testator's death, was not entitled to be subrogated to the right of the vendor against such real estate in the possession of a specific devisee. Replying to the contention that, as the legacies were expressly made a charge on the personal property and it was consumed in the payment of debts, Mrs. McFall was entitled to be paid her legacy out of the real estate, and especially to the extent that the personal property was applied to the relief of the vendor's lien, the court said: "The answer to this position is that, the will not having charged the real estate with the payment of the debts, nor made any other provision for their payment, the law makes the personal property the primary fund for their satisfaction; and if the testator was mistaken as to the value of his personal property, and it has proved inadequate to pay both debts and legacies, the latter must abate to the extent of the disappointment, and cannot be reimbursed out of the land for the loss. A legatee has no right to call upon the devisee to contribute to the payment of the legacy, unless the real estate be charged with its payment, not even when the personal property has been applied in exoneration of the land from a mortgage debt or vendor's lien, if the debt was contracted and the mortgage or lien on the land was created by the testator himself." Elliott v. Carter, supra, is relied on, among other authorities, to sustain the proposition.

In Frasier v. Littleton's Ex'rs, supra, the court held, that where there were several specific devises of real estate, not charged by the will with the payment of debts, one of which the testator in his lifetime, after the will was written, incumbered by mortgage, on a deficiency of personal assets to pay the mortgage the devisee took the devise cum onere, and was not entitled to call upon other devisees to contribute to the payment of the mortgage. The decision rests upon the familiar and well-settled principle that securities will never be marshaled to the injury of persons over whom the party invoking the doctrine has no superior equity. Lee v. Swepson, 76 Va. 173; Peery's Adm'r v. Elliott, 101 Va. 709, 44 S. E. 919; 3 Min. Inst. 612; 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed., Bigelow) 581.

The incidental remark of the judge who wrote the opinion in that case that real estate incumbered by subsequent mortgage fell in the fourth class of Judge Lee's enumeration was inexact and merely by the way. It in no wise affected the result, which, as we have seen, rested upon the principle that the equitable doctrine of marshalling does not obtain among devisees of real estate under the facts of that case, and was not intended as a departure from or modification of the rule in Elliott v. Carter.

The reason for the rule established by Lock King's Act, and cognate authorities, which allows the legatee who has been disappointed of his legacy by the application of the personal property to disincumber real property specifically devised, to stand in the place of the incumbrancer, is to give effect to the will of the testator as a whole, which, it is said, can only be done by requiring the devisee to take cum onere. But it would seem that, under the facts of this case, to uphold the contention of the appellees would violate the principle which they invoke to sustain it; for in this instance, as we have seen, there is an express charge upon the personal estate for the payment of debts, subject to which charge the legacies were given.

It follows from these views that the decree of the circuit court, in so far as it exonerates the personal property from the payment of the liabilities set forth in the seventh paragraph of the decree, and charges that indebtedness primarily upon the real estate therein described, and directs the payment of pecuniary legacies and the delivery of specific legacies bequeathed by the will to the respective legatees, is erroneous, and must to that extent be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with this opinion.

One who seeks and obtains from another authority to sell timber belonging to the latter becomes a quasi agent of the latter, and assumes the duty of exercising the utmost good faith towards him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, §§ 16-24; vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, §§ 132-136.]

2. SAME—FRAUD OF AGENT—RIGHTS OF PRINCIPAL.

Where defendant obtained authority from plaintiff to sell timber for the latter, and procured purchasers at the price named by plaintiff, but represented to plaintiff that he made the sale at a much less price and could not get the price named by plaintiff, and thus induced plaintiff to convey the timber to the purchasers at the less price, and appropriated the balance paid for the timber by the purchasers to himself, under a secret agreement with them, the transaction was a fraud on plaintiff, and he was entitled to equitable relief.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, § 146.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS FOR AGENT'S FRAUD—DECREE.

Where a principal authorized his agent to sell timber for $2,000, and the agent procured purchasers at that price, but fraudulently represented to the principal that he could only secure $1,250, of which he was to retain $50 for his commissions, and induced the principal to convey the land to the purchasers for $1,200, intending to appropriate the balance of the purchase price to himself under a secret agreement with the purchasers, and the principal discovered the fraud and sued for a rescission of the contract, and the purchasers offered to abide by their contract and to pay the full price of $2,000 as the court might decree, the court would direct the payment of $1,950 to the principal and of $50 to the agent.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nottoway County.

Bill by Henry E. Lee against S. J. Patillo and others. From a decree of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Mann and J. T. Thompson, for appellant. Watkins & Brock, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. This appeal is from a decree dismissing the bill in a suit in equity brought by the appellant against the appellee to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud in its procurement.

The contract bears date June 24, 1904, and by its terms the plaintiff conferred authority upon the defendant to "buy or sell" the standing timber upon a tract of 844 acres of land, situated in Nottoway county, for $1,200, to be paid within 30 days from the date of the contract.

The circumstances which led up to and induced the plaintiff to execute the contract were as follows: In May, 1904, the defendant sought and obtained from the plaintiff authority to sell the timber for $2,000 cash; but in a subsequent interview, after the defendant had inspected the timber, he represented to the plaintiff that he could not effect a sale at that price, and advised the execution of a 30-day option at $1,500, at the same time assuring the plaintiff that he would put forth his best efforts to obtain the highest possible price for the timber.

On June 24, 1904, the defendant again approached the plaintiff on the subject, and declared that he had been unable to dispose of the timber for $1,500; that the quantity was inconsiderable; that the pine trees had become infested with bugs, which in a few years would utterly destroy them; and that he could not then realize more than $1,000 for the timber. As the result of these representations, the plaintiff, who seems to have reposed the utmost confidence in the judgment and integrity of the defendant, executed the contract in controversy, which was subsequently extended to August 1, 1904, upon the assertion of the defendant that he had obtained purchasers (Cobb and Robertson) for the timber at the price of $1,250, of which amount $1,200 was to be paid to the plaintiff, and the residue to the defendant, as compensation for his services.

Relying and acting upon the asseveration of the defendant that $1,250 was the actual price at which he had sold the timber, the plaintiff, on July 22, 1904, conveyed the same to the purchasers, Cobb and Robertson. On the day following the defendant unintentionally delivered to the plaintiff a secret agreement between himself and Cobb and Robertson, by which they obligated themselves to pay him $800, in addition to the $1,200 which they had stipulated to pay the plaintiff for the timber. Discovering his mistake, the defendant seized and recovered possession of the paper, but not until after the plaintiff had become apprised of its purport.

From the foregoing narration of the facts disclosed by the record, it is obvious that the plaintiff was not dealing with the defendant as with a stranger, but that the quasi relation of principal and agent existed between them—a relation of trust and confidence, which, upon familiar principles, imposed upon the defendant the positive duty of exercising the utmost good faith towards his principal. Story on Agency, §§ 207, 214; Mechem on Agency, §§ 454, 455, 456, 459; Moseley's Adm'r v. Buck, 3 Munf. 232, 5 Am. Dec. 508; Halsey v. Montelero, 92 Va. 581, 588, 24 S. E. 258; Central Land Co. v. Obenchain, 92 Va. 130, 22 S. E. 876; Jackson v. Pleasanton, 95 Va. 654, 29 S. E. 680.

Yet the evidence clearly discloses a premeditated and systematically pursued purpose on the part of the agent to overreach and defraud his principal. Thus, with respect to the first two contracts, the witness Cobb, who was introduced by the defendant, testified: "He (the defendant) said that he did not try to sell under the $2,000 option, hoping to get a better one at the expiration of it. He said, at the expiration of the $2,000 option, that he could not handle it at that price. Mr. Lee then gave him an option at $1,500, which he kept and handled as he did the $2,000 option. At the expiration of the $1,500 option, Mr. Lee gave him the $1,200 option." Continuing, the witness says: "He asked me not to mention what I had paid for the timber, as it would have a tendency to make all of us have to pay more for standing timber; and suggested that I might say $1,200 was the purchase price."

For the purpose of securing a renewal and extension of the contract of June 24, 1904, the defendant told the plaintiff that $1,200 was the price agreed to be paid for the timber (making a similar statement to three other persons), when at that time he had made the sale to Cobb and Robertson for $2,000, and had in his possession the secret agreement that he was to receive $800 of that amount.

So that, in every aspect of the case, the bad faith of the defendant is palpable and flagrant, and cannot receive countenance in a court of equity, which is always open to afford relief in such cases. Wilson v. Carpenter's Adm'r, 91 Va. 183, 189, 21 S. E. 243, 50 Am. St. Rep. 824, and authorities cited.

Since, however, it appears that the defendants Cobb and Robertson are still willing to abide by their contract for the purchase of the timber at the price of $2,000, and to pay the same as the court may decree, the decree of the circuit court will be reversed, and this court will make such order as that court ought to have made, and direct the payment by Cobb and Robertson of $1,950 to the appellant, and $50, the residue of the $2,000, to the appellee.

BELLENOT v. LAUBE'S EX'R et al.

1. PARTY WALLS—CREATION—CONVEYANCES.

Where the owner of a lot upon which a double brick building was erected conveyed one half of the lot to one person and the other half to another person on the same day and by separate deeds, each of which described the lot conveyed as having a brick tenement thereon and as bounded by the property that day conveyed to the grantee in the other deed, the dividing wall between the two tenements became a party wall, in which each grantee had the rights incident to that kind of a dividing wall.

2. PARTITION—SALE—TITLE OF PURCHASER—RESTRICTION BY DECREE.

Where a suit is brought to partition premises bounded by a party wall, and the deed under which the parties to the suit claim, as well as the decree of sale and the decree confirming the sale, describe the property as beginning "at the center of the partition wall between it and the adjoining tenement on the east," a deed of the commissioner, omitting the quoted reference to the point of beginning, did not enlarge the estate of the purchaser, so as to entitle her to the whole wall, in accordance with a call of the deed designating the beginning point as a certain distance from a street.

3. SAME—NOTICE.

The records of the court and the papers in partition proceedings are notice to the purchaser at partition sale of a variance between the description of the property actually subject to the proceedings and the description contained in the commissioner's deed.

4. PARTY WALLS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Every wall and separation between two buildings is presumed to be a common or party wall, if the contrary be not shown.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Party Walls, §§ 2, 60.]

5. SAME—RIGHTS OF PROPRIETORS—INCREASE OF HEIGHT OF WALL.

One owner of a party wall may erect a new building on his lot and carry the party wall up to a height sufficient for his purposes.

6. SAME—REBUILDING OF WALL—DIVISION OF COSTS.

Where a party wall is in a state of ruin, so that rebuilding is necessary, one party may compel the other by action to contribute to the expense of rebuilding the wall, but if the new wall is made wider or higher, or if the old wall was sufficient for the purposes for which it was used, the expense of the increased height or width of the wall in the first case, or of the rebuilding of the wall in the second, must be borne by the party at whose instance the work is done.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Bill for injunction and other relief by Frances Bellenot against Joseph W. Laube. Defendant died pending suit, and the Virginia Trust Company, as executor, and his legatees and devisees, were substituted in his place. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hill Montague, for appellant. Smith, Moncure & Gordon, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. In November, 1862, Robert Ellett owned a lot fronting 132 feet on the southwest corner of Broad and Monroe streets, then in the county of Henrico, now in the city of Richmond. On the 5th of that month he conveyed 72 feet fronting on the southwest corner of Broad and Monroe streets to one Creed Thomas, leaving 60 feet, upon which was erected a double brick tenement. On the same day that the deed to Thomas was made Ellett conveyed this remaining 60 feet by separate deeds as follows: To M. Nenzel, 29 feet front lying immediately on the west of and adjoining the Thomas lot, described as follows: "All that certain lot of land, with a granite-front brick tenement thereon, beginning 72 feet from the west side of Monroe street, running thence westwardly on the south side of Broad street and fronting thereon 29 feet, running back southwardly at right angles," etc., "bounded on the west by the property this day conveyed by the parties of the first part to S. D. Abernathy." The deed to S. D. Abernathy contains the following description of the property conveyed thereby: "That certain lot of land, with a granite-front brick tenement thereon, beginning at a distance of 101 feet from the west line of Monroe street, running thence westwardly on the south side of Broad street and fronting thereon 31 feet, running back southwardly at right angles, between parallel lines," etc., "bounded on the east by the property this day conveyed by the parties of the first part to M. Nenzel."

It is clear that the sole ownership by Robert Ellett of the double brick tenement on this 60-foot lot was by these two deeds severed, and one tenement, known as "No. 409 West Broad street," became the property of M. Nenzel, and the other tenement became the property of S. D. Abernathy.

These two tenements were alike in every respect. They were brick buildings divided by a brick wall nine inches or more in thickness. The deed to Nenzel describes his house and lot as bounded on the west by the property that day conveyed to Abernathy, and the deed to Abernathy describes her property as bounded on the east by the property that day conveyed to M. Nenzel. While the deeds do not speak of the dividing wall between the two tenements as a party wall, it is manifest from the description in each conveyance that such was the intention of the grantor and the respective vendees. By no other construction of these deeds could the manifest rights of each vendee be effectuated. It is further clear from the record, as shown by the subsequent alienations of these two tenements, that the successive owners regarded and treated the centre of the division wall between the houses 409 and 411 as the division line between the two properties; that line being the eastern boundary of the Abernathy house and the western boundary of the Nenzel house.

In January, 1870, S. D. Abernathy sold her house and lot, No. 411, to John E. Jones, and described the same as beginning at the distance of about 101 feet from the west line of Monroe street, and at the centre of the partition wall between this and an adjoining tenement on the east. In November, 1886, Jones conveyed house and lot No. 411 to McGruder & Jones, in which deed the property was again described as beginning at the centre of the partition wall between it and the adjoining tenement on the east. In 1891 McGruder & Jones conveyed to Nannie M. Marshall and others, using the same language recognizing and describing the center of the division wall as the boundary line between the two houses and lots Nos. 409 and 411. This house and lot, No. 411, was next sold in a suit brought for partition by Nannie M. Marshall, and was bought by the appellant, Frances Bellenot.

The deed from the commissioner to the appellant describes the house and lot as beginning at a point distant 101 feet west from the southwest intersection of Broad and Monroe streets, running westwardly along the south line of Broad street, a distance of 81 feet, leaving out the description contained in the previous deeds, "and at the center of the partition wall between this and the adjoining tenement on the east."

It is this description in her deed from the commissioner that appellant relies on in support of her claim that the center of the partition wall is not the true dividing line between her property and that of the appellees; the contention being that "beginning at a point distant 101 feet west from the southwest corner of Broad and Monroe streets," as described in the deed from the commissioner, would entitle her to the whole of the wall dividing the two houses, Nos. 409 and 411 West Broad street.

The appellant bought the house and lot No. 411 at a judicial sale, and both the decree of sale and the decree confirming the sale to her and directing the commissioner to make her a deed describe the property as beginning at a point about 101 feet west of the west line of Monroe street, at the center of the partition wall between it and the adjoining tenement on the east. These decrees describe the property that appellant is entitled to, and because the commissioner left out of the deed the description, "at the center of the partition wall between this and the adjoining tenement on the east," the rights of appellant cannot be thereby enlarged. The deed of the commissioner was in excess of his power, and the grantee took only such estate as the court had. Scott v. Moore, 98 Va. 688, 37 S. E. 342, 81 Am. St. Rep. 749. The court only sold the title of the parties to the suit.

Nor can the appellant claim want of notice that the deed from the commissioner varied the description of the lot actually purchased by her. It was a judicial sale, and the records of the court and the papers in the cause were the only reliable sources of information as to the property to be sold, the title, boundaries, etc. To these the purchaser should have looked. Long v. Weller, 29 Grat. 347; Pillow v. S. W. Imp. Co., 92 Va. 145, 23 S. E. 32, 58 Am. St. Rep. 804.

Upon this branch of the case our conclusion is that by the deeds of Robert Ellett in 1862 the center of the division wall between the tenements Nos. 409 and 411 was established as the dividing line between the two properties; that this line was recognized by the grantees in those deeds as fixing their respective rights, and has been acquiesced in by subsequent alienees as the true dividing line up to the institution of this suit, a period of more than 40 years; and that no part of the building of the appellees rests upon the land of the appellant.

In December, 1891, house and lot No. 409 was purchased by Joseph W. Laube at a judicial sale. Since the institution of this suit Laube has died, and the cause has been revived in the names of his executor and his legatees and devisees. In 1902 Laube pulled down the old house and kitchen on his lot up to the partition wall between 409 and 411, leaving said partition wall intact, running it up somewhat higher in order to properly construct a two-story brick storehouse then erected by him.

The partition wall between these two properties was a party wall. Every wall of separation between two buildings is presumed to be a common or party wall, if the contrary be not shown, and this not only is a rule of positive ordinance, but is a principle of ancient law. Washburn on Easements (4th Ed.) p. 611.

A party wall is a dividing wall between two houses, to be used equally for all the purposes of an exterior wall by the respective owners of both houses. It is a substitute for a separate wall for each adjacent owner; and one owner may carry it up to a necessary height for his purposes, and an action will not lie by his adjacent owner to compel its removal. Everett v. Edwards, 149 Mass. 588, 22 N. E. 52, 5 L. R. A. 110, 14 Am. St. Rep. 462; Graves v. Smith (Ala.) 6 South. 308, 5 L. R. A. 298, 13 Am. St. Rep. 60; Nalle v. Paggi (Tex. Sup.) 9 S. W. 205, 1 L. R. A. 33; Harber v. Evans

In Jones on Easements, § 632, it is said: "A party wall is a dividing wall between two houses, to be used as an exterior wall for each. * * * The term 'party wall' may designate a wall divided longitudinally in two moieties; each moiety being subject to a cross-easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety." This he says is the sense in which the term is more frequently used in the United States.

In the light of these authorities, it is clear from the evidence that Laube in erecting the new building on his lot did not, in his use of the party wall, exceed his legal rights with respect thereto, and did not deprive appellant of any portion of her full rights and easements therein, or do her any damage of which she can complain.

About one year after Laube had erected his new building the appellant pulled down her house, No. 411, up to this party wall, for the purpose, as alleged in her bill, of erecting on the lot a new building, the ground floor of which was to be used as a store and the floor above as a public hall. The decree appealed from holds, among other things; that the old party wall is insufficient in strength to support a building such as the plaintiff in her bill alleges that she contemplates building on her lot; and therefore it is adjudged that appellant has the right, if she elects so to do, to pull down the old party wall and erect a new party wall, at her own risk and cost, of greater width and height, provided that the rights of the appellees in and to the new wall shall not be increased or diminished by such reconstruction, and provided, further, that no part of such new wall shall occupy a greater portion of the land of the appellees than the old party wall now occupies.

The appellant has no reasonable ground of objection to this provision of the decree. If the common wall be in a state of ruin, and requires to be rebuilt, one party can compel the other, by action, to contribute to the expense of rebuilding it. But the necessity of the rebuilding must be established by the judgment of men skilled in the business, and made on due previous notice; and, if the new wall be made wider or higher, etc., the party building must bear the extra expense. Washburn on Easements, pp. 611, 612.

It is manifest that the old party wall, 9 inches thick, is insufficient to support one side of a building 81 feet wide, the upper floor of which is to be used as an assembly hall, and that appellant cannot erect a building for the purposes contemplated by her without a thicker and stronger wall. The old party wall, as it now stands, is sufficient for the purposes of the appellees. If, therefore, appellant desires to erect a building which requires a thicker and stronger wall, she must erect such wall at her own expense.

In proper order the demurrer to the bill should have been disposed of first. It is, however, sufficient to say that it was properly overruled.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from, and it must be affirmed.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. BELL.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—DUTIES OF MASTER—SAFE APPLIANCES.

The master, in selecting instrumentalities for his work, should keep reasonably abreast with improved methods, and should be reasonably prudent and careful to select appliances reasonably adequate and proper for their respective uses, but is not bound to furnish the best-known appliances or those used by some other employer in the same line of business.

2. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—EVIDENCE.

On the issue of the failure of a master to exercise ordinary care to provide reasonably safe appliances, a witness having sufficient knowledge of the subject may testify to the general practice of masters with reference to similar appliances and the comparative safety of different appliances; but it is not competent to show that the appliances of another master are better than those used by the master whose conduct is being called in question.

3. EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—RECITALS IN PAPERS.

A blue print showing a kind of water gauge, which has indorsed thereon a recital as to the use of the gauge by certain companies, and a paper illustrating another gauge and containing a manufacturer's statement detailing the advantages of the gauge, are hearsay on the issue of alleged negligence in failing to use gauges similar to those described.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad for injuries to a fireman, there was evidence that defendant had placed a man on the engine to learn how to fire; that, while he was engaged in that work, plaintiff was on the engineer's side of the cab, running the engine in the presence of the engineer; that the engineer was required to instruct the fireman in his duties and to be present when the fireman was running the engine; and that the fireman was required to obey the orders of the engineer. Held, that the evidence authorized a charge that if plaintiff, as one of the inducements to his employment, was permitted to run the engine so as to learn to be an engineer, it was the duty of defendant to use ordinary care to provide and maintain a reasonably safe place in which plaintiff was to perform such work.

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Instructions should state, not abstract propositions of law, but the law as applicable to the particular facts of the case.

Error to Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Action by George L. Bell against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Instruction No. 1, given by the court and referred to in the opinion, is as follows:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was, on the 21st day of October, 1902, in the employment of the defendant in the capacity of fireman on one of its engines, as alleged in the declaration, and that, as one of the inducements to said employment as fireman, he was permitted, in the presence of the engineer, to run the engine, and thereby learn to be an engineer, then it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary care to provide and maintain a reasonably safe place in which he was to perform said work, including reasonably safe machinery, appliances and instrumentalities, taking into consideration the character of the work to be done and the difficulties and dangers attending it; and a failure on the part of the defendant to perform this duty would be negligence."

F. S. Kirkpatrick and W. H. Mann, for plaintiff in error. Lee & Howard and Whitehead & Whitehead, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This action was brought by George L. Bell, a fireman of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, to recover damages for injuries resulting from the bursting of a glass water gauge, which it was alleged the railway company had negligently constructed and maintained on its engine, upon which the plaintiff was at work when injured.

The first error assigned is to the action of the trial court in the admission of evidence.

The plaintiff put upon the stand a witness who testified that he was a locomotive engineer and had worked as such on the Seaboard Air Line, Atlantic Coast Line, and Southern Railways, and that he had also worked on the Norfolk & Western Railway as fireman and engine hostler. The witness was permitted to describe the kind of water gauge in use on the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and to identify and put in evidence a blue print or cut showing its character. Upon this blue print, which is made a part of the record, the original of which is before this court, there is indorsed: "This is the style of water gauge used by Pennsylvania R. R., and almost entirely by Richmond Locomotive Works on everything they construct. J. D. M."

Another witness, who testified that he had worked on the Norfolk & Western Railway and on the Southern Railway, was permitted to describe the water gauge in use on the Southern Railway, and the advantages which the gauge used by that company had over that used by the Norfolk & Western Railway. He also identified a cut or picture of the gauge in use on that road on a paper introduced in evidence, which contained the manufacturer's statement of the advantages of that gauge, among which were that it furnished "most effective protection against explosions," and "absolute safety against injuries to workmen."

One of the objections made to the evidence is that the alleged failure of the defendant company to exercise ordinary care to provide and maintain a reasonably safe water gauge on its engine could not be shown by proving that another railway company provided a different and safer gauge on its engines.

In selecting between different instrumentalities for his purposes the master should keep reasonably abreast with improved methods, so as to lessen the danger to those in his service; but he is not bound, in the performance of his duty, to furnish the best-known instrumentalities, but such only as are reasonably safe. The test is, not whether he has omitted to do something he could have done, nor whether a better appliance could have been obtained or a better method adopted, but whether the selection made was reasonably prudent and careful, and the instrumentality selected reasonably adequate and proper for the use to which it was to be applied. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869; Norfolk & Western Railway Co. v. Cromer's Adm'r, 99 Va. 763, 787, 40 S. E. 54.

It has been repeatedly held by this court that a witness having sufficient knowledge on the subject may testify as to the general practice of masters and the comparative safety of different methods or appliances, but it is not competent to show that the different methods or appliances of another master are better than those of the defendant. It is supposed that in such matters even the skillful and experienced will frequently differ in their choice of instrumentalities. A party should not be judged to be negligent for not conforming to some other method, or for not using some other appliance believed by some to be less perilous. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 640, 27 S. E. 509; Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 694, 695, 37 S. E. 285; Parlett v. Dunn, 102 Va. 459, 463, 46 S. E. 467.

The blue print showing the kind of water gauge in use on the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and the paper containing the cut or picture of the water gauge used by the Southern Railway, were amenable to the further objection that the indorsement on the blue print as to the use of the gauge by other companies, and the statement in the other paper that the gauge described was most effective against explosions, and was absolutely safe against injuries to workmen, were mere hearsay statements and inadmissible.

The action of the court in refusing to give the instructions asked for by the defendant, and in giving its own instructions, is assigned as error.

The objection made to instruction No. 1, given by the court, is that there was no evidence upon which to base it.

The defendant claimed that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because he had no right to be where he was when injured. The evidence tended to show that the defendant had placed a young man on the engine to learn how to fire, and that, while he was engaged in that work, the plaintiff, who was the regular fireman, was on the engineer's side of the cab, running the engine, in the presence of the engineer; that under the rules of the defendant the engineer was required to instruct the fireman in all his duties, and not to permit him to run the engine, except when the engineer himself was present, or upon the order of the superintendent or master mechanic, and the fireman was required to obey the orders of the engineer.

That evidence was sufficient to justify the court in giving the instruction in question.

It is not contended, as we understand the defendant's objections to the other instructions given by the court, that they do not state the law correctly, or that they do not cover all the questions involved in the case; but the contention is that they, especially the third, fourth, and fifth instructions, state it in such a general way, and with so little application to the facts of the case, that their effect was to mislead, rather than to aid, the jury.

There is some foundation for this contention. But as the judgment will have to be reversed because of the admission of illegal evidence, as hereinbefore pointed out, it will be unnecessary to consider the objections to the action of the court in giving and refusing instructions, as the evidence will not be the same on the next trial, further than to say that instructions should state, not abstract propositions of law, but the law as applicable to the particular facts which the evidence in the case tends to prove.

The plaintiff insists that there is sufficient evidence in the case, after rejecting that which was objected to, and which we have seen should have been excluded, not only to sustain the verdict of the jury, but to have compelled a verdict in his favor.

In this he is mistaken. The evidence introduced by the defendant to show that it had exercised ordinary care to provide and maintain a reasonably safe glass water gauge on its engine was sufficient to have sustained a verdict in its favor, if the jury had so found.

We are of opinion, therefore, to reverse the judgment complained of, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

PENCE et al. v. CARNEY et al.*

Nov. 14, 1905.)

1. WATERS—WHAT ARE PERCOLATING WATERS.

All subterranean waters which do not exist in a known and well-defined channel are deemed percolating waters.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 108.]

2. SAME—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS.

All subterranean waters are presumed to be percolating waters, until it is shown that they exist in a known and well-defined channel.

3. SAME.

Under the facts and circumstances appearing in this case the waters in controversy are held to be percolating waters.

The owner of land who explores for and produces subterranean percolating water within the boundary of his land is limited to a reasonable and beneficial use of such water, when to otherwise use it would deplete the water supply of a valuable natural spring of another on adjoining or neighboring land, and thereby materially injure or destroy such spring.

5. SAME—DIVERSION—INJUNCTION.

The mere temporary pumping to a reasonable extent of percolating water from a well being sunk by the owner of land within his boundary in good faith for the purpose of completing the well for legitimate use, and the casting of such water upon the land of such owner, is not such unreasonable use or waste of the water as will sustain an injunction against such temporary pumping, notwithstanding such pumping may temporarily decrease the supply of water to a valuable natural spring of another on adjacent or neighboring land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 113.]

6. INJUNCTION — IRREPARABLE INJURY—EVIDENCE.

In order to sustain an injunction against an act of trespass, on the ground that the injury occasioned thereby is irreparable, the facts constituting such irreparable injury must be alleged and proved.

7. APPEAL—REVIEW—DECREE IN EQUITY—REVERSAL.

A final decree in a suit in equity will not be reversed by this court at the instance of the plaintiffs because at the time of its entry a rule was pending and undetermined against the defendants for violating a temporary injunction awarded in the suit, when it appears that the hearing of the rule had, previous to the final hearing, been continued by an order entered by consent of both parties, and that the final hearing was on motion of the plaintiffs to perpetuate the injunction, and that no objection to such final hearing was made by them in the court below.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Summers County.

Bill by A. P. Pence and George N. Davis against B. E. Carney and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

T. N. Read and Vinson & Thompson, for appellants. J. W. Kennedy, Brown, Jackson & Knight, and John Wehrle, for appellees.

COX, J. A. P. Pence and George N. Davis filed their bill in equity in the circuit court of Summers county against A. C. Blair and B. E. Carney to enjoin them and their agents from unreasonably and unusually abstracting and using the water from a well sunk by them on a tract of land owned by Blair and Carney, and from casting the same on their land, whence it flowed upon plaintiffs' land. Upon presentation of the bill a temporary injunction was awarded. Defendants demurred to the bill and filed their answer. Depositions were taken and the case submitted for final hearing on March 29, 1905, on the pleadings and depositions and upon the motion of defendants to dissolve the injunction and the motion of the plaintiffs to perpetuate the injunction, and the court entered a decree sustaining the demurrer to the bill dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill. From this decree an appeal was allowed the plaintiffs by this court.

The errors assigned involve a consideration of the whole case. It appears from the record substantially as follows: Plaintiffs, Pence and Davis, are the owners of a tract of land of 283 acres, upon which there is a valuable spring called "Pence's Spring," and known as a flowing spring as far back as 1849. So long as known by witnesses, unless interfered with by some mechanical obstruction, and until the acts of defendants complained of, this spring has flowed continuously, unaffected by rainfall. The water of this spring is supposed to contain valuable curative and medicinal qualities, and has been widely advertised by sample. Some years ago certain improvements were made to this spring. At that time an excavation was made to a depth of about 14 feet, where the water supplying the spring was found to issue forth or flow in a constant and well-defined stream, or, as some of the witnesses say, to boil up through a well-defined crevice about 10 inches long and $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, in a rock, with well-defined walls. Plaintiff Pence is the owner of one acre of land adjoining the 283 acres. Upon it he has erected and maintains a valuable hotel and hotel plant and has secured from his coplaintiff his interest in the 283 acres at a rental of \$1,000 a year for 25 years from November 28, 1901. The water from Pence's spring is used to supply the guests and patrons of the hotel, who frequent it for the purpose of using this water; and by reason of the use of this water the hotel plant and property are greatly increased in value. Plaintiff Pence also uses this water commercially, shipping it to various points in this and adjoining states. Defendants Blair and Carney, having purchased a tract of 19 acres adjoining the 283 acres, recently began to explore for the same kind of water as that flowing from Pence's spring, and after some unsuccessful efforts, sunk a well on their land and at a depth of 58 feet below the surface found water, which the evidence tends to show was in taste and effect like that flowing from Pence's spring. According to some of the evidence the water supplying the well came into it through a crevice in the rock, practically in the same manner that the water came into Pence's spring. Some of the evidence tends to show that the well was supplied by two such streams coming into it from different directions. After water was found in the well, defendants placed therein a steam pump of large capacity, producing, as some of the witnesses say, from 60 to 70 gallons of water per minute, which was cast upon defendants' land, whence it flowed upon plaintiffs' land. About 24 hours after the pump was started, the flow at Pence's spring began to subside, and the pumping being continued, the flow at the spring ceased. Before the pumping there was no visible effect upon the spring by the sinking or the well and the finding of water therein. After the injunction was awarded the pumping was discontinued for a time, with the effect that the water at the spring began to rise in the receptacle placed over it, and continued to rise until the water flowed out from the receptacle, but not in as great quantities as before any pumping was done. Some time afterwards the pumping was resumed and was again discontinued with like effect upon Pence's spring, as in the first instance. The well, according to the evidence of plaintiffs, is from 1,000 to 1,100 feet, and according to the evidence of defendants, 1,350 feet from Pence's spring. The well is 25 feet higher than the spring according to surface elevation. The tracts of land mentioned are located along Sulphur Spring Branch of Greenbrier river in Summers county, in a narrow, irregular valley. Sulphur Spring Branch is a running surface stream of water with well-defined banks. Until the improvements were made to Pence's spring, its overflow ran in a stream with well-defined banks a distance of about 20 feet and there emptied into Sulphur Spring Branch. The 19-acre tract belonging to defendants is located farther up the valley than the lands of plaintiffs. On either side of this valley the mountains rise abruptly. By defendants' answer, it is substantially denied that the waters supplying their well were from a known subterranean stream with well-defined channel, or that their pumping was unreasonable, or that they acted otherwise than lawfully, or that they had any intent to injure plaintiffs' spring thereby; but they claimed that the pumping was necessary in order to complete the well, and make it useful to them in their contemplated business of running a hotel and furnishing water to the patrons thereof, and to the general public.

The subject of this controversy is subterranean water. Some of the questions involved are comparatively new in the courts of this state, and are of great importance. It has been truly said that the two fundamental principles underlying the consideration of the rights of adjacent or neighboring owners of land in subterranean waters are: First, that the owner of land owns from the surface upward to the sky and downward to the center of the earth; and, second, that the owner must so use his own as not to injure another. Some courts have emphasized one of these principles almost to the exclusion of the other, but the greater number have made an effort to apply both in harmony. Many authorities for the purpose of applying these principles have divided subterranean waters into two classes: First, underground bodies or streams of water existing in a known and well-defined channel; and, second, underground waters, which ooze or percolate through the earth, or percolating waters, and have endeavored, as far as practicable, to apply the rules of law applicable to surface streams or bodies existing in well-defined channels, to the like streams or bodies existing underground. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 311; Miller v. Black Rock Springs Co., 99 Va. 747, 40 S. E. 27; Wheelock v. Jacobs (Vt.) 40 Atl. 41, 43 L. R. A. 105, 67 Am. St. Rep. 659, and note; Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294. Underground waters are presumed to be percolating waters, until it is shown that they exist in known and well-defined channels. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 311; Boyce v. Cupper, 37 Or. 256, 61 Pac. 642; Barclay v. Abraham, 10 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 716, note, and cases there cited.

The burden of proof, then, is upon the plaintiffs in this case to show that the waters in controversy exist in a known underground stream with well-defined channel, if they would have the law of a similar surface stream apply here. It appears that upon the pumping of defendants' well, the supply at Pence's spring was depleted, and upon the continuance of the pumping, that the flow at Pence's spring ceased, and that this operation was repeated with a like effect on the spring; and that at the points where the water came into the well and into the spring, there were well-defined crevices in the rock, but these facts do not show the existence of a stream with known and well-defined channel for the entire distance between the well and the spring, or that both do not receive their supply from a saturated area or stratum extending under the lands of both plaintiffs and defendants. Taylor v. Welch, 6 Or. 198; Ocean Grove Ass'n v. Com'rs, 40 N. J. Eq. 447, 3 Atl. 168; Cole v. Bacon, 63 Cal. 571; Clark Co. v. Lumber Co., 80 Miss. 535, 31 South. 105; Huber v. Merkel (Wis.) 94 N. W. 354, 62 L. R. A. 589, 98 Am. St. Rep. 933; Barclay v. Abraham, 10 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 693, note. The underground waters which the law recognizes as existing in underground bodies or streams in well-defined channels are those, and those only, which are known to so exist, or that they do so exist is ascertainable or discoverable from surface indications or other means, without subsurface excavations for that purpose. Black v. Billymena Com'rs, 17 Ir. L. R. 459; Lybe's Appeal, 106 Pa. 626, 51 Am. Rep. 542; Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 519, 84 Am. Dec. 611. No surface indications other than the facts hereinbefore detailed are shown indicating a known and well-defined underground stream. We think the facts appearing, taken together, are insufficient to overcome the presumption that the waters in controversy are percolating waters, and tend rather to show that both the well and the spring receive their supply from an underground saturated area or stratum extending under the lands of both plaintiffs and defendants. We shall therefore treat the waters in controversy as underground, percolating waters.

The early, and we may say the general rule, was that underground, percolating waters belong to the soil and the owner of the land may search and explore for and obtain them at will and use them at pleasure, though in so doing he may drain or entirely divert such waters from the lands of adjacent or neighboring owners to which they would otherwise necessarily pass. This seems to be the rule in England, and the rule followed in nearly all of the early and some of the later American cases. Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 324; Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cas. 349; Eward v. Bellfast, L. R. 9 Ir. 172; 10 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 694, note, and cases there cited; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 310-312; Miller v. Black Rock Springs Co., 99 Va. 747, 40 S. E. 27. Of the English cases, and of the common law on this subject, Mr. Farnham, in his late comprehensive work on "Waters and Water Rights" (volume 3, p. 2718), says: "When it is remembered that the first English case dealing with percolating water arose in 1840, and that it was not decided that the landowner might exhaust the water to furnish a municipal water supply until 1860, it will be at once seen that there was no English law on the subject at the time the common law was adopted by statute, in most of the American states, and that the opinion of the American courts as to what is the common law is as good as subsequent decisions in English courts. Therefore, in any case, the question can be decided on its merits, giving the English decisions the weight to which they are entitled, but without the necessity of regarding them as binding precedents."

Under the early rule, considered without limitation or qualification, there were no correlative rights between adjoining or neighboring owners of land in underground, percolating waters. Can it then be said in these days of powerful machinery and modern appliances, when it is possible for one landowner to drain the lands of a neighborhood, or section of country, of their underground water, and thus render them practically valueless, that underground, percolating waters are wholly without the protection of the law, that they, like the wild animal, belong alone to him who first obtains possession of them? Such an instance of draining a whole section of country was found and held to be unlawful in the case of Forbell v. New York, 164 N. Y. 522, 58 N. E. 644, 51 L. R. A. 695, 79 Am. St. Rep. 666. While the early rule, both in England and this country, is as stated above, the weight and trend of the recent authorities and cases in America are to qualify the early rule by limiting the use by the owner of the land who searches therein, and produces percolating water to a reasonable and beneficial use of such water, where to use it otherwise would deprive the owners of adjacent and neighboring lands of the enjoyment of the waters of their lands.

In 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 314, issued in 1905, after noting the general or early rule, it is said: "In the later cases the right of a landowner to intercept and divert percolating waters has been subjected to some qualifications, on the ground that such right relates to the beneficial use of the waters or of the land for some purpose connected with the ordinary operations of agricultural, mining, domestic use, or improvements, either public or private. Under this doctrine, it has been held that a landowner has no right, except for the benefit and improvement of his own premises, or for his beneficial use, to drain, collect, or divert percolating waters therein, where such act will destroy or materially injure the spring of another, the waters of which spring are used by the general public for domestic purposes; that he cannot drain, collect, or divert such waters for the sole purpose of wasting them." In Mr. Farnham's work on "Waters and Water Rights," issued in 1904 (volume 8, p. 2712), it is said: "It has been said that there are no correlative rights existing between proprietors of adjoining lands in reference to the use of waters in the earth or percolating under its surface. And many cases have been decided upon this principle. But the attempt to act upon that doctrine very soon forces the conclusion that percolating water is not an exception to the general rule that rights in organized society are not absolute, but correlative, and that one man cannot be permitted to exercise any right if the direct effect of his act would be an injury to his neighbor." This subject is treated extensively in the note to the case of Barclay v. Abraham, 10 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 704, issued in 1905. "It may be said to be now the generally accepted doctrine, in the United States, that the rights of the owner of the soil to percolating waters are limited to the use for proper purposes, connected with the natural enjoyment of his property. Thus, while the early cases held that any one might abstract the percolating water from his land, and convey it to a neighboring town or village for sale to others * * * and this would seem to be still the rule in England * * * the modern cases have adopted the rule that the right of the landowner to divert or consume percolating water does not extend to authorizing the destruction of a stream, pond, spring, or well, by cutting off its natural source of supply, when the acts that produce that result are not done for the beneficial use and enjoyment of the land on which they are done, but for the sole purpose of gathering the water and conveying it to a distant place for the use of strangers, who have no right thereto as against the owners of the neighboring lands; and this rule is applied with especial strictness when the percolating water is abstracted by artificial and powerful means, so as to create an unnatural and forced drainage, and a corresponding depletion of the natural water supply. Accordingly, when such abstraction of the percolating water affects a large extent of territory, and creates a permanent lowering of the underlying water table so as to cause serious and permanent injury to the land of others and unfit it for profitable cultivation, the landowner, whose acts cause the injury, will be liable in damages, and will be enjoined from continuing his unlawful acts. The rule applies to municipal corporations and water companies equally with individuals." See, also, the many cases cited at page 706. At page 706, it is said: "According to the best considered cases, the early doctrine must also be limited so as to permit only a reasonable use of the percolating water underlying the land; and it is accordingly held that if such water is drawn off, not in the bona fide enjoyment of the defendants' property, but for no beneficial purpose, and a fortiori if it be drawn off maliciously, he may be enjoined from so doing, especially if the interests of the public would otherwise suffer, though the water be used colorably for some purpose of benefit to himself." At page 721, it is said: "The modern doctrine applies with especial force to the case of mineral springs fed by percolating waters, on account of the great value of many of these springs, and the magnitude of the injury that may be caused by an interference with their source of supply." St. Amand v. Lehman, 120 Ga. 253, 47 S. E. 949. Mr. Freeman, who appended a comprehensive note to the case of Wheelock v. Jacobs (Vt.) 67 Am. St. Rep. 659, also appended a note on the same subject to the case of Katz v. Walkinshaw (Cal.) 99 Am. St. Rep. 66, issued in 1904. In the later note he says: "In our note to the case of Wheelock v. Jacobs, 67 Am. St. Rep. 659, we treated only the question of what waters are percolating, perhaps under the impression, which the later and best considered cases do not sustain, that when this question was solved and the answer reached, that the waters in question were percolating, no other inquiry need be made, except to ascertain on whose lands they were found when used, appropriated, or otherwise interfered with." At page 71, he says: "The very decided weight of authority supports the proposition that the landowner has no right by anything done on his land to waste, whether through malice or indifference, the percolating waters there found, or which he therein develops or brings to the surface by means of ditches or wells, with or without pumping apparatus, if by such waste the neighboring landowner is deprived of percolating waters which otherwise would be within his land and which he there has a necessity for using." See authorities there cited. Tending to sustain the later doctrine of reasonable and beneficial use of underground percolating waters, see Bassett v. Manufacturing Co., 43 N. H. 569, 82 Am. Dec. 179; Sweets v. Cutts, 50 N. H. 439, 9 Am. Rep. 276; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; Barclay v. Abraham, 121 Iowa, 619, 96 N. W. 1080, 64 L. R. A. 255, 100 Am. St. Rep. 365; McClintic v. Hudson (Cal.) 74 Pac. 849; Forbell v. New York, 164 N. Y. 522, 58 N. E. 644, 51 L. R. A. 695, 79 Am. St. Rep. 666; Reisert v. New York (N. Y.) 66 N. E. 731; Smith v. Brooklyn, 160 N. Y. 357, 54 N. E. 787, 45 L. R. A. 684; Willis v. Perry (Iowa) 60 N. W. 727, 26 L. R. A. 124; Stillwater Co. v. Farmer, 89 Minn. 58, 93 N. W. 907, 60 L. R. A. 875, 99 Am. St. Rep. 541; St. Amand v. Lehman, 120 Ga. 253, 47 S. E. 949; East v. Railroad Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 77 S. W. 646; Gagnon v. French Lick Springs Co. (Ind. Sup.) 72 N. E. 849, 64 L. R. A. 175; also note by Mr. Farnham published since his work on "Waters and Water Rights," 64 L. R. A. 336.

We must yield assent to the later doctrine of reasonable and beneficial use, which constitutes rather a qualification of the early rule than an announcement of a new rule. The later doctrine seems to us to be sustained by the weight of authority as well as by the weight of reason. What is a reasonable and beneficial use under this later doctrine must be determined in the light of the facts and circumstances appearing in each case as it arises. We do not desire to be understood as announcing any fixed rule applicable to all cases as to the question of what constitutes such reasonable and beneficial use. Such reasonable or beneficial use has often been understood and held to mean, use for any purpose for which the owner of the land upon which underground, percolating waters are found might legitimately use and enjoy his land. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 314; 10 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq., supra. By the later doctrine is not much of the difference between the rules of law governing underground streams existing in well-defined channels, and the rules of law applicable to underground, percolating waters virtually extinguished? It may be so, but we do not decide here that it is so. We must keep in mind, however, in investigating the subject here involved, the fact that water in some form is necessary to the very existence of man and to the enjoyment of his land. Without it his land becomes a desert, of no value for agricultural purposes and unfit for habitation. In this respect, water may be unlike oil or gas, or other such subterranean substances, which, while useful to man, are not absolutely necessary to his existence or to the enjoyment of his land and may be abstracted therefrom without destroying the value of the land. These substances may be termed merely commercial products, but we are not deciding any question in relation to these products termed commercial products.

Applying the law to this case, we believe that the facts alleged in the bill, if sustained by proof, are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to relief in equity, and the demurrer to the bill should have been overruled. The bill proceeds upon the theory that the waters tapped and abstracted from defendants' well were supplied from an underground stream existing in a known and well-defined channel, but the evidence does not support this theory; nor does it, in our judgment, sustain the theory of an unreasonable and nonbeneficial use by defendants of the water produced from their well. The defendants' contention that the pumping and wasting of the waters from their well, shown by the evidence, were merely temporary, and done in good faith, for the purpose of completing the well for legitimate use, seems to be sustained. The evidence of plaintiffs in a great measure sustained the contention of defendants, that the pumping was only temporary and without malice, and for the purpose of completing the well for use. On cross-examination plaintiff A. P. Pence testified as follows: "Q. In operating this well, do you know what pumping was or was not necessary in operating it as they were operating it? A. They pumped the water out so they could work down in there. Q. Wasn't it necessary to pump the water out so they could work down in there? A. It might have been necessary; I wasn't there. Q. Don't you know they could not work down in that well with that shaft with the water and without pumping it out? A. No, I don't see how they could have worked without pumping the water out." J. D. Pence, a son of plaintiff A. P. Pence, on cross-examination, testified as follows: "Q. The pumping that you have spoken of from this well was necessary in the operation of sinking the well, wasn't it? A. That depends upon how you have reference to sinking the well. Q. Is that as far as you can answer this question? A. It is, until I know further about how the well is to be sunk. Q. Don't you know how that well was being sunk? A. It was sunk by means of a steam drill, and also by means of pick and shovel. Q. Then you do know how this well was being sunk, do you? A. I do. Q. I will ask you again if this pumping was not necessary in the operation of sinking this well, as it was being sunk? A. As they were working at it, I should say it was." This evidence seems to be conclusive. We cannot say that the pumping and wasting of the water from defendants' well was such an unreasonable use of the water as to violate the rule of reasonable and beneficial use by defendants. We hold, therefore, that plaintiffs were not entitled to a perpetuation of the injunction against such temporary use of the water from defendants' well as is disclosed by the evidence.

Plaintiffs claim that under the allegations of the bill they were entitled to have the injunction perpetuated because defendants had cast the water upon the earth, and the same had flowed upon and over plaintiffs' land, by reason whereof the damage to plaintiffs was irreparable. There is no allegation that defendants were insolvent, and no facts constituting irreparable injury are alleged in the bill or shown by the evidence, in relation to the water which flowed upon plaintiffs' land, and plaintiffs were not entitled to a perpetuation of the injunction, on the ground that such trespass or injury was irreparable. See Farland v. Wood, 35 W. Va. 453, 14 S. E. 140; Becker v. McGraw, 43 W. Va. 539, 37 S. E. 532; Merriner v. Merriner, 54 W. Va. 169, 46 S. E. 118. It is claimed that the motion to dissolve the injunction should not have been considered at a time when a rule was pending and undetermined against defendants for violating the injunction. On the 13th day of January, 1905, an order was entered by consent of both parties, continuing the consideration of the rule. This cause was submitted for final hearing, among other things, upon motion of plaintiffs to perpetuate the injunction, without having the question of the rule determined. No objection to the final hearing was made in the court below because of the pendency of the rule, and we think, under these circumstances, that the decree cannot be reversed because of the pendency of the rule, at the instance of the plaintiffs. Endicott v. Mathis, 9 N. J. Eq. 110; Crabtree v. Baker, 51 Am. Rep. 424; Hebb v. County Court, 48 W. Va. 279, 37 S. E. 676. It appears to us from the whole case that the lower court did not err in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, but in our judgment the decree in this cause should be without prejudice, as hereinafter indicated.

For the reasons stated it is ordered that the decree of the circuit court entered in this cause on the 29th day of March, 1905, be modified so as to overrule the demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill, and, as modified, that the same be affirmed without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to proceed by a bill for an injunction, or otherwise, against the defendants for any future unlawful extraction, use, or waste of said underground water which may be found or obtained upon their lands, resulting in injury to the property or rights of the plaintiffs.

BARBOUR, STEDMAN & HEROD v.
TOMPKINS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 16, 1906.)

1. EQUITY—DECREE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A decree that is appealable under clause 7 of section 1 of chapter 135 of the Code of 1899 as one adjudicating the principles of a cause, or that is final in such sense as to make it reviewable by bill of review, is conclusive of every matter decided by it, and of every matter which, by the rules of equity practice, the parties were bound to set up in reference to it, before submitting it for adjudication, and cannot be altered or disturbed, except by appeal or bill of review within the respective periods allowed therefor by the statutes.

2. SAME—ALTERATION AFTER TERM.

After the expiration of the term at which such a decree was made and entered it cannot be materially altered, by the court which pronounced it, as to anything so decided or deemed in law to be thereby concluded, except upon some proceeding instituted in said court for setting aside and annulling the same or correcting error therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, §§ 1025, 1038.]

3. SAME—REOPENING.

After the expiration of the term at which such a decree has been pronounced, the same cannot be reopened for the reception of pleadings setting up defenses as to any matter so decided or concluded. A defendant has no right of election to interpose his matters of defense singly and take separate successive trials and adjudications thereon. By allowing a cause to be decided without having set up a defense, or any one or more of his defenses, he is deemed to have waived all matters so withheld.

4. APPEAL—REVERSAL—REMAND WITH DIRECTIONS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

When this court reverses a decree as to a matter finally determined thereby, and remands the cause, with direction to enter a particular decree as upon the merits of the subject-matter thereof, the mandate of this court is final and conclusive upon all parties as to all matters and things so directed, and no new defenses, existing and known at the date of the decree so reversed, can be entertained or heard in opposition thereto.

5. EQUITY—DECREE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A decree made in a suit brought to enforce the liens of judgments and a deed of trust, fixing the amounts and priorities of the liens, decreeing payment thereof, and directing a sale of the debtor's land on default of payment, is final and conclusive as to the amounts of the debts after the expiration of the term at which it is pronounced, and an answer praying the elimination of usury from one of the debts so adjudicated cannot be received thereafter.

6. DEED—DESCRIPTION—UNCERTAINTY.

When the other terms of the description in a deed are equivocal and uncertain as to the identity of the land, and the description by quantity, location, and ownership, viewed in the light of admissible extraneous evidence, makes clear the intent of the grantor to convey only the land so described by quantity, location, and ownership, the deed is not void for uncertainty, and will be given effect according to the manifest intent as gathered from the whole instrument.

7. JUDICIAL SALES—STAY—WHEN GRANTED.

If, after a decree of sale of real estate to satisfy liens thereon, a lease of part of the same for mining purposes be executed by consent of all interested parties, but under an agreement that the execution of such lease shall not prejudice the right of any creditor to ask for sale of the land subject to the lease, and by reason of development of the land under the lease its market and rental values are largely increased, sale thereof will not be delayed for an inquiry as to whether its rents and profits will be sufficient to discharge the liens thereon within five years.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Bill by Barbour, Stedman & Herod against William H. Tompkins and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and William H. Tompkins and H. P. Tompkins appeal. Affirmed.

Price, Smith & Spilman, for appellants. Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. By reference to 31 W. Va. 410, 7 S. E. 1, it will be seen that the cause of Barbour, Stedman & Herod v. Wm. H. Tompkins and others was in this court in the year 1888 on an appeal from a decree rendered in said cause on the 16th day of July, 1886, which said decree was reversed on account of errors specified in the opinion, and remanded to the circuit court of Kanawha county. Afterwards, on the 11th day of January, 1889, pursuant to the mandate of this court, a new decree was made. For the correction of manifest errors of that decree, another was entered on the 16th day of April, 1891. Afterwards two sales of the real estate of Wm. H. Tompkins were made under the decree as corrected. One of these, made April 12, 1894, for the sum of $20,000, was subsequently set aside on account of inadequacy of price. The other, made on the 30th day of October, 1895, for the sum of $17,000, was also set aside on the same ground. On the 16th day of June, 1899, under an order of the court, 400 acres of the land, situate on Kelly's creek, was leased to J. D. Harris, acting for the Cedar Grove Colliery Company, for coal mining purposes, at a minimum royalty or rent of $2,500 per year after the first two years. On April 30, 1902, Wm. H. Tompkins tendered, and was permitted to file, an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, praying, among other things, relief as to usurious interest provided for in the debt due from him to A. F. Mathews. Upon this answer process was awarded and executed. Later H. P. Tompkins, J. G. W. Tompkins, and Ellen C. Tompkins also filed answers, praying affirmative relief. On the 19th day of November, 1902, A. F. Mathews, having excepted to the answer of Wm. H. Tompkins and given notice of a motion to strike out the same, moved the court to strike from the record said answer and also the papers filed as answers of H. P. Tompkins, J. G. W. Tompkins, and Ellen C. Tompkins. Upon these motions the court adjudged that said papers should not be treated or regarded as answers; but, as they brought to the attention of the court matter calling for judicial action in the cause, they should be permitted to remain in the record as affidavits. By these affidavits it was shown to the court that there was confusion and uncertainty as to what lands were subject to the lien for the debt due said A. F. Mathews; and to ascertain and determine this question the cause was referred to Joseph Ruffner as special commissioner. On the 20th day of September, 1904, said special commissioner having returned his report, a decree was pronounced declaring the lien for said debt to be limited to a certain portion of the land of said Tompkins, appointing George E. Price a special commissioner to act in lieu of S. L. Flournoy, then deceased, with others who had been previously appointed, as special commissioner to make sale of the real estate, and directing such sale to be made unless the defendant Wm. H. Tompkins, or some one for him, should pay off and discharge the liens on the lands, with interest and cost of the suit, within a certain time named. From this decree the defendants Wm. H. Tompkins and H. P. Tompkins have appealed, assigning, as grounds of error, the refusal of the court to allow the Mathews debt to be purged of its usury, and to refer the cause to a commissioner to ascertain whether the rents and royalties in the hands of the court, together with the rents, issues, and profits of the lands, will discharge the liens thereon within five years. They also complain of a clause in the decree authorizing the commissioners to make a private sale of the land. Mathews has cross-assigned error because the court has held that his deed of trust does not include a certain tract of land upon which he claims a lien by virtue of it.

From the opinion delivered on the former appeal, as well as from the record, it appears that the debtor, Wm. H. Tompkins, did not prior to the rendition of the decree of July 16, 1886, object to the allowance of the usurious interest provided for by his contract in such manner as to enable the court to expunge it. No relief in that respect was subsequently asked by him until after the decrees of January 11, 1889, and April 16, 1891. His first attempt to object by way of answer or any pleading was made on April 30, 1902, long after these decrees had been entered. The question thus presented is whether usury is such a matter of defense as the defendant was bound to plead before final decree, and whether these decrees are final so as to bar all matters of defense that were not set up before they were pronounced. For the appellants it is said the right to have usury expunged is a defense exceptional in its nature, and will be indulged by a court of equity under circumstances which would preclude the entertainment of other defenses, and also that these decrees are interlocutory and not final in the true sense of the terms.

Failure to sustain the first proposition would necessarily class this defense with all others. If, to be available in a court of equity, it must be pleaded as promptly as any other defense, and may be lost by failure to so claim the benefit thereof, the position of the appellants cannot be sustained unless the decrees are wanting in finality. There are some cases which are said to show that courts have been indulgent as to this defense. In Ellzey v. Lane's Ex's, 4 Munf. 66, it was allowed after a decree by default foreclosing a mortgage, and after the Supreme Court had reversed a decree allowing a bill of review to be filed. The previous history of the case will be found in 2 Hen. & M. 589, and 4 Hen. & M. 504. Judge Tucker said in 2 Hen. & M. p. 592, that the bill had been taken for confessed and a decree of foreclosure made, but not executed by sale. In 4 Hen. & M. the report of the decision of the superior court of chancery shows that, after the case went back, a scire facias was sued out to revive the suit, the plaintiff having died, and that the defendants set up usury in the contract as a defense on the scire facias, and the chancellor required as a condition to the granting of relief payment by the defendants of the cost on the bill of review, in addition to the payment of the debt with legal interest thereon. The disposition of the appeal from this decree is reported in 4 Munf. p. 68, and shows that the court held it erroneous to impose, as a condition of relief, the payment of the costs on the bill of review, and remanded the cause with directions to receive the plea. Fulton Bank v. Beach, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 429, imports that after a decree by default a case may be reopened for the purpose of allowing the defense of usury to be made. Insurance Co. v. Sackett, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 660, expressly so decides, but says it will not be done except upon the condition that the defendant waives forfeiture of the debt, and only insists upon the defense of usury to the extent of usurious premium paid, or agreed to be paid. But, in all these cases, it is expressly asserted that the applications for relief as to usury came before final decree. In 2 Hen. & M. the court expressly decided that the decree was not final, and for this Judge Tucker cited Fairfax v. Muse's Ex's, 2 Hen. & M. 557, and Bowyer v. Lewis, 1 Hen. & M. 553. His views are best set forth in his own language: "Considering the bill, in the present case, as a bill of review, properly so called, I am of opinion it was prematurely granted. A supplemental bill, in nature of a bill of review, is to be allowed only where new matter has been discovered since the decree. That is not the case here. The decree, not being final, might have been altered upon a rehearing, without the assistance of a bill of review, if there were sufficient matter to reverse it appearing upon the former proceedings." All the judges were of the same opinion. In Ellzey v. Lane's Ex's, 4 Munf. 66, on the second appeal in the case, Judge Roane said: "Although the statement made in the bill may possibly be explained so as to show the transaction not to have been usurious, yet, there being strong reasons from the statement to believe that the matter of the plea in the proceedings mentioned may be true, which defense, where it is probably correct, ought at all times to be received in a court of equity (so long as the case is within the power of that court) without annexing any unreasonable condition thereto (such as that imposed on the offering the plea in this cause), the said decree, as also that of the 20th day of February, 1810, are erroneous."

Just what he meant by saying "so long as the case is within the power of that court" would not be entirely clear without the aid of what the court had formerly held. It had formerly been decided that the decree was not final. He therefore clearly regarded it as an interlocutory decree, not precluding any proper defense which might be made before final decree. In Insurance Co. v. Sackett there had been no decree, but only an order closing the proofs in the case. The status of Fulton Bank v. Beach, at the time the application for leave to examine the witness to prove usury was made, was exactly the same. And in the reasoning of the court upon this application it was said: "The power of the court to allow amendments, in furtherance of justice, at any time before a final decree, is unquestionable. They are always in the discretion of the court; but the exercise of that discretion must be governed by those general principles of equity by which the proceedings in this court are regulated." These cases are no authority for the position that this defense can be made after final decree. On the contrary, they are precedents holding it proper to allow this defense to be interposed after a decree by default, but before final decree, and there is nothing in them to justify the assertion that the defense of usury is, in a court of equity, different from any other defense in respect to the time of its interposition.

As the law was deemed to be when Lane v. Ellzey was decided, these decrees would not have been considered final. But some years after the decision of that case a radical change occurred in the views of the Virginia court respecting the finality of decrees. In Thornton v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh, 209, Judge Tucker's views on that subject, which had previously been adhered to by the court, were departed from. Judges Carr and Brooke adopted a different view and decided the case accordingly, and Judge Tucker dissented. The decree appealed from was upon a bill by the daughter of a testator against a purchaser of his real estate and two sons of a deceased surety of the executor in his executorial bond, and the chancellor decreed that the sons should each pay to the plaintiff one-half of the annuities in arrear and the costs of the suit, reserving liberty to the plaintiff, if the decree should prove unavailing against either, to resort to the court for a further decree against the other, and ordering the cause to be retained in court for the purpose of taking further action as to the annuities to accrue in the future. The executor had sold the real estate, wasted the personal property, and died insolvent. The court held this decree to be final, notwithstanding the reservation in it. Judge Carr said: "It is well known that until 1798 there was no appeal from interlocutory decrees. The prior statutes gave them from final decrees only. These laws did not define what should be taken as final decrees. The phrase was perfectly familiar to every student of the English law, and in the sense there settled it was no doubt used by our Legislature. We may then look to the English cases to ascertain that sense. In England no appeal could be taken except from final decrees. Yet do the books teem with cases where the chancellor having at the hearing decreed upon the matters in controversy, an appeal is immediately taken to the House of Lords, though various details are directed in execution of the decree, the cause retained, and leave given to the parties to apply to the court." Judge Brooke said: "It is the settled principle of this court that, if the whole matter put in controversy by the pleadings is decided, the decree is final, and not interlocutory, although there are reservations embracing matters in execution of the decree, and although there may be a controversy growing out of the execution of it, as in the case of Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh, 108. Nor is it of any consequence whether the whole matter in controversy is decided by the decree, negatively or affirmatively. Whether the errors, if any, are errors of omission or commission, they do not affect the character of the decree." In Ruff v. Stark's Adm'x, 3 Grat. 134, the court held as follows: "A decree which settles all matters in dispute in the cause, but omits to decree upon a claim set up in the bill, but which after circumstances had rendered unimportant, and the plaintiff did not insist upon, is a final decree." In Fleming v. Bolling, 8 Grat. 292, the court held as follows: "A decree which passes upon the whole subject in issue so as to be final in its nature is not converted into an interlocutory decree by the addition thereto of an order suspending the decree as to the amount of an item of the account involved in the cause, until the decision of another suit brought by another party against both the plaintiffs and defendants in the first suit in which the amount of the item is claimed by the plaintiff." In Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689, this court interpreted the decisions above referred to and others, and came to the conclusion that "a bill of review will lie to a decree in a creditor's suit which ascertains the amounts and priorities of all the debts sought to be established in the cause as liens on real estate, and which orders said debts to be paid and the sale of the real estate on which said debts are adjudged to be liens." There were two decrees in that case: one rendered in April, 1877, and another in May, 1880. One question was whether the decree of April, 1877, was final in the sense that a bill of review would lie to it. The decree fixed the amounts and priorities of the debts to be paid, adjudicated the payment of said debts and the cost of the suit, and ordered the real estate to be sold for that purpose, and the court held that it was final in that sense. After quoting our statute relating to appeals, Judge Snyder said: "In such cases it would, therefore, seem that a bill of review would lie as well as an appeal; but it is unnecessary to decide that question in this cause further than the particular decree under consideration requires such decision, and to that extent only is it now intended to intimate an opinion; for certainly there are decrees from which an appeal would lie under the statute to which a bill of review would not lie." The court in that case seems to have fully approved and adopted the definition and rule given in Story's Eq. Pl. § 480a, which reads as follows: "A bill of review also lies only after a final decree; for the court may, if the decree be only interlocutory, afterwards and before a final decree, vary or rescind it. But a decree is final in the sense of the rule, which finally adjudicates upon all the merits of the controversy, and leaves nothing further to be done but the execution of it. Thus, for example, a decree for foreclosure and sale upon a bill brought by a mortgagee for a foreclosure and sale (according to the practice in many states in America), is final and the sale is but in the nature of an execution."

It seems to be the view of counsel for the appellant that a decree is not final as long as anything remains to be done by way of its execution, nor until the whole case is closed in every way and the cause dismissed from the docket. That was the view entertained by Judge Tucker, but which has been long since discarded. The uniform holdings of this court have been that a matter in any cause that is so far settled and determined by a decree as to make it appealable cannot be reviewed or altered by the lower court after the expiration of the term at which it was pronounced, except by a bill of review, for error apparent upon the face of the record, or for newly discovered evidence or matter set up in the bill of review. The statute provides that certain decrees are appealable, and that appeals therefrom must be taken within a certain time. This has been construed by the court as forbidding any alteration of the decree by an appeal after the expiration of the prescribed period. If we had no statute limiting the right of review by bill of review, errors in such decrees could be corrected in the court below by bill of review at any time; but a statute imposes a limit. The object is merely to correct errors. In Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 510, this court held that an appealable decree cannot be altered, even for error apparent after the expiration of the time allowed by the statute for an appeal and for the filing of a bill of review. Point 1 of the syllabus reads as follows: "A decree ordering the sale of a defendant's land is an appealable decree under chapter 135, § 1, subd. 7, of the Code, and therefore no error in such decree can be reviewed, unless the petition for the appeal was presented within five years after such decree was rendered (reduced now to two years by Acts of 1882, p. 506, c. 157. § 3). Even though such decree was not a final decree, and a final decree was subsequently rendered, and an appeal was properly obtained from it, if the error in this final decree arose solely from errors in such, decree of sale followed in the final decree." Core v. Strickler is to the same effect. Upon ascertaining that the decree of April, 1887, in that case was an appealable decree, and such a decree as was cognizable upon a bill of review, the court determined that it was unalterable on appeal, because the time for an appeal had passed and also the time within which a bill of review might have been filed. Numerous other cases decided by this court declare the same principles. There is no exception to this rule. Trail v. Trail (W. Va.) 49 S. E. 431. Any decree which settles the principles of a cause is now appealable. But it must settle all the principles of the cause, leaving nothing to be done, except subsidiary and sequential matters necessary to the full execution of what is thereby decreed. Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. 560; Hill v. Cronin, 56 W. Va. 174, 49 S. E. 132; Shirey v. Musgrave, 29 W. Va. 131, 11 S. E. 914; Hill v. Als, 27 W. Va. 215; Hogg's Eq. Proced. 648. That portion of the seventh clause of section 1 of chapter 135 of the Code which allows an appeal from a decree adjudicating the principles of a cause seems to be little more than a declaration of what the courts had previously held. The purpose of this rule is to prevent frequent and successive appeals in the same case, to the end that delay and confusion may be avoided.

Under these decisions any appealable decree, whether final in all respects or not, is not subject to change after the expiration of the term at which it is entered, except by appeal or bill of review. As to all matters which have been carried into it by the pleadings in the cause, it is as irrevocable and inviolable, except in the manner aforesaid, as if it were the last decree made in the cause, and retiring it from the docket. Trail v. Trail (W. Va.) 49 S. E. 431; Lehman v. Hinton, 44 W. Va. 1, 29 S. E. 984. To be appealable, it must settle all the principles of the cause, all the main controversies therein as above shown. Does this mean only such matters as are shown by the pleadings, or every matter of defense which the nature of the demand asserted called upon the defendant to interpose? Has he a right of election as to the time at which his defenses are to be put in, or must he bring them forward when the cause is in such condition as to enable the plaintiff to call for a decree adjudicating the principles of the cause? If defenses may be withheld until after that time and then put in, and new issues made, the decree would not settle all the principles. It would always be in the power of the parties to reopen the decree by bringing forward new matter by additional pleadings. We have decisions which say this cannot be done. After a case has been made up and submitted, and a decree rendered in it, new pleadings cannot be filed. Building Association v. Westfall (W. Va.) 47 S. E. 74; Butler v. Thompson, 52 W. Va. 311, 43 S. E. 174. A decree rendered upon a bill taken for confessed is not open to any defense. Camden v. Ferrell, 50 W. Va. 119, 40 S. E. 303. If such right of election existed, some cases would be drawn out to almost interminable length. Defenses to a single demand are often numerous, and, if they could be put in singly and successive adjudications taken upon them, great delay, confusion, and cost would result. It would be impossible to obtain a settlement of the principles of a cause by a single decree. There would be trial after trial and appeal after appeal as long as the list of defenses would hold out. No such practice has ever been tolerated by this or any other court. These decrees ascertained the amount of the Mathews debt. For that purpose there had been a reference. Upon that question there had been a special hearing before decree. It was one of the questions expressly decided, and the part of the decree which fixed the amount was the subject of the former appeal in this cause. To say it can be reopened and relitigated would be to ignore and set at defiance numerous decisions of this court. If not final as to that matter, the decree was not appealable. This court entertained an appeal from it, thereby deciding it to be final. Being final, it could not be reopened for new defenses.

The peculiarity and anomalous character of the rights of a debtor, respecting usury in a debt which he owes or usury which he has paid, are relied upon as important in determining the time at which it must be pleaded, and as warranting the reception of that defense after final decree, or until the cause is finally out of court in every way. Usury which has been paid may be recovered. A judgment for an usurious debt may be purged of the usurious interest in it upon a proper application to a court of equity for that purpose. In Snyder v. Construction Co., 52 W. Va. 655, 44 S. E. 250, a doubt was expressed as to whether a judgment in an action at law could be purged of interest in the usurious contract, and Hope v. Smith, 10 Grat. 221, was cited in that connection. That case, however, does not seem to overrule the former cases so holding. It only decides that, after judgment in an action at law, it is too late to set up usury for the purpose of invalidating and defeating the whole judgment, under a statute declaring the whole debt forfeited as a penalty for having made the usurious contract. It does not touch the question whether, upon a proper application, the usurious interest included in the judgment may be eliminated. Assuming that a judgment at law does not preclude such elimination, what effect has that, or the right to recover back usurious interest which has been paid, upon the question now presented? What is the basis of jurisdiction in such cases? Merely the oppression and fraud which are presumed to enter into every usurious transaction. Harper v. Building Association, 55 W. Va. 149, 157, 48 S. E. 817; Building Association v. McKnight, 85 Pa. 472; Moseley v. Brown, 76 Va. 419, 425. For this, equity opens its doors to the borrower, and to unearthen and overthrow the violation of law, and relieve from duress and oppression, it has power to uncover every shift, device, and scheme adopted by the parties for covering it up, including judgments of the law courts, suffered or acquired. Relief in equity as to the interest in excess of the legal rate is an independent right, not lost or waived by failure to plead it at law. But when the parties are in the equity court, the forum in which such right must be asserted, when not interposed at law, the forum which has power to enforce discovery, give full relief and adequately protect the borrower, is there any excuse for longer withholding his defense? It is not perceived how these exceptions can have any bearing upon this question. The appellant has allowed a decree to be entered in a court of equity without having set up this defense. By the pleadings in the cause and presentation of the Mathews debt, an opportunity was given him to make defense. He was called upon to produce and insist upon any matters of defense which he had. The usurious character of the contract was apparent on the very face of the papers. The note provided for the payment of 10 per cent. interest, payable annually. The proof was already in the record, and it was only necessary for him to say he desired the usury to be cut out. He did not do so. Instead of doing so, he asked that the debt be reported with legal interest, but the commissioner reported it with the interest stipulated for in the contract, together with an alternative statement of it with legal interest. To his action no exception was taken. This court said he did not rely upon usury as a defense, because he had neither pleaded it nor excepted to the commissioner's report which audited the claim against him at 10 per cent. Judge Johnson, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "If he had, in this instance, wished the defense interposed after the alternative statement had been made by the commissioner, and the commissioner ignored it, and reported the debt at 10 per cent., because, as he supposed, the defense of usury was not in, then, certainly, he would have excepted to the report on the ground of usury, and because the commissioner did not adopt the alternative statement. He clearly did not intend to do this, as he excepted to the report on other grounds, and not on this. There is nothing here that approaches an exception to the commissioner's report on the ground of usury." Not having then elected not to pay it, nor since, until after another decree under the mandate of this court, can he still elect to do so? Though usurious interest which has been paid can be cut out, does this argue that a final decree made after an opportunity to set up the defense in that forum in which it is looked upon most favorably may be reopened for its reception? True it is only a matter of election, but, so is the statute of limitation and the statute of frauds, where the proof appears in the record, as it does in many cases, but the benefit of these statutes must be claimed in some form. It is not enough that the court may see that the party can make them available. He must move in the matter. These defenses may be less meritorious than that of usury. It is a hardship to apply the statute of limitations or the statute of frauds against an honest demand; but it is not, in the eye of a court of equity, a hardship to compel the usurer to relinquish what the law does not allow him. Yet, must not all meritorious defenses be asserted when the status of the case is such as calls for an election as to whether the party will or will not claim the benefit thereof? There is no authority for the position that the defense of usury stands, in this respect, different from any other defense, and the reason or ground of jurisdiction to relieve from usury is, as above shown, the same as underlies its jurisdiction in all cases of fraud, illegality, and duress.

Having thus reached the conclusion that usury, as a defense, is not distinguishable from others in respect to the time at which it must be made in a court of equity, it follows that the decisions in Lehman v. Hinton, 44 W. Va. 1, 29 S. E. 984, and Snyder v. Construction Co., 52 W. Va. 635, 44 S. E. 250, holding it barred by a decree fixing the amount of the debt, are sound and must be approved and followed in this case. The defense of usury, therefore, is barred by the decree of this court on the former appeal, remanding the cause with directions to enter a particular decree, as well as by the later decrees made by the circuit court pursuant to the mandate of this court.

The descriptive clause of the Mathews deed of trust, which must be construed in determining whether a certain tract of land containing 625 acres is included, reads as follows: "Also one other tract containing five hundred acres lying on the waters of Campbell's creek; also one other tract containing about three hundred and fifty acres, lying near Kelley's creek, and adjoining the lands of H. P. Tompkins, the last two tracts being parts of the John Steele survey of twenty-seven thousand acres (27,000) and assigned to Wm. H. Tompkins in the partition deed of said 27,000-acre survey, reference being had to said partition deed recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Kanawha county for a more particular description of said tracts." When a deed in describing the land conveyed refers to another deed or map for further description, such other deed or map is considered as incorporated in the deed. Snooks v. Wingfield, 52 W. Va. 441, 44 S. E. 277; 2 Dev. Deeds, § 1020; Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 207; Carpenter v. Millard, 38 Vt. 9; Bank v. Steward, 93 Va. 447, 25 S. E. 543. The partition thus made part of the trust deed shows three lots were assigned to Wm. H. Tompkins out of the John Steele survey, one on Campbell's creek containing 500 acres, called lot P, one containing 1,675 acres, called lot E, but not described as lying on Kelley's creek; and one containing 2,280 acres called lot V, but not described as lying on Kelley's creek, though said creek is mentioned in one of the calls in connection with a monument. In both lot E and lot V, mention is made of Witchers' creek. Neither of these lots is there described as adjoining the lands of H. P. Tompkins; but they adjoin each other.

Extraneous evidence in the record discloses the following facts: Wm. H. Tompkins in 1881 applied to Mr. Alexander F. Mathews for a loan, and agreed to give a deed of trust on his lands. Here there seems to be some dispute; Mr. Mathews claiming that Tompkins was to give a trust deed on all of his lands and Mr. Tompkins denying this, saying that nothing was said as to all of his lands. At any rate, Mr. Tompkins took to Mr. Mathews from W. A. Quarrier a statement which purported to show the lands owned by Mr. Tompkins in Kanawha county, and among others was a tract of 350 acres on Kelley's creek. Mr. Mathews made the loan and Tompkins executed the deed of trust. (Mr. Quarrier, at the time, in the statement he made, said that Mr. Tompkins' title to the tract of land he knew to be good.) There had been assigned to Tompkins out of the Steel survey prior to this two tracts of land, one of 1,675 acres, lot E, and one of 2,280 acres, lot V, that these lots adjoined, and that Tompkins' interest in the Steel survey was put in two lots, because the boundaries of the Steel survey were in dispute. In other words, there were 1,675 acres, the title of which was known to be good, as the location of the Steel line did not affect this, and 2,280 acres was in dispute; it being uncertain whether Tompkins would get any part of this 2,280 acres or not when the Steel line was properly located. After this was so assigned to Tompkins, and before the trust deed was made, Tompkins sold and conveyed about 1,500 acres of lot E to Mr. Bowers; thus leaving Tompkins, at the time the trust deed was made, the residue of lot E, after taking out what he had sold Bowers and all of lot V. After he had sold part of lot E to Bowers, and before the trust deed was made, to wit, in 1877, Tompkins had Sylvester Chapman, surveyor, to run off and survey the lands that he had remaining in lot E, which had not been sold by him to Bowers, and Chapman found by an actual survey that he, Tompkins, still owned of lot E 349 acres. The survey made by Chapman of this 349 acres is filed with Tompkins' affidavit. This 349 acres was all the land that Tompkins knew he owned lying on Kelley's creek in 1881, the time of the execution of the trust deed. After the execution of the trust deed, in the year 1888 or 1889, the line of the Steel survey was settled, and it was then ascertained that Tompkins out of lot V got, instead of 2,280 acres, 625 acres of land, which adjoined the 349 acres that had been surveyed by Chapman. Both lot E and lot V are on or near Kelley's creek and adjoin the lands of H. P. Tompkins.

By the aid of this evidence the circuit court reached the conclusion that the clause of the trust deed in question covers only the 349-acre tract, constituting the residue of lot E, and does not include the 625-acre tract, saved by Mr. Tompkins out of lot V. Mr. Jos. E. Chilton, acting as special judge, passed upon the question, and in so doing delivered an opinion which he reduced to writing, and which reads, in part, as follows: "In determining this question, the following principles for the construction of the deed must be recognized and applied: First. 'The deed is to be construed with reference to the actual state of the property at the time of its execution and the law assumes that the parties refer to this for a definition of the terms made use of in their deed.' Amer. Enc. of Law, vol. 4, p. 79; Richardson v. City of Cambridge, 79 Am. Dec. 767. Second. 'The description will be construed, if possible, so that no part of it will be rejected or rendered inoperative.' Amer. Enc. of Law, p. 798. Third. 'If there is any land wherein some of the demonstrations are true and some false, only those lands shall pass wherein the demonstrations are true, or, in other words, where the grantor in a deed owns lands which comply with all the particulars of the description, the deed passes title to those lands only, although it may appear that the grantor intended other premises to pass also, which were included within only a part of the description.' Amer. Enc. of Law, vol. 4, p. 794. Fourth. 'In describing land, quantity controls where other parts of the description are not sufficiently certain in defining the parcel of land intended to be conveyed.' Amer. Enc. of Law, vol. 4, p. 794. The actual condition of the property at the time the trust deed was made was that Tompkins had a tract of about 350 acres lying on Kelley's creek, which was shown by the Chapman survey in 1877, to which he then knew he had good title, and that to the 625 acres which he nows owns he did not at the time know that his title was good. Must we not then believe that in drafting this trust deed the draftsman, whoever he was, had in mind some tract of land of about 350 acres and intended to cover only this tract? Can we believe that the draftsman referred to the 2,280-acre tract as a 350-acre tract, or even a 975-acre tract as about 350 acres? The actual condition of the property at the time the trust deed was made shows that the lands to which Tompkins had title then corresponds in acreage and description exactly with the tract of land mentioned in the trust deed. If we take every part of this description, the acreage, the location, and give every part its due weight, and treat the property as it then actually was, have we not a fixed tract of land that must have been contemplated in this trust deed, to wit, 349 acres as surveyed by Chapman and shown by the Chapman survey. To disregard this call for acreage and say that it was a mere guess, and that this call referred to Tompkins' entire holdings on Kelley's creek, which were then as liable to be 3,000 acres as it turned out afterwards to be 975 acres, would be to disregard a part of the description which corresponds with the condition of the land as it then actually existed. You will also have to render inoperative the call for acreage as given, and presume that the draftsman of the trust deed had no knowledge whatever of the condition of the property, and meant the number of acres as in no way descriptive of the property contained in the trust deed. When you apply the law to the undisputed facts in the case, it does not seem that there can be any question as to what tract of land was in the mind of the draftsman of the trust deed. The acreage that he gives corresponds with the only tract of land that Tompkins then knew he owned, and acreage controls where other parts of the description are insufficient to determine the parcel of land intended to be conveyed. It is not seen how this call in the trust deed can be extended so as to include any other than the 350 acres. The circumstances under which the deed was made and the condition of the property at that time, if any effect is to be given to the terms in the description, must fix this description to this tract of land, to wit, a tract of about 350 acres, situate on Kelley's creek, adjoining the lands of H. P. Tompkins, and which was assigned to him out of the Steel survey. The boundary of this tract of land was well known. It had been surveyed. Under what rule of law or what authority can you disregard this call of acreage, and say that the draftsman of the deed had any other land in view? It must be remembered in construing this call in the trust deed we are not determining what Mr. Tompkins would have done had Mr. Mathews known all the facts about these lands. The question is not whether Tompkins would have included such land as he might have owned in lot V in the trust deed had Mathews known about his claim and demanded it, but it is, 'did he so include it at the time the trust deed was executed?' And in looking at the call of the trust deed, in view of the actual condition of the property at that time, we must find that to include any land outside of the 350 acres would be to disregard the very terms of the trust deed and would be taking parol evidence to contradict the very terms of the deed, instead of to explain it."

The strongest criticism made upon this position is that, so construed, the deed becomes void for uncertainty, unless saved by the adjudications of its validity already made, and courts will never so construe a deed if such result can be avoided. In this view we do not concur. Under the descriptions of two tracts, containing, respectively, 500 acres and 350 acres, assigned by partition out of the Steel survey, the partition deed is referred to for greater particularity of description. Reference to it discloses that there were three such tracts, not two. One of them corresponds with the 500-acre tract mentioned in the deed of trust in all respects. The position of counsel for appellee would make the other two pass under a call for one tract, because the trust deed says the land thereby conveyed had been assigned out of the John Steel survey. It does not say it conveys all the land so assigned. It does not describe the 350-acre tract by metes and bounds, nor, by the reference made, does it furnish means of description of any such tract otherwise than by the acreage thereof, and the location, namely, "near Kelley's creek and adjoining the lands of H. P. Tompkins." As the description by metes and bounds, found in the partition deed, when read into the trust deed, furnishes means of identifying two tracts, instead of one, thereby conflicting with antecedent terms of the trust deed, a doubt is created as to what the exact intention was, though the intent to pass something out of the land assigned from the Steel survey, and lying near Kelley's creek, is clearly and unequivocally disclosed. If there were nothing in the deed by which this doubt could be resolved and reasonable certainty attained, without saying the whole of the land so assigned, both of these tracts, as well as the 500-acre tract, should pass, we might hold, under two rules of construction, "Ut res magis valeat quam pereat," that the thing shall avail rather than perish, and, in case of doubt, a deed shall be taken most strongly against the grantor that all the land assigned passed. But there is descriptive language by which a thing corresponding to it perfectly can be found—the description by quantity and location. Mr. Tompkins owned just such a tract as is described thereby, and all the other descriptive language used relates to it. All the language of a deed shall have some effect, if possible, but every word and clause need not, and cannot, have effect according to its literal terms, if contrary to the intent plainly disclosed by the instrument viewed as a whole. A deed is not void for uncertainty, if, from the description given in it, the property can be located. This deed clearly grants a 350-acre tract near Kelley's creek, and adjoining the lands of

H. P. Tompkins, if the grantor owned such a tract, unless the description by quantity must be rejected. Usually it does not control a description by metes and bounds; but sometimes it does. When? "When the other terms of the description are not sufficiently certain, the number of acres specified may be an essential part of the description." Dev. Deeds, § 1045. "Where the description of tracts of land by monuments, distances, or otherwise, is vague and indefinite, by reason of conflicting lines, or by the omission of a line, or from any other cause, a statement of the acreage is an essential part of the description." Hostetter v. Railway Co., 108 Cal. 38, 41 Pac. 330. In the case just quoted from, and others therein referred to, the principle was applied in locating a disputed boundary line. But it would seem to be more clearly applicable when the question is the identity of the land granted, and the quantity, with other descriptive matter, points unerringly to a particular tract. The question here is not whether anything passes, but what passes, under this deed. Under either construction contended for, there is no lack of certainty, and the controversy is simply as to which construction shall prevail. All authority answers: "That one which accords with the manifest intention of the parties as gathered from the whole instrument." "Where a deed contains a particular description of the property, the fact that it contains a statement that the granted premises are the same that were conveyed to the grantor by a certain deed does not render it conclusive that it was the intention of the grantor to convey all of the premises included in the latter deed." 13 Cyc. 633. This deed does not say the same land that was assigned nor all that was assigned. After a careful examination of the opinion filed by the special judge, above referred to, and the authorities, we are convinced of the correctness of his conclusion as to this point.

But it is urged that this conclusion is precluded by the conduct of the appellant. In our judgment Judge Chilton's opinion conclusively answers this contention also. He says: "The only action of Tompkins referred to is his sending a map to Mr. Mathews with 900 marked on it. Mr. Mathews understood this 900 to include the lands owned by Tompkins on Kelley's creek. It must be remembered that this map was sent to Mr. Mathews some 10 or 15 years ago. At that time the Steel survey was settled, and Mr. Tompkins knew what lands he owned; and for many reasons, as can be seen, Mr. Tompkins may have then told Mr. Mathews that he owned 900 acres on Kelley's creek, without meaning to say to him his trust deed embraced them all. It is claimed, further, that the action of Mr. Tompkins in not raising the question earlier in this suit shows that he construed the trust to cover all of his Kelley's creek land. This position is not tenable from the fact that at no time in this suit has the question as to the lands involved in this deed of trust been raised so as to call on Mr. Tompkins to give his understanding of the trust deed. The only question raised in reference to the lands in the suit has been the different views taken by the special commissioners as to what was embraced in the trust deed. Without going into the several advertisements showing the views of the different special commissioners, it is sufficient to say that they have all differed, and the different opinions of the several special commissioners appointed to make the sale, whether such opinions were arrived at hurriedly or after consideration, are sufficient to show that there has always been a question as to what lands the trust deed embraced, and that this has been an unsettled question. The views of the different special commissioners, had they all agreed on one point, might be advisory as showing what they thought of this trust deed, but it certainly could not bind any party interested in the case to a construction of the trust deed. It is true that in several affidavits filed by Mr. Tompkins he refers to the Kelley's creek land as one tract of about 900 acres, but all these affidavits were after the Steel survey was settled, and Tompkins then regarded his Kelley's creek land as one tract, and the object of these affidavits was to set aside a sale which would of necessity embrace all his lands, whether included in the trust deed or not. What reason then could there be in making these affidavits to separate the lands embraced in the trust deed from the others? I cannot see how affidavits made at the time and for the purpose as were those made by Mr. Tompkins could in fairness to him be treated as in any way throwing any light on the lands that he regarded as embraced in the trust deed. The only paper filed in the case that recites the lands embraced in the trust deed is a bill prepared by Bowers for an injunction. This bill is made an exhibit with a petition filed in the case of Bowers. The object of this petition is to modify the decree of sale formerly made, so that a tract of 105 acres of land that had been sold Bowers by Tompkins would not be sold until after the other lands had been sold. I think it will be seen that, so far as affects the prayer of this petition of Bowers, it was immaterial whether the statement in the exhibit filed with said petition, that the 920 acres on Kelley's creek was described in the trust deed as a tract of 350 acres, etc., was true or not. Whether this was true or false, Bowers, it would seem, was entitled to the prayer of his petition. Then why would any one be called to deny these allegations, even though they were not true?"

Appellant Wm. H. Tompkins further complains of the refusal of the court to refer the cause to a commissioner to ascertain whether the rents and profits of the land will discharge the liens thereon within five years.

He has had the benefit of one such reference and an adverse finding, but that occurred many years ago, and a great change in the value of the property has since taken place. This grows largely out of the development of the property under the mining lease, given upon part of it by consent of all parties to this cause. Of course, there has been a large appreciation in the value of all lands in the community, but the fact principally relied upon as ground for this request is the development of the property under the lease. The order confirming the lease contains the following adjudications: "And by like consent it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the entering of this decree shall not prejudice or affect the rights of the creditors of the defendant Wm. H. Tompkins to ask for a sale or sales in the above-entitled cause for the satisfaction of their respective debts, but whenever the real estate of the said defendant Wm. H. Tompkins embraced in said lease is decreed to be sold, if the lease thereof by this decree authorized to be made is in existence and unforfeited such sale or sales shall be made subject thereto. And by and with like consent it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the entering of this decree shall not disturb or in any wise affect the present position, standing or priority of any of the creditors of any of the defendants in the above-entitled cause, nor shall such decree operate to release any surety upon any debt sought to be collected in said suit, or in any wise prejudice or affect the present rights of creditors against any defendants in said suit whether as principals or sureties either in said suit or in any other proceedings now pending or hereafter brought." This was subsequent to the decree of sale. Nothing remained to be done, so far as any person then knew, but the execution thereof, by the commissioners appointed for the purpose, at the request of the creditors. We regard the consent of the appellant, above expressed and adjudicated, as conclusive upon any right which he might otherwise have had to invoke any discretionary power which the court has, if any, to further delay the sale for his benefit.

It is also urged that the court erred, in the decree of sale, in clothing the commissioners with authority to make a private sale of the lands with the consent of the appellant Wm. H. Tompkins. H. P. Tompkins, whose consent to such sale is not required by the decree, also assigns this as ground of error. As the decree was made several years ago, and the time within which it might have been appealed from has long since passed, no relief could now be afforded, if we were convinced of the existence of error in that respect. As hereinbefore shown, the decree was, as to such matter, final and unalterable, except by appeal or bill of review, within the time allowed for such proceedings.

There being no error in the decree, it must be affirmed.

BRANNON, P. (concurring). I am satisfied with the decision, except that I am inclined to think that the deed of trust of Mathews covers the 920 acres, all the balance of the land of Tompkins assigned to the defendant, except the 500 acres. It does not cover merely the 350 acres, but 920 acres. I express no opinion as to whether a judgment can be relieved against by equity for usury, where the usury appears on the note or was known before judgment, and no discovery was needed.

CRAWFORD'S ADM'R v. TURNER'S ADM'R et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1906.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—DEBTS OF DECEDENT—LIABILITY OF HEIRS.

There is no personal liability upon an heir for the debts of his ancestor; but by section 3 of chapter 86, Code 1899, all real estate of any person as to which he may die intestate is made assets for the payment of his debts and all lawful demands against his estate in the order in which the personal estate of a decedent is directed to be applied.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Descent and Distribution, §§ 433-439.]

2. SAME—PERSONAL LIABILITY OF HEIR.

But while the heir is not personally liable for the debts of his ancestor, yet if real estate descend to him from his ancestor, and he sells and conveys the same, he then becomes personally liable to the creditors of his ancestor for the value of the real estate so descended.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTION AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—JURISDICTION IN EQUITY.

Equity has no jurisdiction to entertain a bill on behalf of a general creditor of a deceased person to enforce a purely legal demand, unless it is shown that the creditor has exhausted his legal remedy, or that such remedy, for some sufficient cause, would be inadequate or unavailing.

4. SAME—PAYMENT OF DEBTS—SUIT BY CREDITOR—PARTIES—PLEADING.

Where a bill in equity is filed by a general creditor against the administrator and heirs of a deceased person, which does not seek to charge the real estate of which the intestate died seised and to subject the same to the payment of his debts, it is bad on demurrer, if it fails to show that there are assets in the hands of the administrator to be administered; and if such bill is filed to subject the real estate of such decedent, it must be upon behalf of the plaintiff and all other creditors, and it must appear that the personal property is insufficient to pay the debts.

5. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—SUIT AGAINST HEIRS.

An heir may be sued in equity by any creditor to whom a debt is due, for which the estate descended is liable, or for which the heir is liable in respect to such estate; and no action at law can be maintained against such heir for any matter for which there may be redress by such suit in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Descent and Distribution, § 405.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County.

Bill by David Crawford's administrator against William F. Turner's administrator and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant Albert F. Davis appeals. Reversed.

Trapnell & McDonald, for appellant. Forrest W. Brown, for appellee.

SANDERS, J. David Crawford died many years ago in the county of Prince George, Md., unmarried, without lawful issue, and (it was supposed at the time) intestate. After his death his personal estate was distributed among his nearest of kin, one of whom was William F. Turner, a resident of Jefferson county in this state. Before the administration of Crawford's estate had been completed Turner died, and the remainder of his distributive share was paid to his administrator. Some years after the death of Crawford, and after the distribution of his estate, his will, bearing date October 25, 1859, was discovered, and probated in the orphans' court of Prince George county, Md., on the 16th of August, 1861. Authenticated copies of the will were recorded in the county of Clarke, Va., on the 12th day of December, 1881, and in Jefferson county, this state, on the 20th of October, 1886, on which last-named date J. Garland Hurst, sheriff of Jefferson county, qualified as administrator with the will annexed of David Crawford, deceased. Turner was not one of the beneficiaries under the will of Crawford, and in October, 1886, the administrator of Crawford filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Jefferson county against the administrator and heirs of Turner and others to recover the value of certain slaves and moneys, which he (Turner), in his lifetime, and his administrator after his death, had received from Crawford's estate under the supposition that he was one of Crawford's distributees.

There are many reasons assigned why the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, but it will only be necessary to review the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the bill. The bill charges that Turner died intestate, and that his heirs at law are two daughters, Ellen Blerne, wife of John S. Saunders, and Sydney Turner, wife of Daniel Swan, to whom descended from their father real estate of greater value than the claim sought to be recovered; and it also charges that Ellen Blerne Saunders has property and estate in Jefferson county, consisting of a valuable tract of land. Since the institution of this suit Ellen Blerne Saunders died testate, and by supplemental bill her devisees, being her four children, are made parties. And, also, during the pendency of the suit, Nathan S. White, administrator of Turner, departed this life, and Joseph Trapnell qualified as his administrator with the will annexed, and Albert S. Davis, sheriff of Jefferson county, was appointed administrator d. b. n. of Wm. F. Turner, deceased, and by another supplemental bill they were brought before the court. While the bill alleges that real estate descended from Turner to his heirs, yet it does not state that this real estate which descended is the land sought to be subjected in this suit, and it does not show where the real estate is situated—whether in the county in which the suit is brought or not—or, if disposed of, what disposition was made of it. It is true it is averred that Ellen Blerne Saunders is the owner of a tract of land situated in Jefferson county, but it nowhere appears how she became the owner of this land—whether by inheritance from her father or otherwise. The real estate of any person who dies intestate, by section 3, c. 86, Code 1899, is made assets for the payment of the decedent's debts, and by section 5, c. 86, Code 1899, the heir is only made liable to the extent of assets descended, and liable to be subjected to discharge the ancestral obligations, and only then is such heir liable when he has sold the estate. If the assets remain in kind unsold, there is no liability upon the heir, but the assets are liable to subjection. Is the property which the bill says descended from Turner to his heirs still held by them? If so, it must be subjected, and there is no liability upon the heirs, and if not, and it has been sold by the heirs, the bill must so charge before liability can be fixed upon them. The property of the heirs of Ellen Blerne Saunders, situated in Jefferson county, certainly, under the allegations of the bill, cannot be subjected to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, because it does not appear that this is the land that descended, or that the real estate which did descend to them has been sold or disposed of; and therefore it fails to charge a liability upon the heirs. Section 6, c. 86, Code 1899, provides that an heir or devisee may be sued in equity by any creditor to whom a debt is due, for which the estate descended or devised is liable, or for which the heir or devisee is liable, in respect to such estate. It will therefore be observed, if the estate descended or devised is liable to be charged with a debt, the heirs or devisees may be sued in equity, and the particular estate subjected to satisfy the same; but, if the estate has been sold by the heir or devisee, then such heir or devisee is liable in respect to such estate to the extent and value of the estate inherited or devised.

This bill not being maintainable to subject the land of the heirs in Jefferson county for the reasons given, then can it be maintained as a bill of a creditor against the administrator of the estate of Turner? This must be answered in the negative upon the authority of Hale v. White et al., 47 W. Va. 700, 35 S. E. 884: "A general creditor of a deceased person cannot sustain a bill in equity on a purely legal demand, unless he shows that he has exhausted his legal remedy, or that such remedy, for some good cause, would be inadequate or unavailing." Not only is this so, but the bill makes no charge against the administrator, and only asks, in the prayer, for a settlement of his administration accounts. It is not claimed that the administrator has any funds in his hands whatever out of which the plaintiff's debt could be paid, nor is the bill filed under section 7, c. 86, Code 1899, where it is provided that, if the personal estate is insufficient for the payment of the debts of the decedent, a creditor may institute and prosecute a suit on behalf of himself and the other creditors. The bill is not filed on behalf of the plaintiff and the other creditors. It does not charge that the personal estate is insufficient to pay the debts. In short, it says nothing in reference thereto—whether there is, or is not, such estate—and it does not seek to sell real estate of which Turner died seised. But, as has been noted, the bill does aver that real estate descended from Turner to his heirs, but it does not seek to charge and sell this land so descended, but the prayer is to sell the land of the heirs of Ellen Blerne Saunders. In Hale v. White, supra, the remedies of the creditor of a deceased person are given as follows: "(1) An action at law against the personal representative. Section 19, c. 85, Code 1899. (2) A separate bill in chancery to compel payment of his individual debt out of the funds in the hands of the personal representative, and discover the funds or estate liable to the payment thereof. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 99-102; 2 Tuck. Bl. Com. 425; White v. Bannister's Ex'rs, 1 Wash. (Va.) 168; Duval's Ex'r v. Trent's Devisees, 6 Munf. 29; Clarke v. Webb, 2 Hen. & M. 8. (3) A bill in behalf of himself and other creditors to ascertain and distribute both the real and personal estate. This is subject to the right of the personal representative to bring such suit within six months from his qualification. Section 7, c. 86, Code 1899. (4) A bill against an heir or devisee because of assets by descent. Section 6, c. 86, Id." It suffices to say that the plaintiff's bill does not come within either of the above classifications. The circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer.

We therefore reverse the decrees complained of, and remand the cause, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his bill, if he so desire.

DUDLEY v. CHICAGO, M. & ST. P. RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1906.)

1. CARRIERS—FREIGHT—WRONGFUL DELIVERY—CONVERSION.

An inspection of property shipped by a common carrier in sealed cars, unauthorizedly permitted by such carrier at the point of destination, in consequence of which the consignor, who was also the consignee, was prevented from consummating a contemplated sale thereof, does not amount to a wrongful delivery by the common carrier, so as to make it liable for the value of the property as for a conversion thereof.

2. SAME—ABANDONMENT BY OWNER—SALE BY CARRIER.

If, in such case, the property is perishable and decaying, and the owner, upon being notified of the danger of its loss, relying upon the unauthorized inspection as constituting a conversion, gives notice of his abandonment of the property and intention to claim the value thereof, the carrier may sell the same on account of the owner, deduct his charges from the proceeds of sale, and will be liable for the balance thereof only.

3. ATTACHMENT—DISSOLUTION—RELEASE OF BOND.

When, in a suit against a foreign corporation, in which its property has been attached and afterwards released by the giving of a bond, pursuant to statutory provisions, the defendant appears and makes defense, and a personal decree is rendered against it for an amount which it has previously tendered on account of the demand set up in the bill, but not paid into court, it is error to dismiss the attachment and decree a release of the bond.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by Lysander Dudley against the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company and others. From the decree, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part.

V. B. Archer and Wm. Beard, for appellant. John F. Hutchinson, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. Lysander Dudley has appealed from a decree of the circuit court of Wood county, in a suit instituted by him against the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, because it allows him a smaller amount than he claimed, and, although decreeing the payment of money to him, discharged the attachment and released the bond given for the forthcoming of the attached property, certain railroad cars seized at Wheeling and Huntington.

The bill sought a decree for the value of two car loads of apples, shipped by the plaintiff over the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway and connecting lines to Elgin, Ill., and consigned to the plaintiff himself, with directions to notify J. W. Sharp, of Chicago, Ill., of the arrival of the cars at their destination. Expecting Sharp to accept and pay for the apples, plaintiff had made drafts upon him for their value as per contract, attached the bills of lading to them, and discounted them at the First National Bank of Parkersburg, and said bank caused them, in due course of business, to be presented for payment at the office of Sharp. Upon notice of the arrival of the cars, Sharp's agent was allowed to inspect the apples, without producing the bills of lading or showing any title or right to the possession of them. Sharp had not then paid the drafts, nor did he afterwards do so. His agent reported that the apples were not such as the plaintiff had agreed to deliver. He immediately notified Dudley, and, presumably, the railway company also, for very soon afterwards the agent of the company notified Dudley by telegraph of Sharp's refusal, and called upon him to arrange for disposition of the apples, and continued by subsequent dispatches, from October 24, 1890, until November 3, 1890, to demand that he take care of them. Notice of the intention of the railway company to have them sold was given October 28th. The last telegram, dated November 3d, notified him that the apples were rotting on the track, and closed with the inquiry, "Shall we sell for your account?" To this Dudley replied as follows: "Have made claim against Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad for full value of cars. They were wrongfully delivered. If you sell, it will be as agent of the company and for its benefit." After a futile attempt to sell the apples at Elgin, the railroad company shipped them to Chicago, where they were sold for the sum of $397.93, which, after deducting freight charges of $144.84, paid, except as to its own, by the defendant, upon the guaranty of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Company, left $253.09, which was tendered to the plaintiff, but refused by him, because he claimed a larger amount.

The theory of his claim, then presented, afterwards asserted by this suit, and now urged here as one ground of error in the decree, is that the conduct of the defendant railway company amounted in law to a conversion of the apples to its own use. The argument to sustain this position treats the inspection allowed to Sharp's agent as an unauthorized delivery of the property to him. That a common carrier is liable for a wrongful delivery, if in any way at fault, is perfectly clear. Such act may be treated as a conversion. Common carriers are bound to exercise the highest degree of care in this respect. "No circumstances of fraud, imposition, or mistake will excuse the common carrier from responsibility for a delivery to the wrong person." Hutchinson on Carriers, § 344. To the same general effect, see North Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Commercial Bank, 123 U. S. 727, 8 Sup. Ct. 266, 31 L. Ed. 287, and Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Hernon, 81 Ill. 143, cited by counsel for appellant. Of course, this general rule, like all others, may be subject to some slight apparent exceptions, which need not be noticed here. But, if there was no delivery, the rule of law relied upon has no application. The property was never out of the possession of the defendant until sold, or removed for sale, some time after the inspection. Sharp's agent was simply permitted to enter the cars, set barrels out in his wagon, open them, and examine the apples. Then they were put back in the car and it was resealed by the agent. It may be true that he had no right to do so, and that the defendant did wrong in permitting the inspection, no evidence of title or right to possession having been shown; but it is a non sequitur to say, upon these facts, there was a delivery. It may have been an unauthorized act of dominion over the property; but whose act was it? Clearly that of the railroad company, for the property was still in its actual and legal custody. It never parted with its possession. Not every wrongful act on the part of a common carrier authorizes an action against it as for a conversion. Where goods intrusted to a common carrier are injured only, the owner's remedy is for damages for the injury, not their value. Hutch. Com. Car. § 770a. For delay in delivery the action must be for damages resulting, not the value of the property. Hutch. Com. Car. § 328; Ryland & Rankin v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 55 W. Va. 181, 46 S. E. 923. What is the nature of the plaintiff's injury here? Inspection did not injure the property, so far as disclosed. It prevented the consummation of a sale to Sharp. Can that constitute the basis of an action for the value of the property? That it could not is so obvious that no such claim is made, and this branch of the contention is founded upon the extremely fanciful theory of a technical delivery, for which no authority has been found.

Claim for the value of the property as for a conversion thereof is also predicated upon the sale of it. Whether sale could have been made for the charges for carriage, without a judicial proceeding by way of enforcement of the lien, seems not to have been raised. That depends upon whether there is an Illinois statute authorizing such sale. But, it is said, the sale could not be made therefor in this instance, because the Baltimore & Ohio, Southwestern Railway Company had guaranteed the charges. But if that agreement was a mere guaranty, and not an absolute undertaking to pay, it was the duty of the defendant company to collect its charges on the delivery of the property. If by due diligence it could not do so, it might fall back upon the guaranty. However this may be, there was a clear and undoubted right of sale in the defendant upon another ground. The property was perishable, and was then decaying and becoming less valuable every day. The owner, having failed in the effort to make sale of the apples as he expected, neglected to take them out of the possession of the company and take care of them. More than that, his telegram of November 3, 1899, could be construed as nothing more nor less than a notification that he would treat the apples as the property of the railroad company, sue for their value, and leave them in the hands of the company. This he had no right to do, as has been shown. What could the defendant do under the circumstances? Could it allow the property to decay? Perhaps it was under no duty to protect the plaintiff from a loss of his own making. This we do not decide; but a clear and undoubted right it did have to sell the property under such circumstances, and, after deducting its charges, pay the residue of the proceeds to the owner. It was still the custodian of the plaintiff's property, and bound, as such, to do whatever was necessary to mitigate and prevent, as far as possible, the natural loss incident to the decay of the fruit. "Where the goods are of a perishable character and the consignee will not accept them, or there are other reasons requiring a sale without delay, the carrier may be justified in selling the goods because of the necessity of the particular case." Elliott, R. R. § 1571. "But, while in the possession of the goods in the character of carrier, he also stands for many purposes in the relation of agent for the owner; and it is a general rule of law that although the powers of agents are ordinarily limited to the purposes for which they are employed, yet that emergencies may arise in which, from the necessities of the case, an agent may be justified in assuming extraordinary powers, and that his acts, done fairly and in good faith under such circumstances, though entirely beyond the scope of his ordinary powers, may be binding upon his principal. Such emergencies sometimes occur, in the course of the business of the carrier, in which he becomes the agent of all concerned, and in which his acts, in the exercise of a sound discretion, will be binding upon all the parties in interest; and if the necessities of the case require that the goods be sold, he not only may sell, but it becomes obligatory upon him to do so, for the benefit of the owner. If, for instance, the consignee refuse to accept the goods and they are of a perishable character, and if stored would, from rapid decay, be totally lost to the owner, it would be the duty of the carrier to sell them on his account; and the same rule would apply if, from any cause, it became impossible to deliver the goods according to the directions of the owner or bailor, or to return them before they would inevitably perish from such inherent tendency, from damage received by them in the transit, or from any other cause." Hutchinson on Carriers, § 432. If, as to the property so left on its hands, the railway company is to be regarded as a warehouseman, its right to sell the same to prevent loss by the decay thereof is equally clear. Any kind of imminent danger of loss or destruction will justify a sale in such case. Rea's Adm'x v. Trotter, 28 Grat. 585; Jordan v. Shireman, 28 Ind. 136.

The court erred, however, in discharging the attachment and declaring the bond released. Upon what theory this was done is not apparent, unless it was that the defendant had not only submitted itself to a personal decree by appearing and defending, but had also tendered the amount of the decree, except the interest, before suit was brought. No money was paid into court. The effect of a tender, when kept good, only prevents recovery of interest and costs. It does not pay the debt nor extinguish it. The defendant is a foreign corporation, against which the plaintiff had the right to proceed by attachment, for the sole reason that it is such a corporation. The bond taken under the attachment afforded security for the payment of the amount of the decree, either absolutely or to the extent of the value of the property attached. It was a security regularly and properly obtained, so far as this record discloses. That the defendant is amply able to pay several thousand times the amount of the decree constitutes no reason for releasing the security and sending the plaintiff to a foreign jurisdiction to procure satisfaction of his personal decree, in case the defendant should see fit to require him to do so.

For this error, so much of the decree appealed from as dismissed the attachment and released the bond must be reversed, annulled, and set aside; but in all other respects it will be affirmed, with cost in this court to the appellant, as the party substantially prevailing.

HARTIGAN v. HARTIGAN.

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONTRACT OF SEPARATION—CANCELLATION.

A contract between a husband and wife in an agreement for separation and the conveyance of the wife's property to the husband will be canceled and annulled at the suit of the wife, unless it clearly appears to be fair, just, equitable, and wholly free from exception.

2. SAME.

In a suit by a wife for divorce from bed and board, and for the cancellation of a contract between herself and husband for a perpetual separation and an agreement on her part to convey forthwith in fee to the husband her real estate, of the value of $10,000 or $12,000, in consideration that the wife have full, absolute, and complete custody and control of their five children, the husband to have, use, and occupy certain rooms in the house so conveyed to him, the wife and children to have, use, and occupy the residue of the house, and the wife to provide food and clothing for said children, and pay all necessary expenses for supporting them in their said home, including the expenses of their education in the local schools, the husband to pay the wife $50 per month for the purpose of such support and expenses, said "agreement to remain in full force and effect until the youngest child shall reach her majority," held, such agreement is unfair, unjust, and inequitable, and should be canceled.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Bill by Mary V. Hartigan against James W. Hartigan. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Russell and Goodwin & Reay, for appellant. W. S. Meredith and Lazzelle & Stewart, for appellee.

McWHORTER, P. At the January rules, 1902, Mary V. Hartigan filed her bill in equity in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Monongalia county against James W. Hartigan, her husband, praying for a divorce a mensa et thoro, for alimony, and the custody of their five children; that the cause remain on the docket that she might in due time according to law have a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and for the further purpose of setting aside and annulling a contract and agreement between herself and her husband, which contract is as follows:

"This agreement made this 11th day of October, 1899, by and between J. W. Hartigan and Mary V. Hartigan, his wife, Witnesseth, that, whereas, said parties have agreed to separate from bed and board and otherwise dissolve their marital relations as hereinafter set forth: Now, therefore, they agree to make disposition of their property, etc., and adjust their future relations toward each other and their children as follows:

"(1) The said Mary V. Hartigan agrees to convey forthwith, by deed in fee, to J. W. Hartigan the house and lot now occupied by them as their residence, on Spruce street in the town of Morgantown, West Virginia.

"(2) In consideration of which said conveyance the said J. W. Hartigan agrees and hereby grants, transfers and surrenders to said Mary V. Hartigan the full, absolute and complete custody and control of their five children. The said J. W. Hartigan is not to interfere with, command, correct, or in any wise exercise any authority over or direct the discipline or education of any of said children except by permission and at the instance of said Mary V. Hartigan, but shall have the privilege of seeing them as often as he wishes and said children shall be free to visit him in his quarters at said home, socially, when they so desire.

"(3) Said J. W. Hartigan shall have the occupancy and control of the two rooms in said residence heretofore used by him as a bed room and study on the second floor, and of the back parlor as an office or other use, on the first floor, with the use of the bath room, and of the attic for storage. Said Mary V. Hartigan shall have the exclusive occupancy and control of the remaining rooms of said residence for her own use and that of her children, and neither party shall unnecessarily invade or seek to use or control that part of said house hereby assigned to the other. And said children shall be kept in said house as their house, and not be removed therefrom to any other quarters or place whatsoever except by the mutual consent and permission of the parties to this agreement previously obtained—provided only that this shall not be construed to prevent said children going away temporarily on brief visits in company with their mother or by her consent.

"(4) Said J. W. Hartigan further agrees to pay over to said Mary V. Hartigan, or place to her credit in a bank of Morgantown, each month beginning with this month of October, 1899, the sum of fifty dollars, out of which the said Mary V. Hartigan shall provide food and clothing for said children and pay all necessary expenses for supporting them in their said home, including the expenses of their education in the local schools. And said Mary V. Hartigan shall not contract or incur any debt or debts on said account of any kind or character whatsoever.

"(5) The said J. W. Hartigan shall further provide decent and suitable household and kitchen furniture for said entire house, keep said house in good repair, and pay all other expenses, including taxes, water and gas bills, for its maintenance as a residence.

"(6) Said J. W. Hartigan shall not eat at the common table of said family, but shall make separate provision for his own boarding at a hotel or elsewhere.

"(7) This agreement shall remain in full force and effect until the youngest child shall reach her majority.

"Given under our hands this 11th day of October, 1899.

"Mary V. Hartigan.
"J. W. Hartigan."

This agreement was duly acknowledged by the said J. W. Hartigan on the 5th day of September, 1901, before the clerk of the county court of Monongalia county, and on the same day was proved before the said clerk as to the said Mary V. Hartigan by the oaths of W. P. Willey and E. H. Cooms, and admitted to record in the office of the said clerk on said 5th day of September, 1901. Plaintiff based her grounds for divorce and alimony on cruel and inhuman treatment of her, and abandonment and desertion by the defendant. The defendant answered the bill denying all its material allegations, to which the plaintiff replied generally. The depositions taken by the plaintiff and the defendant are very voluminous, constituting over 900 pages of the record in this cause. The cause was brought on to be heard on the 23d day of June, 1902, when the court decreed that plaintiff be divorced from bed and board from her husband, said defendant, and that they be perpetually separated; that plaintiff be thereafter perpetually and fully protected in her person from said defendant, and in all her property and estate then owned by her, except as hereinafter provided, and in all her property and estate thereafter acquired against any claim or demand of defendant, and free from any marital right or claim of the husband; and a like provision for the protection of the defendant's property against plaintiff, except as hereinafter provided, and in all property and estate thereafter acquired by him against any claim or demand or estate of said plaintiff, and decreed that said contract of October 11, 1899, be set aside, canceled, and annulled, and further decreed as follows: "The court, without now determining what interest, if any, the said defendant has in the real estate known as the hospital property, situated on Spruce street in Morgantown, Monongalia county, W. Va., referred to in said contract dated October 11, 1899, and which was conveyed to the said plaintiff by John Marshall Hagans and James W. Hartigan by deed bearing date on the 2d day of April, 1897, a copy of which is filed with the bill in this cause, and expressly reserving all questions as to the interest of the defendant in said property until the future order of this court, doth adjudge, order and decree that the said plaintiff shall have and hold the exclusive use, possession, and control of the said property together with the appurtenances and privileges thereunto belonging and all the rents, issues, and profits of the same to the same extent and as fully as she, the said plaintiff, would if sole owner thereof, and that the said property shall be taken, held, and accepted by the said plaintiff in lieu of alimony, and the court doth reserve for future order of this court the question of the interests of each of the said parties in the said property and also the question of further alimony to be granted the plaintiff as against the defendant. The court doth further adjudge, order, and decree that the said defendant may, at his election, continue in possession of the said hospital property for six months from the rising of this court upon the condition, however, that he, the said defendant, pay to the said plaintiff the sum of $50 per month for the use of said property. Said $50 per month to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff monthly in advance, and at the expiration of the said six months from the rising of this court, or at once, if the said defendant desires not to continue in possession thereof upon the terms and conditions of paying $50 per month in advance to the said plaintiff, or if the defendant undertakes to remain in possession of the said property on said terms and conditions and at any time before the expiration of said six months, shall fail to pay to the said plaintiff the said $50 per month in advance for any month, then, in either event, the plaintiff upon her motion may sue out of the clerk's office of this court a writ of possession for said property. The court doth further adjudge, order, and decree that the said plaintiff shall have the exclusive care, custody, and control, and shall maintain the infant female children of plaintiff and defendant, to wit, Elizabeth Willey Hartigan, Mary Virginia Hartigan, and Sarah Hartigan, and the said plaintiff shall maintain, support, and educate them free from any charge upon defendant further than that allowed the plaintiff by this order or by future order of the court. It appearing to the court that the said plaintiff is possessed of some other estate of her own in addition to her interest and estate in said hospital property, and that she asks to be permitted to support and educate the two infant male children of plaintiff and defendant, to wit, John Marshall Hartigan and James William Hartigan, it is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said plaintiff may, if she so elect, at her own expense, undertake the support and education of the said two infant male children and for that purpose she may have the custody and control of them, but the court doth further adjudge, order and decree that if the said plaintiff decline to so undertake to support and educate the said two male children, or if she should undertake to do so and fail, either through disinclination on her part or from her inability to control them, then they shall be placed in the charge of and under the control of the defendant, and in the event that said male children are placed under the control of the defendant, he, the said defendant, shall be liable for their support and maintenance. The court doth reserve the right to make such order in the future as shall be deemed best for the control and maintenance of the said two male infant children of plaintiff and defendant. The court doth further adjudge, order, and decree that the plaintiff recover against the defendant her cost by her in this behalf expended." From which decree the defendant appealed, and says that the court erred in granting the plaintiff the divorce from bed and board from defendant, and decreeing that the agreement, dated the 11th day of October, 1899, be set aside, canceled, and annulled, and in decreeing that the plaintiff should have and hold the exclusive use, possession, and control of the property mentioned in the decree, together with the appurtenances and privileges thereto belonging, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and in decreeing that the plaintiff should have the exclusive care, custody, and control of the female children mentioned in the decree; and at her option should have the control of the two male children and the like option to support and educate them.

Since the submission of the cause to this court the death of the plaintiff has been suggested on the record. The testimony taken in the case is very conflicting, and as touching the allegations of cruelty the evidence is sufficient to warrant the circuit court in granting the divorce from bed and board. Counsel for defendant contends that it may fairly be said that the evidence for the plaintiff does not outweigh the evidence for the defendant, and the burden of proof being upon plaintiff, she was not entitled to the decree of divorce, but the court having so found under the evidence, conflicting as it was, and this court, not being able to see that the evidence preponderates in favor of defendant, will not disturb the decree on that point. It does not appear upon the face of the decree whether the decree was based upon the evidence of cruelty, or abandonment, but as the evidence fails to sustain the decree on the latter point, we assume that it was based upon the former ground of cruelty. As to the canceling and annulling of the contract of October 11, 1899, this is a contract of separation made by a married woman with her husband, not only to live separate and apart, but by it they agree to separate from bed and board and otherwise dissolve their marital relations. "The said Mary V. Hartigan agrees to convey forthwith by deed in fee to J. W. Hartigan, the house and lot now occupied by them as their residence on Spruce street in the town of Morgantown, West Virginia." The consideration for which conveyance of said property is the agreement on the part of said J. W. Hartigan to surrender to said Mary V. Hartigan the full, absolute and complete custody and control of their five children; he to occupy certain rooms designated in the house, and she and the children to have the exclusive occupancy and control of the remaining rooms; he to pay her $50 a month, out of which she should provide food and clothing for the children, and pay all necessary expenses for supporting them, including the expenses of their education in the local schools.

It is contended by the appellant that the agreement in its provisions "was fair and liberal towards the plaintiff." It is true plaintiff in her testimony says that she was consulted about the terms of the agreement, and that she suggested the consideration, and that she entered into the agreement with the full knowledge of her marital rights, but denied that the consideration named in the agreement was adequate, and says she signed it "because I could not get anything else. My uncle tried to induce him to be generous." What is the consideration moving from defendant to plaintiff for all this property, which the record shows is worth from $10,000 to $12,000? The first consideration is the giving up of the control, custody, and maintenance of the children to the plaintiff; the defendant being relieved from all responsibility and the duty of providing and caring for the said children, which the law requires at his hands. The money consideration is $50 per month, which is an inadequate support for the wife and children, besides a considerable portion of the house is given over to defendant for his use and occupancy. It is very evident from the testimony in the case that the plaintiff at the time of the execution of said agreement had become almost desperate and therefore willing to execute any sort of an agreement to get entire control of her children. The property was hers, and she was entitled to the rents and profits thereof, and was entitled, at the hands of the defendant, to a support for herself and her children; and yet she entered into this contract whereby she took upon herself the burden of supporting herself and all the children for the sum of $50 per month. And even that was to cease when the youngest child should arrive at the age of 21 years, at which time the plaintiff was to be turned "out upon the cold charities of the world;" at least upon her own resources, divested of all title or interest in her property, which she agreed to convey in fee to the defendant. This agreement to convey the property seems to be without any adequate consideration. It is claimed by counsel for appellant that he had an equity in the property by reason of the improvements he placed upon it. It is true that he placed the most of the improvements upon it, but the improvements were an absolute gift to the plaintiff by the defendant for herself and their children, and her title to the property and the enjoyment thereof was complete. It is well settled that a contract of the character of the one here in question must be fair, equitable, and just. In 4 Pom. Eq. § 1405, in treating of the essential elements and incidents of a contract which equity will enforce, the author says: "The elements which peculiarly affect the equitable character of the agreement and of the remedy are the following: The contract must be perfectly fair, equal, and just in its terms, and in its circumstances. The contract and the situation of the parties must be such that the remedy of specific performance will not be harsh or oppressive." See, also, section 397, Hogg's Eq. Pr., where it is said: "It must also be based upon a valuable consideration; * * * and the contract must also be just and equitable and free from fraud, and in harmony with equity and good conscience"—and cases there cited. And in 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 567: "The relief being discretionary, it follows, therefore, that in the first place the contract must, under all circumstances, be equitable and just. An agreement may be valid at law, and there may not be sufficient grounds for its cancellation in equity; and yet, upon a fair and just consideration of the attendant and collateral circumstances, the court will abstain from decreeing its performance. Before granting such a decree, the court must be satisfied, not only of the existence of a valid contract, free from fraud and enforceable in law, but also of its fairness, and of its harmony with equity and good conscience; and any fact showing that a contract is unfair, unjust, or against good conscience, will justify a court of equity in refusing to decree its specific performance." If these principles apply to agreements and contracts made between parties trading at arms length and in every respect competent to contract, how much more strongly would they apply in favor of the wife contracting with her husband. Can it be said of the contract in question here that the consideration was adequate, or that the contract was just, fair, and equitable?

It is claimed by appellee that the contract was against public policy, and cites 1 Bish. on Mar. & Div. § 1261 et seq., and cases there cited, and therefore not enforceable in equity; while it is claimed by counsel for appellant "that the agreement was not an agreement for the separation of the husband and wife. They had already separated, and the agreement was entered into subsequently to the separation, and because it had already taken place." This is contrary to the position taken by the defendant in his answer, where he says: "In October in the year 1899, an agreement of separation was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, and from that time until the present they have not lived together as husband and wife." And further, "Respondent has never in any way abandoned or deserted the plaintiff, or done anything which could properly be construed as abandonment or desertion. On the contrary any abandonment or desertion which has taken place, has been by the plaintiff herself, and without any reasonable cause or occasion for the same. Respondent is advised, and therefore alleges, that the separation which took place upon and by reason of the execution of the said agreement, dated the 11th day of October, in the year 1899, could not properly, by reason of that instrument, be construed as abandonment or desertion, or as a proper ground for divorce." Thus, it will be seen that defendant clearly understood the agreement to be an agreement of separation, and which separation took place at the time of the execution of said agreement. In Switzer v. Switzer, 28 Grat. 574, syl., it is held: "A contract between a husband and wife in an agreement for a separation, cannot be sustained in any case in which it does not clearly appear, that in the negotiation which preceded the agreement, as well as at the time of executing the same, the wife was in a position in which she could act and did act, not only with perfect freedom, but with a full knowledge and appreciation of all the circumstances of her situation, and of her individual and marital rights; and the contract in itself must be fair and just, wholly free from exception, and such as a court of equity might have imposed upon the parties in a case in which their persons and their property had properly fallen under its jurisdiction and control." It will be observed here that the contract in itself must be fair and just, wholly free from exception, and such as a court of equity might have imposed upon the parties in a case in which their persons and their property had properly fallen under its jurisdiction and control. In case at bar the wife contracts to convey her property absolutely and in fee for a consideration wholly inadequate, if there can be said to be a valuable consideration at all; and while it appears from her own testimony that she had full knowledge and appreciation of all the circumstances of her situation and her marital rights, at the same time it appears that the circumstances were such as to produce in her an almost frenzied state of mind, and to such an extent that she was ready to make any sacrifice of her property in order to get sole control and custody of her children, and because of these conditions she entered into this agreement, which if enforced would in a few years deprive her of all the rights and benefits in and to her said property. Can it be thought for a moment that any court of equity, having jurisdiction of the persons and the property of these parties, could or would have imposed upon the plaintiff the terms and conditions in the contract of October 11, 1899, and sought to be canceled and annulled in this cause? The circuit court did not err in setting aside, cancelling and annulling the contract, the same being so clearly inequitable, unfair, and unjust.

The assignments of error touching the custody and control of the children, it is deemed unnecessary to discuss. There is sufficient evidence in respect to this matter to support the decree at the time it was entered. New conditions have arisen since the decree, occasioned by the decease of plaintiff, which will probably make further action necessary on the part of the circuit court in relation thereto.

For the reasons stated herein, the decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. DAVIS et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1906.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—ELEMENTS.

In a condemnation proceeding, every element of value which would be taken into consideration between private parties in a sale of property should be considered in arriving at a just compensation for the land proposed to be taken, and it is proper to consider, not only the use for which the land may be maintained at the time, but its adaptability to any and every useful purpose to which it might be put.

2. SAME.

As a general rule, compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the appropriated lands are suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 352-356.]

3. SAME.

As to the value of the property taken, the proper inquiry is, what is the value of the property for the most advantageous uses to which it may be applied?

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 352-356.]

4. SAME—ASSESSMENT OF COMPENSATION—APPEAL—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

In a condemnation proceeding, when a false, speculative, and conjectural basis of the value of the real estate proposed to be taken is permitted to go in evidence to the jury over the objections of a party, it will be presumed that the objecting party was prejudiced thereby.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Action by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company against T. J. Davis and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Joseph I. Doran and Holt & Duncan, for plaintiff in error. Simms & Enslow, for defendants in error.

McWHORTER, P. This is a proceeding by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company for the condemnation of a strip of land 2,567 feet in length, along the bank of the Tug Fork of Sandy river, in Mingo county, being the front of a tract of some 550 or 600 acres; the strip to be taken containing 5.02 acres, the property of T. J. Davis and others, for its use in the construction of a branch of its railroad. The applicant offered the owners $500, which they refused to accept. It then applied to the circuit court of Mingo county for the appointment of commissioners, under the statute, to ascertain the compensation, who reported $900 as a fair compensation for the land taken and damages to the residue of the property, which report was excepted to by the applicant, "because the amount fixed by said commissioners in their report as compensation for the land proposed to be taken and damaged is grossly excessive," and demanded that the question of compensation be ascertained by a jury. The defendants also excepted to said report, "because the amount fixed by said commissioners in their report as compensation for the land proposed to be taken and damaged is grossly inadequate," and likewise demanded a jury to ascertain the compensation and damages. Accordingly a jury was impaneled and sworn, and, after hearing the evidence, returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the defendants the sum of $2,350 as compensation and damages for the land proposed to be taken as shown and described in the petition and plat filed herein." During the trial the plaintiff objected to certain evidence offered by the defendants, and excepted to the ruling of the court in permitting the evidence to go in, and moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant it a new trial, because the same was contrary to law and without evidence to support it, which motion the court overruled and entered judgment requiring the plaintiff to pay said sum of $2,350, to which plaintiff excepted and procured from one of the judges of this court a writ of error.

The questions presented for the consideration of this court are as to whether the amount of compensation found by the jury is so high that it must be attributed to prejudice, partiality, passion, or mistake of law or judgment, and whether the court erred in permitting certain evidence to go to the jury, as claimed by plaintiff's counsel. It is conceded, as well as proved, that the land taken for the right of way, being a strip 80 feet wide, except for a distance where a fill was made it is enlarged to 140 feet, is rough hillside land, wholly unfit for cultivation, and the evidence shows that between the right of way and the river is a strip, the most of which is bottom land, of about 90 feet in width, which is, by the road, severed from the main body of the tract of land out of which the right of way is taken. There are two producing gas wells on the land outside of the right of way proposed to be taken, one within about 10 feet of the right of way, the other about 200 feet up Lower Burning creek from its mouth, so that the well must be within 100 feet or less of the right of way, but none upon the right of way. T. J. Davis, a witness in behalf of himself and the other owners, testified that the compensation and damages should be $4,300, that he based his judgment upon an estimate that he had made; and testified that the two wells producing gas brought in rentals of $600 per year, to which testimony of Mr. Davis, so far as it referred to the gas upon the land and the rentals accruing from the two producing wells, the counsel for the plaintiff objected, but the objection was overruled, and plaintiff excepted. Here was proof of actual development of the gas, the wells were bringing in certain definite rentals, and it was certainly competent to show to what extent developments had been made, and what was actually being done with the land. It seems to be a rule well established that every element of value which would be taken into consideration between private parties in a sale of property should be considered in a proceeding of this character in arriving at a just compensation for the land taken, and it is proper to consider not only the use for which the land may be maintained at the time, but its adaptability to any and every useful purpose to which it might be put.

In 15 Cyc. 724: "If a tract, of which the whole or a part is taken for a public use, possesses a special value to the owner, which can be measured by money, he is entitled to have that value considered in the estimate of the compensation and damages. Compensation is not to be estimated simply with reference to the value of the land to the owner in the condition in which he has maintained it, but with reference to what its present value is in view of the uses to which it is reasonably capable of being put"—and cases there cited. In Harrison v. Young, 9 Ga. 359, it is held: "The value of land taken for public use is not restricted to its agricultural or productive qualities, but inquiry may be made as to all other legitimate purposes to which the property could be appropriated." In Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206, it is held: "In determining the value of lands appropriated for public purposes, the same considerations are to be regarded as in a sale between private parties; the inquiry in such cases being, what, from their availability for valuable uses, are they worth in the market." And it is there further held: "As a general rule, compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the appropriated lands are suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future." In that case the court adopts the language of the Supreme Court of New York in the Matter of Furman Street, 17 Wend. 669, where it is said the proper inquiry was: "What is the value of the property for the most advantageous uses to which it may be applied?" In Muller v. Railway Co. (Cal.) 23 Pac. 265, the court says: "In arriving at the value of the land, all its capabilities, all the uses to which it is adapted, should be taken into consideration. These capabilities are estimated by a purchaser, and we cannot see why evidence in regard to them is not admissible. The same considerations are to be regarded as in a sale of land between private parties." Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206. And in Reed v. Railway Co. (Ill.) 17 N. E. 807, it is held: "The price to be paid by a railway company for land taken under eminent domain is its value for any purpose for which it is shown by the evidence it is available, and not simply its value as land as it is at the time." Railway Co. v. Moore and Others (Ill.) 15 N. E. 764. A long line of decisions is cited to the same effect from the states of Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, and the United States. 18 Cent. Dig. cc. 1249-1257, § 356.

It is a fact that the property proposed to be taken in the case at bar for the right of way is a developed gas property, two producing wells almost immediately on the line of the right of way. Could any one for a moment say that in negotiations between private parties for the sale and purchase of said property they would not take into consideration the fact of the existence of gas under the property as an element in ascertaining the value of the property? Gas is an article of commerce, and the fact that it is now being piped to market from the premises is entirely proper to be taken into consideration as an element of value in fixing the amount of compensation, and it was proper to permit the witness to state what rental was being derived from the said gas wells, and it was competent evidence in estimating the value of the property. "The particular use to which the property is devoted, and in consequence of which it has an intrinsic value to the owner, is a fact which he has a right to have considered." 15 Cyc. 727, and cases there cited. See, also, 2 Lewis, Em. Dom. par. 479. The court did not err in admitting testimony in relation to the actual gas production, and the fact that the land to be taken was gas territory, in view of the fact of its development as such. Said witness, on cross-examination, was asked just how much he embraced for this five acres in his estimate of $4,300, and answered: "I told you that I regarded the coal under the right of way to be worth about $800. I put the land at $500." He then stated that he put the gas territory taken at $3,000—making up his estimate of $4,300. Counsel for plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury to disregard the witness' answer to the question propounded by counsel for defendants as to his estimate of damages of $4,300, which motion was overruled, and plaintiff excepted, and counsel for plaintiff insist that the court erred therein to its prejudice, in permitting speculative and fictitious estimates of values to go to the jury and not the market value of the property to be taken, which was not stated by the witness. Dorlan v. Railroad Co., 46 Pa. 520, was an action for damages to a mill property by the construction of the road, where it was held that: "The injury to the unused and surplus water power of the plaintiff is a legal ground of claim, and the measure of damages is its actual market value for any useful purpose; the mill property remaining as it was when the road was constructed. Hence, evidence as to the power that could be gained by erecting a new dam further down the stream, making a shorter race and other alterations, was irrelevant and inadmissible." In Canal Co. v. Archer, 9 Gill & J. 479, it is held that, in estimating the value of property condemned for public use, the jury should give the owner what in their judgment it would actually, at the time, sell for, and not what it might bring, or perhaps ought to produce, at some future time; that possible or probable profits resulting from the enjoyment of the property are not proper to be considered by the jury in making up their verdict, but they should limit themselves to the direct loss sustained by the owner. And in Railroad Co. v. Hildebrand, 136 Ill. 467, 27 N. E. 69, syl., point 2, it is held: "Error to instruct the jury that in estimating the compensations to be paid they should take into consideration all appreciable injuries and inconveniences caused by the taking, to the land not taken, 'although such injuries and inconveniences may be largely conjectural,' since the jury might infer that speculative damages were recoverable." La Mont v.

Railway Co., 62 Iowa, 193, 17 N. W. 465; Railroad Co. v. McDermott (Neb.) 41 N. W. 648; U. S. v. Taffe (C. C.) 86 Fed. 830. And in Railway Co. v. Holmes (Ga.) 11 S. E. 658, it is held that: "Evidence of what plaintiff could have made by putting the land to other uses, had defendant's tracks and buildings not been there, is inadmissible on the question of damages." "Where land is appropriated for a public use, a compensatory, not a speculative, remuneration is guaranteed by the law for lands taken and for the damages occasioned thereby to the remainder of the premises." Powers v. Railway Co., 33 Ohio St. 429.

The defendants, over the objections and exceptions of plaintiff in case at bar, had been permitted to prove by witness H. M. Payne, a civil and consulting engineer and mining engineer, the probable number of tons of coal per acre underlying the land proposed to be taken and the value thereof per ton, as measured by the usual price of royalty paid to landowners per ton for coal when the coal was leased and being produced, which doubtless formed the basis of the estimate of the witness Davis of the value of the coal under the land taken, when there was no evidence that coal was leased or mined or any royalties paid anywhere near the land taken, or that coal operations would affect that neighborhood or section in any reasonable time in the future; no works were opened near it, the land was not leased for operation, nor any near it as far as the evidence shows. There seemed to be no effort to prove the market value of the land to be taken. It was shown that there was some good coal under the land, but when it might be mined and removed does not appear. The coal is of no value while it must remain in the earth; it is the prospect of its production which gives it value. The early prospect of its development is what adds to its value; it is true it has a value now as an investment to be held for future development, and has, as such, a market value, and this market value is the true basis of compensation to be allowed. Coal lands are sold by the acre and have a market value by the acre, and the price is controlled by the various elements of value—the quality of the coal, the thickness of the seam, as well as conveniences and the facilities for conveying it to market. The estimate made by witness Davis was made upon a false basis, conjectural and speculative, and should have been excluded from the jury as well as all testimony fixing the basis of value upon the price per ton paid as royalty in coal fields being operated; the value must be arrived at by ascertaining the true market value of the land proposed to be taken, taking into consideration all the elements of value as would be done in negotiations for the sale and purchase thereof between private parties. This principle is well settled in Bodkin v. Arnold, 48 W. Va. 108, 35 S. E. 980, where it is held, in syllabus, point 6: "The true measure of damages is compensation for the actual loss sustained by the plaintiff in being deprived of the use of his property, and speculative profits, founded on an exaggerated notion of the real value of the property, are not recoverable. Evidence tending to establish such speculative profits is inadmissible, as it may mislead the jury in arriving at the fair rental value of the property."

It is assigned as error that the court permitted to be propounded by counsel for defendants, to witness W. H. Hovey, the question, "Tell the jury what your experience is, and, from the experience you have had, as to the probability of oil in that neighborhood," and the same to be answered over the objection of plaintiff's counsel. Mr. Hovey was placed upon the witness stand as an expert oil man. His testimony would scarcely raise a suspicion in the mind of any one that there was oil in the tract of land from which the right of way is sought to be taken. If the land contained oil, the defendants had a right to show it by any evidence they could adduce that was practical, and not merely conjectural and speculative. Nothing was shown as to the presence of oil further than the fact of the development of gas, which is, at least to some extent, an indication of the presence of oil, and this fact was already and properly before the jury without the testimony of Hovey. In the absence of all development of oil or the presence of oil, all testimony relative thereto was mere guesswork and liable to confuse or mislead the jury, and, the question being purely speculative, and any answer thereto necessarily so, the same should not have been permitted to be answered.

The first error assigned is in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial: "because the amount of compensation found by the verdict is so high that it must be attributed to prejudice, partiality, passion, or mistake of law or judgment"—citing, in support of this assignment, Railway Co. v. Nighbert, 46 W. Va. 202, 32 S. E. 1032, where it is held: "A verdict finding an amount of compensation, in a proceeding by a railroad company to condemn land, that is so high that it must be attributed to prejudice, passion, bias, partiality, or mistake of law or judgment will be set aside." It is true the verdict is very high compensation for the property proposed to be taken, and damages to the residue of the tract, when we consider the character, nature, and quality of the land taken, as well as the residue of the tract. How far the verdict of the jury was influenced by the speculative evidence permitted to go to the jury cannot be known, and, as the case must again be tried before another jury, it is not deemed proper to discuss the evidence.

It is claimed by defendants that, the jury having viewed the premises in the course of the trial, such view is a part of the evidence in the case; that what they see relevant to the issue to be decided by them is always evidence in a primary sense, and what is detailed to them concerning the same subject-matter by witnesses is evidence merely in a secondary sense; and that the view of the premises was conclusive, and that the verdict should not be disturbed—citing several authorities. The purpose of a personal inspection by the jury is to enable them to view the whole situation and see for themselves the property to be taken, its character, and quality, and its relation to the residue of the tract from which the right of way is taken, and thereby obtain a more intelligent grasp of the evidence adduced before them, by which, taken in connection with their view, they are the better enabled to arrive at a just and proper conclusion as to the amount to be paid. In Washburn v. Railroad Co., 59 Wis. 384, 18 N. W. 328, it is held: "In assessing the compensation to be made to the owner of land taken by a railroad company, the jury may resort to their own knowledge of the premises, obtained from a view thereof, and to their general knowledge of the elements which affect the assessment, in order to determine the relative weight of conflicting testimony as to value and damages; but their assessment must be supported by the testimony or it cannot stand. Instructions from which the jury might reasonably have understood that they were to assess the compensation according to their own knowledge, judgment, and good sense, aided by their view of the premises, and that they might do so without regard to the testimony or in opposition thereto, are held erroneous." In the absence of inadmissible testimony, or erroneous instructions, a verdict rendered by a jury should not be disturbed, unless it was so high, or so low, that it must be attributed to prejudice, partiality, passion, or mistake. When a false and illegal basis of values has been permitted to be placed before the jury, over the objections of a party, it will be presumed that the objecting party was prejudiced thereby.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded to the circuit court of Mingo county, there for a new trial to be had therein.

MAY v. LOOMIS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. FRAUD—SALES—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

In an action on notes given for the purchase price of timber, a judgment dismissing defendant's counterclaim is erroneous, where the evidence discloses deliberate fraud, consisting in false representations as to material facts, knowingly and willfully made as an inducement to the sale and by which it was effected, reasonably relied on by defendant and causing him pecuniary damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Fraud, §§ 8-14.]

2. SAME—RELIANCE ON REPRESENTATIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a sale was induced by the sellers' false representations, and they used artifice to induce the buyers to forbear making inquiry, the buyers' claim for relief is not barred because of alleged negligence in relying on the representations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Fraud, §§ 19-23.]

3. SAME—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

Where the sellers of timber assured the buyers that they had the timber carefully estimated and such estimates showed certain quantities, such representations were not mere matters of opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Fraud, § 12.]

4. SALES — FRAUD — RESCISSION—COUNTERCLAIM.

Where buyers of timber made payments in recognition of the contract and have manufactured and sold the timber, they cannot rescind the trade and plead fraud in the sale in bar of recovery on purchase-money notes, but may set up the fraud by counterclaim and recover for damages sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Frank May against G. C. Loomis and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The plaintiff declared on two notes, each for $750, bearing date December 18, 1902, due, respectively, 9 and 12 months after date. The notes were drawn by defendant Loomis to defendant Dotson and indorsed to plaintiff before maturity. The defendants answered, admitting the execution and indorsement of the notes, and alleging that the same were executed in part payment of the purchase of a sawmill plant and the standing timber on two tracts of land situated in Haywood county, one of 250 and the other of 750 acres, and that said sale was effected and the notes were procured by false and fraudulent representations on the part of the plaintiff and his partner, one W. H. Cole, who were vendors in the sale, and setting up such fraud in bar of any liability on the notes. There was further answer, setting up the alleged fraud and deceit by way of counterclaim, which is in part as follows: (1) That on December 13, 1902, the defendant bought 8,000,000 feet of merchantable hardwood timber from the plaintiff and W. H. Cole, trading under the firm name of May & Cole, at the rate of $1 per 1,000 feet, on a tract of land on Pigeon river in Haywood county, and also at said date, in connection with the purchase of said timber, bought of the plaintiff and his said copartner the steam sawmill, boilers, and engine located on said premises, valued at $2,500, and likewise horses, mules, and wagons, valued at $500. (2) That at the time of making said sale, and pending negotiations for the same, the said May &

Cole represented that this was a picked tract of timber land which the said W. H. Cole had especially selected out of a large tract of land belonging to Crary, Young & Co., and that they had made two careful estimates of the merchantable hardwood timber thereon, one by W. H. Cole individually and the other by May & Cole, resulting in 3,000,000 feet, and that they guaranteed that there was 3,000,000 feet of merchantable timber thereon, 1,000,000 feet of poplar, 1,000,000 feet of chestnut, and 1,000,000 feet of oak, lynn, and other merchantable hardwood, outside of spruce and hemlock, which were not considered in the contract; and the defendants, relying on the representations and guaranty of May & Cole as to the quantity and kind of timber, which were knowingly false and fraudulent and a material inducement to the contract, purchased the said 3,000,000 feet of timber at the rate of $1 per 1,000 feet, for the sum of $3,000, and at said time, relying upon the said false and fraudulent representations, intending to deceive, and which did deceive, the defendants, were induced to execute a note set out in the complaint, together with other notes, and have paid off all of the said notes, except the aforesaid, when in truth and in fact there was only 464,728 feet of poplar on said boundary of land, 208,377 feet of chestnut, and 240,121 feet of oak, lynn, and all other timber, considered in said contract and guaranty, and the plaintiff, both as an individual and member of the firm of May & Cole, is due the defendants the sum of $2,036.77 as shortage on the 3,000,000 feet of timber purchased as aforesaid, as damages. There was further allegation of similar import to false and fraudulent representations in regard to the other property, machinery, etc., conveyed. The plaintiff replied, denying all charges of fraud and deceit. The defendants in apt time tendered issues addressed to each phase of their defense, and on refusal to submit them excepted, and requested his honor to settle the issues deemed by him pertinent and raised by the pleadings. There was evidence on the part of the defendants tending to show that at the time of the trade, and as an inducement thereto, both the plaintiff and his partner stated that there were 3,000,000 feet of merchantable hardwood timber on the two tracts of land, ascertained by two careful estimates made at different times, and that the same had been picked out of 20,000 acres as 1,000 acres of choice timber land; that the machinery and other property used in connection with the same were practically new, having been in use only six months, and were in good condition; that as a matter of fact there was only about 1,000,000 feet of hardwood timber on the land, and this was well known to the plaintiff at the time, having been ascertained by them by the estimates previously made, and to which the plaintiff referred, and was unknown to the defendants, who relied on the positive assurance and statements of the plaintiff as to the quantity of timber; that the machinery was old and worn and the boilers had many patches on the inside, and were old worn-out boilers when brought there the year before, and so defective that they had to be immediately removed as being dangerous, and replaced at an additional cost to the defendants of something like $600.

A witness by the name of William Qulett testified, among other things, that about a week before the trade Cole came to the witness and asked him how much timber was on the boundary, that the witness told him there was 1,000,000 or 1,100,000 feet, and Cole replied that he thought there were 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 feet. Cole then said not to say anything about the estimate which had been made of the timber; that he had a chance of a sale, and it might interfere with his deal. There was also testimony to the effect that the defendant Loomis was without any experience in milling or stumpage, and Dotson alone of defendant firm had any knowledge or experience in estimating timber or manufacturing it, and that just prior to the trade, and when negotiating thereon, the parties went out to the land to take a look over it, when Dotson, who had consumption and was very weak, gave out and was unable to proceed, and that Loomis was taken by one of the plaintiffs through a small portion of the smaller tract (was gone about 15 or 20 minutes) and when they returned to Dotson, who had built a fire and was resting by the roadside, Cole said: "I will guaranty 1,000,000 feet of poplar, 1,000,000 feet of chestnut, and 1,000,000 feet of oak, and other kinds of hardwood sufficient to make up another 1,000,000 feet." That he and May had the timber estimated when they made the deal together, and also had it carefully estimated afterwards. During the negotiation Dotson said: "I have been physically unable to look over this property at all, and we have not seen the horses and mules, and do not know the value of the machinery you are offering us, and so far as the timber on the land is concerned we have simply to take your representations and guaranties about that. We believe you gentlemen are honest business men, and if you will guaranty it to be as you have represented it, we will close the deal." This was given; Cole saying it was even better than represented. When asked if the defendants relied on these statements as an inducement to the trade, they answered, "Yes." And Dotson testified further: "We had nothing else to rely on. I was unable to go over the land, and they both knew it. I stated to them that Loomis was not competent or capable of estimating timber. May and Cole both guaranteed it to be as represented by them." The defendants also offered to prove that during the bargaining, Cole advised Dotson to say nothing to people up there about the property, as they were quite peculiar, and did not like for strangers to come in their country. On objection this evidence was held incompetent, and the defendants excepted. There was also evidence tending to show damage to the defendants by reason of the fraud and deceit to the amount of several thousand dollars. At the close of the testimony his honor declined to submit the issues of the defendant's counterclaim, dismissed the same as on judgment of nonsuit, and gave judgment against the defendants on the notes. The defendants excepted and appealed.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts). Accepting the testimony as true, and we are required so to accept it where a nonsuit is directed against the party who offers it, the facts disclose a clear case of deliberate fraud, in which there appears every element of an actionable wrong, false representations as to material facts knowingly and willfully made as an inducement to the contract, and by which the same was effected, reasonably relied upon by the other party, and causing pecuniary damage. It is well established that the principle applies to contracts and sales of both real and personal property. The authorities are decisive and are against the ruling of the judge below as to the defendant's counterclaim. Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. C. 233; Knight v. Houghtalling, 85 N. C. 17; Lunn v. Shermer, 93 N. C. 165; Ramsey v. Wallace, 100 N. C. 75, 6 S. E. 638; Brotherton v. Reynolds, 164 Pa. 134, 30 Atl. 234.

It is urged that the buyers in this case were negligent, and on that account their claim for relief is barred; but not so. The parties were not at arm's length in reference to these representations, and did not have equal opportunities of informing themselves. The only one of the defendants who had any experience in such matters essayed to make an examination of the property, but broke down from weakness incident to his disease, and told the plaintiffs he would have to rely on their statements. Further, there was evidence tending to show artifice used to induce the buyers to forbear making inquiry about the matter. In 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 123, we find it stated: "In no case can a person escape responsibility for representations on the ground that the other party was negligent in relying on them, if, in addition to making the representations, he resorted to artifice which was reasonably calculated to induce the other party to forego making inquiry." Our decisions are to like effect. Walsh v. Hall, supra; Hill v. Brower, 76 N. C. 124; Blacknall v. Rowland, 108 N. C. 554, 13 S. E. 191; a. c., 116 N. C. 889, 21 S. E. 296.

Again, it is contended that these representations were not as to facts, but were mere matters of opinion, and we are cited to a number of authorities as supporting the plaintiff's position, Fagan v. Newson, 12 N. C. 20; Saunders

v. Hatterman, 24 N. C. 32, 37 Am. Dec. 404; Lytle v. Bird, 48 N. C. 222; Credle v. Swindell, 63 N. C. 305; Etheridge v. Vernoy, 70 N. C. 724; and some others. As stated in Cash Register Co. v. Townsend, 137 N. C. 652, 50 S. E. 306: "Expressions of commendation or opinion or extravagant statements as to value or prospects, or the like, are not regarded as fraudulent in law"; but these representations in the case before us were not of that character. They were not mere matters of opinion, but purported to be statements of fact, and were so intended and accepted by the parties. Knowing that the only one of the defendants whose experience qualified him to make an examination of the property with any intelligence was physically unable to do so, the plaintiffs assured the defendants that they had caused the timber on the land to be carefully estimated, and such estimate showed that there were 3,000,000 feet of hardwood timber on the tract; whereas, in fact and truth, the knowledge furnished to the plaintiffs by those estimates showed only 1,000,000 feet on the same. Even where there is doubt on the question, the matter must be referred to the jury to determine whether representations, though expressed in the form of opinion, were given and reasonably relied on as a material fact necessary to the trade. And the authorities cited do not support the plaintiffs on the facts of the case before us. In Fagan's Case, supra, the complaining party had refused his deed because the boundaries did not include two acres of meadow land which had been pointed out to him as being part of the land bargained for. Recovery was denied, the principal opinion being based on the fact that these two acres were at the time in adverse possession of third persons, and this was sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry; and one judge, concurring, rested his opinion on the ground that, the complaining party having refused the deed, no title passed, and an action for deceit would not lie simply for the loss of a good bargain. In Saunders' Case, supra, the court denied relief because the representations were simply matters of opinion as to value; both parties having equal opportunities to ascertain the truth by the exercise of reasonable care. In Vernoy's Case, supra, there was no claim or evidence tending to show actual fraud, and this opinion intimates that, in case of actual fraud, the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply as was said by the same judge writing the opinion in Hill v. Brower, supra.

The only cases which give support to the plaintiffs' position are those of Lytle v. Bird, and Credle v. Swindell, supra, in both of which it was expressly held that an action for deceit would lie in no case on the sale of land for fraudulent representation as to the quantity sold or what particular land was included in the deed; and this on the ground that the parties should inform themselves by a survey. These two cases are contrary to the trend of modern decisions, were expressly disapproved as to the point for which they are now cited in the case of Walsh v. Hall, supra, and have since been ignored as authority. Where a sale has been effected by an actionable fraud, the purchaser has an election of remedies. He may ordinarily, at least at the outset, rescind the trade, in which case he can recover the purchase price or any portion of it he may have paid, or avail himself of the facts as a defense in bar of recovery of the purchase price or any part of it which remains unpaid, or he may hold the other party to the contract, and sue him to recover the damages he has sustained in consequence of the fraud. In order to rescind, however, the party injured must act promptly and within a reasonable time after the discovery of the fraud, or after he should have discovered it by due diligence, and he is not allowed to rescind in part and affirm in part. He must do one or the other. And, as a general rule, a party is not allowed to rescind where he is not in a position to put the other in statu quo by restoring the consideration passed. Furthermore, if, after discovering the fraud, the injured party voluntarily does some act in recognition of the contract, his power to rescind is then at an end. These principles will be found in accord with the authorities. Bishop on Contracts, §§ 679-688; Beach on Contracts, § 812; Page on Contracts, §§ 137-139; Clark on Contracts, pp. 236, 237; Trust Co. v. Auten, 68 Ark. 299, 57 S. W. 1105, 82 Am. St. Rep. 295; Parker v. Marquis, 64 Mo. 38.

Applying these principles to the facts before us, the defendants could not now rescind the trade and plead the fraud in bar of recovery on the notes. They have made payments in recognition of the contract, they have manufactured and sold the timber, and are not in a position to restore the consideration. They contracted to manufacture and sell the timber on the land, according to the evidence, not long after the trade, and their explanation seems satisfactory. They had put out large sums of money on the enterprise; and the witness Loomis states that he complained of the fraud before the note was due, but went on and cut the timber as the best and only thing to do to save themselves. The fact, however, that they are not now in a position to rescind the trade and plead the fraud in bar of recovery on the notes, does not prevent them from setting up the fraud by way of counterclaim, and recovering for the damages suffered. This may be done, though the defendants have made payments in recognition of the contract, and may have continued to manufacture and sell the lumber after knowledge of the fraud (Trust Co. v. Auten; Parker v. Marquis, supra); the damages usually being the difference between the value of the property sold as it was and as it would have been if it had come up to the representations. The sale having been ratified, the plaintiffs can maintain an action on the note subject to any counterclaim the defendants may have against the plaintiffs, to be determined under the law as here declared and on the facts as they may be established.

There is error. The judgment will be set aside and a new trial awarded.

New trial.

CRENSHAW et ux. v. ASHEVILLE & B. ST. RY. & TRANSP. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence will be awarded, where it appears that the evidence was material to defendant and that it exercised reasonable diligence to procure it before the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 201-229.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Fred Moore, Judge.

Action by A. Crenshaw and wife against the Asheville & Biltmore Street Railway & Transportation Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The motion for new trial presented by defendant on account of newly discovered evidence was supported by affidavits of persons present at the time of the accident to plaintiff, who was struck by a street car, tending to show that she saw the approach of the car and when last seen was in a position free from danger, and showing the exercise by defendant of diligence to ascertain the names of such persons before the trial.

Julius C. Martin, for appellant. Moore & Rollins, Frank Carter, and H. C. Chedester, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. Without any intimation as to the plaintiffs' right to recover on the testimony as it now stands, the court is of opinion that a new trial should be awarded by reason of the newly discovered evidence, set out and referred to in the affidavits of the defendant, filed for the purpose on motion duly made. Under the decision in Herndon v. Insurance Co., 121 N. C. 498, 28 S. E. 144, we never discuss the facts on such motion, but simply award or refuse a new trial.

New trial.

AMMONS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.*

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—EJECTION OF PASSENGERS—ACTIONS—DAMAGES.

To entitle a passenger to exemplary damages for his wrongful expulsion from a train, such expulsion must be attended by rudeness, insult, or aggravating circumstances calculated to humiliate the passenger, and an award of such damages is unwarranted, where the passenger is merely told by the conductor that he must get off unless he pays the fare demanded, and on the passenger's refusal stops the train about a quarter of a mile from a station, and the passenger alights without anything further being said.

2. SAME.

Where a passenger is wrongfully ejected from a train, his demand may be considered as one in tort, and he may recover as actual or compensatory damages, a fair and just compensation for the wrong, including his actual loss in time or money, and the physical inconvenience or mental suffering or humiliation endured, and which occurs as a reasonable and probable result of the wrong, and he is not limited in his recovery to mere pecuniary loss.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1483-1487.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by W. R. Ammons against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Moore & Rollins, W. B. Rodman, and A. B. Andrews, Jr., for appellant. F. C. Fisher and A. J. Franklin, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This case was before the court at the last term and the facts are fully stated. 138 N. C. 555, 51 S. E. 127. The case comes back upon one exception only by the defendant to the refusal of the judge to give the following instruction: "That in no aspect of the case can the plaintiff recover punitive damages." The court erred in refusing the instruction. Damages are classified generally as "compensatory" and "punitive." The latter are termed also vindictive or exemplary damages. Compensatory damages are defined by Joyce and other text-writers as "those by which the actual loss sustained is measured and the injured party recompensed therefor." Joyce on Damages, § 28. Punitive damages are independent of the injury inflicted or the legal wrong committed, and are allowed in excess of simple compensation upon a theory of punishing the wrongdoer for the wrong inflicted, with the view to prevent similar wrongs in future. Where a trespass is committed deliberately in violation of plaintiff's rights, in a manner and under circumstances of aggravation and humiliation, showing a reckless and lawless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, the law allows damages beyond the strict measure of compensation by way of punishment. Champion v. Vincent, 20 Tex. 811; Joyce on Damages, § 28, and notes.

The facts are, as testified to by the plaintiff, that he applied to the defendant's agent at Almond for a ticket to Noland. The agent said he did not have any, and that "I could get on, and he would speak to the conductor about it, and that the fare would be 40 cents. I rode down the road about quarter of a mile, and the conductor came to me and said he wanted a ticket, and I handed him 50 cents, and said I wanted to go to Noland's Creek, and he looked at his book and said it would be 75 cents, and I asked him if he was not mistaken, and he said, 'No,' and I told him I would not pay 75 cents, and so he told me I would have to get off. I told him I had applied for a ticket and the agent said he didn't have any, and he said they did have tickets, and I told him I didn't know anything about it, only what they told me; that they told me they didn't have any tickets, and the fare would be 40 cents, and he told me then I would have to get off. So I told him, if he put me off, I would sue the railroad company, and he pulled the cord and stopped the train and I walked out. Q. What did he say in reply to you when you said you would sue the railroad company? A. He said he could not help that. Q. Is that all he said? A. I believe that is all he said. Q. Can't you remember what he did say when you said to him that you would sue the company? A. He said several words. I don't remember every word he said. Q. Think if you know anything else? A. I don't think of anything else. Q. Where did he put you off? A. I got off by his instructions. He told me to get off. Q. Where? A. About a quarter of a mile this side of Almond. Q. How far is the station you wanted to go to from there? A. About 14 miles by rail. Q. What were you doing at that time? A. I was working on Noland's Creek. Q. What were you getting a day? A. Dollar and twenty-five cents. Q. Did you put in a day's work? A. No, I walked in in the evening, and went to work the next morning. I didn't hire anything. I walked. I just lost a day's work, is all. Q. How much did you lose? A. The day. Q. Is that all you recollect about this transaction? A. Yes, I believe it is."

To entitle a passenger to such damages, his wrongful expulsion from the train must be attended by such circumstances as tend to show rudeness, insult, "aggravating circumstances calculated to humiliate the passenger. * * * Holmes v. Railroad, 84 N. C. 318; Rose v. Railroad, 106 N. C. 170, 11 S. E. 528; Knowles v. Railroad, 102 N. C. 66, 9 S. E. 7. The subject of punitive and compensatory damages has been discussed in many cases in our own reports. In the opinion in this case at the last term, Mr. Justice Walker called attention to some of the more important. The plaintiff's testimony fails to bring his case within the authority of any of these precedents so as to justify the awarding of punitive damages. On the next trial of this case, it will be the duty of the trial judge to explain to the jury the meaning of, and difference between punitive and compensatory damages, and to instruct them upon the plaintiff's own testimony, as herein set out, that he is entitled to compensatory damages only.

The findings upon the several issues are set aside, and a new trial ordered.

New trial.

HOKE, J. (concurring). I concur in the decision awarding a new trial, and in the opinion, which declares that the facts set out in the record disclose no case for the recovery of punitive or exemplary damages.

There seems, however, to have been some misapprehension, on the trial below, as to the elements of damage involved in the two issues addressed to that question. These issues were: "(7) What is the actual damage sustained? (8) What exemplary damages if any is plaintiff entitled to recover?" The court below and the parties litigant seem to have considered that the seventh issue, on actual damages, was confined to pecuniary loss, and that any recovery over and above this must be had, if at all, on the eighth issue, above set out. But this is not at all true. "Actual" in the sense of compensatory damages, is not restricted necessarily to the actual loss in time or money. The claimant may be confined to this, if the jury so determine, but more than this is contained in the term, and more than this is covered by the issue. As said by Clark, C. J., in Osborn v. Leach, 135 N. C. 628, 47 S. E. 811, 66 L. R. A. 48, where the facts and nature of the action so warrant: "Actual damages include pecuniary loss, physical pain, and mental suffering, etc." And, again: "Compensatory damages include all other damages than punitive, thus embracing, not only special damage as direct pecuniary loss, but injury to feelings, mental anguish, etc."—citing 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 1082; Hale on Damages, pp. 99, 106. And this last author says: "It may be stated as a general rule in actions of tort, that whenever a wrong is committed which will support an action to recover some damages, compensation for mental suffering may also be recovered, if such suffering follows as a natural and proximate result." And so here, where a passenger is wrongfully ejected from a railroad train, the demand may be considered as one in tort, and, on an issue as to actual or compensatory damages, he may recover what the jury may decide to be a fair and just compensation for the injury, including his actual loss in time or money, the physical inconvenience and mental suffering or humiliation endured, and which could be considered as a reasonable and probable result of the wrong done. McNeill v. Railroad, 135 N. C. 683, 47 S. E. 765, 67 L. R. A. 227; Head v. Railroad, 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. 217, 11 Am. St. Rep. 434; Hale on Damages, § 261. As said by Bleckley, J., in Head's Case: "Wounding a man's feelings is as much actual damage as breaking his limb. The difference is that one is internal, and the other external; one mental, the other physical. * * * At common law, compensatory damages include, upon principle, and I think upon authority, salve for wounded feelings, and our Code had no purpose to deny such damages where the common law allowed them."

Exemplary or punitive damages are not given with a view to compensation, but are under certain circumstances awarded in addition to compensation as a punishment to defendant and as a warning to other wrongdoers. They are not allowed as a matter of course, but only where there are some features of aggravation, as when the wrong is done willfully and maliciously, or under circumstances of rudeness or oppression, or in a manner which evinces a reckless and wanton disregard of plaintiff's rights. It is not necessary to submit this element of damage under a separate issue, but there is no objection to this course, and frequently it is desirable. As stated in the principal opinion, there are no circumstances of aggravation, shown in this evidence, which would justify an award of exemplary damages; but on the issue as to actual or compensatory damages the jury under proper instructions should be directed to award what in their judgment is a fair compensation for the plaintiff's wrong under the principle here stated, and not confined to the actual loss in time or money as was done on the former trial.

CLARK, C. J., and WALKER and CONNOR, JJ., concur in concurring opinion.

WOODWARD et al. v. SANTEE RIVER CYPRESS LUMBER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 16, 1905.)

PARTITION—COMPLAINT—JOINDER OF CAUSES.

A complainant asking for the partition of the swamp lands of the estate of B., devised under his will, plaintiffs claiming one-third interest therein as remaindermen, and alleging tenancy in common with the defendant entitled to two-thirds interest as to the T. tract, and tenancy in common with another defendant entitled to two-thirds interest in the V. tract, and further alleging that defendants trace their title through conveyances to those who held under the will of the decedent as tenants in common, with plaintiffs as remaindermen, states only one cause of action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumpter County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Lila M. Woodward and others against the Santee River Cypress Lumber Company and E. M. Brayton. From an order overruling a demurrer, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Smythe, Lee & Frost, Thomas & Gibbes, and Mark Reynolds, for appellant lumber company. Allen J. Green, Ragsdale & Dixon, and Cooper & Fraser, for respondents.

JONES, J. The defendants appeal from the order of Judge Dantzler overruling their separate demurrers to the complaint upon the ground of misjoinder of causes of action. This renders it necessary to state substantially the allegations of the complaint, and we adopt the statement of the complaint as contained in respondent's argument, as follows: The complaint (1) alleges the death, testate, of N. M. Bynum, probate of his will and qualification of his executor; (2) sets out Nos. 3, 4, 8, and 10 of his will, by which it appears the estate was to be appraised and divided into nine equal shares, and upon the division being made, one-ninth should be held in trust for his daughter, Mrs. Mobley, for life, and after her death to her children then living in fee, one-ninth should be conveyed to his son, Robert, which ninth should include a moiety of the Taylor tract, heretofore advanced him and his brother Clarence, at its appraised value, and one other ninth to Clarence, upon the same conditions as to Robert's share; (3) describes the "Taylor tract"; (4) alleges that in pursuance of the terms of the will, in order to participate in the partition of the said estate, Robert and Clarence surrendered their deeds to the Taylor tract, and the lands thereby conveyed were thrown into "hotch pot," and appraised and divided with the residue of the estate, on the 28th of November, 1876; sets out the return in partition, by which it appears 553 acres of the residuary estate was added to the upland of the Taylor tract, and made the same in judgment of commissioners in partition fully two-ninths of the land belonging to said estate, and all the swamp lands were allotted to shares Nos. 4, 5, and 6, to equalize the division; (5) that Mrs. Mobley received lot No. 4, which carried with it the undivided one-third of all the swamp land, including the swamp that before partition had been attached to the Taylor tract, and the same became vested in her for life, with remainder to her children in fee; (6) an attempted conveyance by the executor prior to the partition of the Taylor swamp to Robert and Clarence, purporting to be made in pursuance of the partition, but in direct contravention thereof, which deed is alleged to be inoperative, in so far as plaintiffs' one-third interest is concerned; (7) that the said Taylor swamp has, through successive conveyances from the executor and his grantees, with full notice of the partition and settlement and of the rights of plaintiffs thereunder, passed into the possession of defendant Brayton, and is now held by him, and the defendant Santee Company claims the timber rights on the said lands, and holds same with full notice and in subordination of plaintiffs' right; (8) the remainder of the swamp land of the said estate consists of the Van Buren tract, and, under the terms of the will and partition, became vested in the persons who received shares Nos. 4, 5, and 6, to wit, Mrs. Mobley, John T. and Julius A. Bynum, notwithstanding which John T. and Julius A., the latter of whom since partition had qualified as executor, by deed dated 11th of January, 1882, but not recorded until the 11th of February, 1889, attempted to convey the same for a nominal consideration to Mrs. Bynum, the wife of Julius, which deed is alleged to be void and inoperative as to the one-third interest of the plaintiffs; (9) that Mrs. Bynum took the said land with full notice of the rights of the plaintiffs and their mother, and the same has, through successive conveyances from her, and with full notice of the rights and interest of the plaintiffs, passed into the possession of the defendant Santee Company by deed of June 9, 1900; (10) death of Mrs. Mobley and survival of plaintiffs, her children; (11) insanity of N. F. Mobley and appointment of his guardian ad litem; (12) corporation of Santee Company; (13) that plaintiffs and defendant Brayton are tenants in common of Taylor swamp, described in paragraph 6; plaintiffs being each entitled to an undivided six-eighths thereof, and defendant the remaining twelve-eighteenths thereof; and plaintiffs and defendant Santee Company are tenants in common of the Van Buren swamp tract, described in paragraph eight, in the same proportion, and own no other lands in common; (14) that these lands are principally valuable for their timber, and plaintiffs charge the Santee Company with cutting, removing, and converting the timber to its own use. The prayer is: (1) That Santee Company account for waste, and pay one-third of the value thereof to plaintiffs; (2) that the land be partitioned between plaintiffs and defendants; (3) injunction to prevent further waste pending suit.

The demurrer is in these words: "The defendant the Santee River Cypress Lumber Company demurs to the complaint herein on the ground that several causes of action have been united therein, in that (a) one cause of action affects one tract of land, the 'Taylor tract,' involving one set of parties and questions of fact and law; (b) another cause of action affects a different tract, the 'Van Buren tract,' involving another set of parties and other and different questions of fact and law; and neither of these causes of action, nor the property and parties involved therein, is necessarily or properly connected with the other. And the rights and remedies concerning each should and must be set up and determined in separate suits." A similar demurrer was filed by E. M. Brayton.

We think it is clear that the complaint states only one cause of action, for the partition of the swamp lands of the estate of N. F. Bynum, devised under his will, the plaintiffs claiming one-third interest therein as remaindermen under said will and alleging tenancy in common with the defendant E. M. Brayton, entitled to a two-thirds interest, as to the "Taylor tract," and tenancy in common with defendant Santee River Cypress Lumber Company, entitled to a two-thirds interest, as to the "Van Buren tract." The complaint further alleges that the defendants trace their titles through mesne conveyances to those who held under the will of N. F. Bynum, as tenants in common with plaintiffs as remaindermen, and that they took their titles with full knowledge and notice of the rights and interests of the plaintiffs. The case falls within the rule stated in Garret v. Weinberg, 43 S. C. 36, 20 S. E. 756, which held that the issue of an intestate father may bring one action for the partition of all his lands, properly joining as parties defendant the grantees of the widow's interest in said lands, severally owning separate parcels. This case is so full to the point that it is unnecessary to cite other authority. The case of Albergott v. Chaplin, 10 Rich. Eq. 428, 433, is relied on by the appellants to sustain their view, but that case is clearly distinguishable from this. In Albergott's Case it was sought to compel Chaplin and Sams, in adverse possession of land, to surrender the land, that it might be partitioned among the other parties to the cause. Partition was not sought as against Chaplin and Sams, and as to them the cause of action was not partition but for the recovery of land; whereas, in the present action, partition is sought as against the defendants as tenants in common. The court said: "There is no alleged privity between the parties, nor anything to constitute the occupants 'tenants in common' with the plaintiffs; so that, if the court should order an issue or an action to try titles, the result of such trial could not bring back the cause here for partition."

In this case there is alleged privity between the parties as tenants in common. Assuming the allegations of the complaint to be true, the effect of the conveyance to the defendants was to make them tenants in common with plaintiffs. Young v. Edwards, 33 S. C. 404, 11 S. E. 1066, 10 L. R. A. 55, 26 Am. St. Rep. 689. The fact that each defendant is in possession of a separate parcel of the real property of the estate of Bynum does not affect the question, since plaintiffs' right of partition applies to the lands as a whole because of their tenancy in common therein with the grantors of defendants.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not participate in this opinion because of illness.

LOCKWOOD v. LOCKWOOD.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 15, 1905.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALE OF LANDS—PAYMENT OF PROCEEDS.

Where an executrix sued to marshal assets and prove claims, in which the court directed a master to sell lands and pay the proceeds, less expenses of sale to the executrix, and she claimed that the master had retained a greater sum than was allowable under the order, an application for an order requiring the master to pay the balance to the executrix was properly continued until the costs were adjusted.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Beaufort County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by Laura M. Lockwood against one Lockwood. Application by plaintiff for an order requiring the master to pay proceeds of sale to her. From an order continuing her motion, she appeals. Affirmed.

George Galletly, for appellant. Thos. Talbird, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff, as executrix of the will of William H. Lockwood, deceased, brought this action for the purpose of marshaling the assets of the estate of said deceased, calling in creditors, and winding up said estate under the direction of the court. Judge Townsend referred the cause to the master of Beaufort county to take proof of claims against said estate and report the same to the court, requiring creditors to establish their claims in this action and restraining them from otherwise enforcing their claims. Under this order, it appears that 208 claims of creditors, aggregating about $50,000, were established before the master. On January 8, 1903, Judge Ernest Gary made a decree in the case, ordering the master to sell the land of the estate; the order further containing this direction: "That out of the moneys arising from such sale, after deducting the amount of his fees and expenses on such sale, the master pay the same to the plaintiff, Laura M. Lockwood, as executrix of William H. Lockwood, deceased." Under this decree, the master sold the real estate in February, 1903, for $11,025, and out of this sum paid over to the plaintiff, executrix, $10,000, retaining the balance in his hands for costs and expenses. The plaintiff, claiming that the master was only entitled to retain in his hands "as fees and expenses on said sale" the sum of $158.25, filed her petition asking the court to require the master to pay over to her the sum of $866.75, and upon this petition Judge Purdy issued a rule requiring the master to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay over the said sum. The master made return claiming that he had paid out, as clerk's costs, $17.75; master's commissions, $168.37; advertising $2; stamps, stationery, etc., $18; printer's bill, $53.10—and, further, that he had held 209 references in the case, for which he claimed at least $740, which would leave on his hands $25.78, which he retained to cover any future costs that might arise. Plaintiff's counsel made affidavit to the effect that there has never been a reference in the cause, and no testimony had been taken or argument had; that if any testimony had been taken it had been done without the knowledge of or notice to plaintiff's counsel; that 208 claims were filed with the master, with the usual proof necessary before the same could be filed. Judge Purdy thereupon made the following order: "With the costs to which the master may be entitled unadjusted, I think it proper that the hearing of the rule should be continued until the adjustment of the matter of costs; and it is so ordered. Let the master, in the meantime, hold all the funds in his hands, subject to the order of this court." From this order, plaintiff appeals, alleging error in not making the rule absolute; in continuing the hearing of the rule until the adjustment of the matter of costs; in directing the master to hold said funds, in the meantime, in conflict with the previous decree of Judge Gary, directing the money to be paid over to the executrix, after deducting fees and expenses on said sale.

The circuit court expressed no opinion as to the correctness of the claims made by the master for costs, fees, commissions, or disbursements; and in such case it would not be proper for this court to do so. This is a case in chancery, and, in the absence of an order providing otherwise, the same rule as to costs prevails as in cases at law. Section 323, Code Civ. Proc. 1902. The usual method of taxing costs and disbursements is by motion before the clerk of the court, and if any one is not satisfied with the action of the clerk, appeal therefrom or motion to correct, before the circuit court, from which an appeal may be taken to this court. Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 6 S. C. 290; Cooke v. Poole, 26 S. C. 326, 2 S. E. 609; Hecht & Co. v. Friesleben, 28 S. C. 186, 5 S. E. 475. When Judge Purdy ascertained that the costs and disbursements of the case had not been taxed by the clerk, or pursuant to the order of the court of equity, it was perfectly competent for him to continue the hearing of the rule until the costs and disbursements had been adjusted in the regular and usual way. This order was especially proper, when it appeared to him that a dispute had arisen as to the propriety of certain costs and disbursements. His order was, in effect, a continuance of the cause or hearing for the purpose of acquiring information for the guidance of his action, and was entirely within his discretion. His order was not final, and in no way prejudiced whatever right appellant may have in the premises.

While it is well settled that one circuit judge cannot review, reverse, or modify, any order by another circuit judge, unless it is administrative in character, we do not regard the order of Judge Purdy, requiring the fund to remain in the hands of the master until determination of the hearing on the rule, as at all conflicting with the order of Judge Gary. Judge Gary's order, it is true, required the master to turn over to the executrix the balance of the proceeds of sale after deducting the master's "fees and expenses on sale," but the object of Judge Gary's order was to place the fund in the hands of the executrix to be disbursed by her according to law and the order of the court. In the absence of an order making the executrix personally liable for the same, the costs and disbursements in the case are chargeable upon the funds of the estate. Section 330, Code Civ. Proc. 1902. So that no matter in whose hands the funds may be, whether in the hands of the master or the executrix, they are subject to the payment of all proper costs and disbursements. The fund being still in the court of equity, it is proper that due provision be made for the payment of the costs and expenses chargeable thereon.

The order of the circuit court is affirmed.

WITTE et al. v. CAVE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 15, 1905.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT.

Under Rev. Code Civ. Proc. § 88, giving magistrates power to change the place of trial in cases pending before them, an affidavit on motion to remove stating as the reasons therefor an opinion of the affiant that the magistrate is so fixed in his views that the trial will unalterably result in a judgment against the affiant, based on appealable rulings of the magistrate at a former trial, is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Venue, § 71.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Dantzer, Judge.

Proceeding before Magistrate W. P. Sanders to eject trespasser by W. W. Moore, agent of C. O. Witte and E. H. Sparkman, against A. C. Cave. From circuit order affirming order of magistrate refusing to change venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Best, for appellant. Bates & Simmons, for respondents.

JONES, J. In this proceeding before a magistrate, under section 2423, vol. 1, of the Revised Civil Code, to dispossess the defendant, after a mistrial before a jury and before the call of the case for a second trial, upon affidavit, he made a motion for a change of venue to the next nearest magistrate. The magistrate denied the motion and proceeded with the trial of the case and rendered judgment against the defendant. On appeal therefrom the circuit court affirmed the judgment of the magistrate, holding, with reference to change the venue, that the affidavit upon which it was based was not sufficient to make it the duty of the magistrate to remove the case, under the rule stated in Bacot v. Deas, 67 S. C. 248, 45 S. E. 171. The correctness of this determination is the only question presented by this appeal.

The affidavit for removal is as follows: "Before me personally appeared A. C. Cave, who, after being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the defendant in the above-entitled cause; that he does not believe he can get a fair and impartial trial in the above-entitled action before Magistrate W. P. Sanders for the following reasons: First. That said magistrate is prejudiced against deponent and in favor of the plaintiff in this: (a) That this proceeding has already been tried before said magistrate, who ruled out all of defendant's testimony. (b) That said magistrate has expressed himself to the effect that he would not allow the defendant to prove anything except the question of landlord and tenant. (c) That said magistrate has expressed himself by saying that the defendant cannot prove any circumstances or contract between the plaintiffs and himself going to sustain his return (which is made a part of this affidavit) except in writing. (d) That the deponent is informed by his counsel and verily believes that the magistrate herein is so fixed in his views about this case that the trial before him will unalterably result in practically directing a verdict for the plaintiff. (e) That said magistrate positively refuses to allow defendant to prove his answer to the rule save by an instrument of writing or some memorandum in the nature thereof. Wherefore the deponent prays that the case be transferred to the nearest magistrate for trial, as required by law. A. C. Cave."

The circuit court correctly held that the reasons assigned by the appellant in his affidavit were not reasons, but were statements of opinions based upon the rulings of the magistrate made during the first hearing of the case, rulings on the law and appealable to the circuit court, and that the affidavit stated no ground or fact showing that a fair trial could not be had before the magistrate. The statute (section 88 of the Revised Code of Civil Procedure), which gives magistrates power to change the place of trial in cases pending before them, requires that the party applying therefor shall file with the magistrate an affidavit to the effect that he does not believe that he can obtain a fair trial before the magistrate, and further provides that such affidavit shall set forth the grounds of such belief. When these requirements are complied with and due notice of motion given, it is the duty of the magistrate to transfer the case, and it is reversible error of law to proceed with the trial. State v. Conkle, 64 S. C. 372, 42 S. E. 173. But in the case of Bacot v. Deas, 67 S. C. 245, 248, 45 S. E. 171, where the defendant in his affidavit stated "that he does not believe that he can obtain a fair and impartial trial before Magistrate H. E. P. Sanders, for the reason that said magistrate is prejudiced against him on account of certain matters which have come up in the past between them," this court held that the magistrate committed no error in holding the affidavit insufficient and proceeding with the trial. The court, in effect, held that the affidavit should state facts tending to show that a fair trial cannot be had before the magistrate, that it is not sufficient to state the mere opinion of the affiant, and that the affidavit should contain such statement of facts as would form the basis of an indictment for perjury. Tested by this rule, the affidavit must be held insufficient.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

POPE, C. J., did not participate in this opinion because of illness.

FISH v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

DISORDERLY CONDUCT — QUESTION FOR JURY — INSTRUCTIONS.

On the trial of one indicted for using opprobrious words and abusive language, it is for the jury to determine whether under all the facts and circumstances the words used were of such character as that the use of them was calculated to cause a breach of the peace, as well as to determine whether there was provocation sufficient to excuse their use. It is therefore error for the judge to instruct the jury as a matter of law that the words alleged in the indictment are opprobrious and abusive within the meaning of the statute, and that a given set of facts would not be a sufficient provocation for their use. Williams v. State, 31 S. E. 733, 105 Ga. 608; Echols v. State, 34 S. E. 289, 110 Ga. 257; Hanson v. State, 39 S. E. 942, 114 Ga. 104.

JOHNSON v. STATE.

VAGRANCY—CONVICTION OF MINOR.

Under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 46), on the subject of vagrancy, it was held in Braswell v. State, 45 S. E. 963, 119 Ga. 72, that "where upon the trial of a minor, between sixteen and twenty-one years of age, for vagrancy, there was no evidence that her parents were unable to support her, a conviction was unwarranted, and a new trial should have been granted upon the ground that the verdict was without evidence to support it." If the minor was under 16 years of age, she could not be convicted of vagrancy. Teasley v. State, 34 S. E. 577, 109 Ga. 282; Henderson v. State, 37 S. E. 98, 112 Ga. 19. The act of August 23, 1905, contains a provision similar to that contained in the act of 1903, in regard to persons over 16 years of age able to work and who do not work, and have no property to support them, and who are not in attendance upon some educational institute. Acts 1905, p. 109, subsec. 8. It follows from the former rulings of this court, and from the making of a special provision in the act of 1905 in regard to children over 16 years of age, that, if the child is less than that age, he or she is not subject to be convicted of vagrancy thereunder.

McGOWAN et al. v. STATE.

HIGHWAYS—OBSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

An indictment charging one with obstructing and encroaching upon a registered road is not supported by evidence which shows that the road was laid out by a district road commissioner and two citizens of the district who acted with him, there being no proof whatever that the road was "registered" as contemplated and provided by law (Pol. Code 1895, § 516, et seq.), and a conviction under such state of facts is unwarranted by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Highways, § 452.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Catoosa County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Alice McGowan and others were convicted of obstructing a highway, and bring error. Reversed.

Payne & Payne, for plaintiffs in error. Saml. P. Maddox, Sol. Gen., and W. E. Mann, for the State.

BECK, J. Alice McGowan and Grace M. Cooke were found guilty of the offense of obstructing a registered road. Under an agreed statement of facts it appears that the road which was obstructed was regularly laid out by a legally commissioned road commissioner and two citizens who lived in the district, who were appointed and acted with the district road commissioner. Publication was made giving notice that the road would be established, and the following order was passed by the board: "And considering the foregoing report, the board ordered that publication be made, and publication having been made as the law provides, and no objection having been filed, the board now order that said new road be established." It was admitted "that all necessary publication had been made; that [two of the citizens who served on the board] were not district road commissioners at any time, but Deckert [one of the board] was; that the road was obstructed by defendants as charged in the presentment; and that the district road commissioner gave the necessary notice to defendants to remove the obstructions from the road, which defendants refused to do." After their conviction the defendants made a motion for a new trial upon the general grounds, to the overruling of which they excepted.

The indictment in this case was based upon sections 534 and 535 of the Penal Code of 1895. It is obvious that the expressions "a public road that has been registered as required by law," in section 534, and "road registered as aforesaid," and "registered public road," in section 535, have reference to the public roads which have been entered upon the book, known as the "Public Road Register," which, under the law, the county commissioners and the ordinaries, where there are no county commissioners, are required to prepare and keep in their offices, and in which a list of all public roads are required to be entered. And in the case under consideration, there being no evidence whatever that the road described in the indictment and alleged to have been a "registered road" had been entered upon the "public road register," the verdict was without evidence to support it, and the court below erred in not granting a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

WALKER et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — FILING.

Where, upon the filing of a motion for a new trial, the judge by order fixes a day certain for the presentation for approval of a brief of the evidence, and no brief is filed within the time fixed by the order, and the motion is subsequently dismissed on that account, such motion is not "legally dead" until the judgment of dismissal; and a bill of exceptions complaining of such judgment and other rulings on the trial of the case is in time, if it is filed within 20 days after the judgment of dismissal, although a longer time has elapsed since the date set by the order for the presentation of the brief of evidence.

2. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL —INDICTMENT.

An indictment charging that the accused committed an assault with intent to murder "with certain pieces of iron in their hands held," but which fails to describe the manner of the assault or the character of the pieces of iron, is lacking in the requisite particularity; and an appropriate special demurrer pointing out this defect should be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 247, 248.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Schley County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

G. T. Walker and others were convicted of assault with intent to kill, and bring error. Reversed.

J. J. Durnham and Zach Childers, for plaintiffs in error. F. A. Hooper, Sol. Gen., for the State.

CANDLER, J. The indictment charged the accused with the offense of assault with intent to murder, for that they did on a day named "unlawfully and with force and arms, with certain pieces of iron in their hands held," feloniously, and of their malice aforethought, make an assault in and upon the person of T. G. Hudson," etc. The accused demurred to the indictment generally, and on the special grounds, in effect, that it was not alleged that the "pieces of iron" referred to in the indictment were weapons likely to produce death, and that the offense charged against them was not set out with sufficient particularity to put them on notice of the offense charged against them. The demurrer was overruled, and the accused excepted pendente lite. They were then put on trial, and were found guilty, whereupon they moved for a new trial. When the motion came on to be heard it was dismissed on motion of the solicitor general, on the ground that a brief of the evidence introduced on the trial had not been presented to the judge for his approval within the time fixed by the order passed at the time the motion was made. In their bill of exceptions to this court the accused assign error upon the overruling of their demurrer to the indictment, and upon the dismissal of their motion for a new trial.

1. On the call of the case in this court, a motion was made by the Solicitor General to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that the bill of exceptions was not filed in time. Quoting from the motion: "It should have been filed within 20 days after the date set for the presentation of the brief of evidence, and not having been so filed, it is now too late to bring same to this court upon the exceptions pendente lite; the defendant in error contending that the motion in law died on that date, and if plaintiffs in error desired to have same reviewed by this honorable court, it should have been excepted to within 20 days from the date aforesaid." We cannot agree with the view taken by the able solicitor that the motion-in-law "died" on the day set for the presentation and approval of the brief of evidence. To be sure, it contracted a mortal illness when that day passed without a compliance by the accused with the order of the judge, but dissolution did not actually set in until the official action of the judge dismissing the motion. As the bill of exceptions was filed within 20 days after that action, the writ of error will not be dismissed.

2. It is not essential to the validity of every indictment for assault with intent to murder that it allege that the assault was committed with a weapon likely to produce death; for, as was pointed out in Monday's Case, 32 Ga. 672, 79 Am. Dec. 314, and Johnson's Case, 92 Ga. 38, 17 S. E. 974 (3), the offense may be committed without the use of any weapon at all. It is essential, however, where the instrumentality of some physical agency is alleged, that the indictment should describe the manner of its use with sufficient particularity to put the accused on notice as to the nature of the assault which is charged. Thus, in Johnson's Case, 90 Ga. 441, 16 S. E. 92, it was held not sufficient to charge the use of "arsenic poison, and other poisons to the grand jurors unknown," without setting forth the manner in which the poisons were administered. The admirable reasoning of Mr. Justice Lumpkin in that case is strikingly applicable to the case now under consideration. "Fleeces of iron" may be of as many different sorts, and used in as many different ways, as poisons; and the accused were entitled to have notice of the character of the assault charged against them. The demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

ADAIR et al. v. CITY OF ATLANTA et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT — TEMPORARY CLOSING OF STREET.

A city may, in the proper exercise of its discretion, and as a movement in the direction of public improvement, build a bridge in one of its streets, and incidentally close the street during the reasonable duration of the work. In like manner the municipal authorities may authorize a railroad company to build the bridge for the benefit of the city, giving it power to close the street for a reasonable time while the work is being done.

2. SAME—FEE OF STREET—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNERS.

Where the fee to a street is in the abutting lot owners, and excavations are made in the street and a bridge erected thereover, the surface of the street underneath the bridge may be used by the owners of the fee in any manner not inconsistent with the right of the public.

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ORDER.

The order amendatory of the original judgment denying an injunction was unnecessary, but will not require a reversal of the judgment. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Forest Adair and others against the city of Atlanta and others. Judgment for defendants, and both parties bring error. Affirmed.

J. L. Mayson, W. P. Hill, and Dorsey, Brewster & Horsell, for plaintiffs in error. J. L. Hopkins & Sons and Rosser & Brandon, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. On Nelson street, in the city of Atlanta, is a bridge, owned and maintained by the city, over numerous tracks of the Southern Railway Company and other railroad corporations. The approach to this bridge on the east over Nelson street, from the corner of Nelson street and Madison avenue, is a gradual rise for a distance of several hundred feet; the street at the beginning of the bridge being about 30 feet above the level of the railroad right of way. The land on both sides of Nelson street, between Madison avenue and the bridge, is owned by the Southern Railway Company. It is the purpose of the company to erect freight terminals on this land. An agreement was made between the Southern Railway Company and the municipal authorities of the city of Atlanta, the substantial effect of which was that the railroad company bound itself to construct for the city a metal viaduct on Nelson street, beginning at Madison avenue and extending over its right of way to a point a short distance west of the western end of the present bridge, to hold the city harmless on account of any damages that might arise out of the construction of the viaduct, and to perpetually maintain and keep the viaduct in repair when constructed, without expense to the city. It also agreed that the work should be completed within nine months, during which time the city agreed that Nelson street, between Madison avenue and Elliott street (the western terminus of the proposed viaduct), should be closed to travel. Though it was not expressed in the written agreement between the city and the railroad company, it is admitted that there was also a stipulation, or understanding, that the present grade of Nelson street should be lowered to the level of the railroad right of way; it being proposed to build the viaduct on the present street level, and to allow the railroad company to build its terminal under the viaduct and on the level of the street as lowered. At the western end of the present bridge Nelson street turns sharply to the south for a distance of 255 feet, running during that distance directly alongside the railroad right of way. It then turns obliquely, and continues in a general westerly direction. At this latter turning point in the street is situated a lot owned by the Adair estate, one of the plaintiffs in the court below. The lot is a triangle; its longest side abutting on the railroad right of way. Some distance west of the Adair property, on Nelson street, is that of Mrs. Mynatt, the other plaintiff. The present suit was brought by Adair and Mrs. Mynatt against the city and the Southern Railway Company, to enjoin the performance of the contract already referred to, to prevent the closing of Nelson street, and to prevent the digging down of the present Nelson street grade, and the erection thereon of the railroad freight terminals. By amendment, the Central of Georgia Railway Company was made a party defendant to the action. The petition alleged that the contract was without authority of law, and claimed that they would be damaged by reason of the fact that communication between their property and the business portion of the city of Atlanta would be cut off, and that the value of their property would be lessened by the erection of the proposed freight terminals. At the hearing an injunction was denied, but on the day following the rendition of the judgment the court passed the following order: "The judgment heretofore rendered in the above-stated case, * * * denying the injunction prayed for, is amended as follows: The court found, upon the evidence introduced, that the two petitioners each suffered a special injury, differing in kind from that sustained by the general public." The plaintiff excepted to the denial of an injunction, and the defendants filed a cross-bill of exceptions, in which they complained of the supplemental order purporting to amend the judgment as originally rendered.

1. It was conceded that the present Nelson Street Bridge is sufficient for the needs of the city to-day. It was shown that it is necessary, however, for the city to make occasional repairs upon it in order to keep it in reasonably safe condition for the requirements of public travel, and that the proposed viaduct, which, under the terms of the contract, is to be kept in repair without expense to the city, will be a much more substantial structure, and better suited to the probable future needs of the city. Indeed, there was abundant evidence to the effect that the proposed viaduct will be in the nature of a very great public improvement. It will hardly be doubted that the city, under these circumstances, would have had the right to build such a viaduct itself, and to close the street to travel for a reasonable time for that purpose, provided, always, that the discretion given it by law in the management of its affairs were not abused. Tuggle v. Atlanta, 57 Ga. 114. This being so, we can conceive of no reason why the city may not also, in the exercise of that discretion, grant authority for the work to be done by a railroad or other corporation, or indeed by an individual. The city, of course, can act only through agents. Ordinarily, in building a bridge it would necessarily let the work to a contractor. No reason occurs to us why, in selecting an agent for the work, it may not choose a railroad corporation rather than a corporation or an individual whose regular business is that of building bridges; and the fact that in doing so the city makes an unusually good trade, securing a modern structure free of cost and the necessity to keep it in future repair, furnishes no argument why the bridge should not be built in this manner, or why the street may not be closed during its construction. In the present case there was no contention that nine months would be an unreasonable length of time to take for the building of a bridge or viaduct of the character of the one proposed, or that there will be any abuse of discretion on the part of the city or its agents in the manner of doing the work. The fact that the Southern Railway Company is a foreign corporation, and has no power of eminent domain, does not, of course, affect the situation; for, as already pointed out, the work is to be done, in effect, by the city through the railroad company as its agent. We are clear that the city had the power to close the street.

2. We come now to consider whether or not the city may, as an incident to the work of building the new Nelson street viaduct, and as part of the consideration for the work to be done and kept in repair by the railroad company, allow that company to excavate the street from its present level to the level of the company's right of way, and erect thereon buildings which are to be a part of its proposed freight terminals. In making this question, of course, the plaintiffs have no standing in court as taxpayers or members of the public, but it is necessary for them to allege and prove special damage to themselves growing out of the alleged illegal transaction. Coast Line R. Co. v. Cohen, 50 Ga. 451; Coker v. Railway Co., 123 Ga. 483, 51 S. E. 481. Indeed, this entire suit is predicated upon an injury to the property rights of the plaintiffs. How the erection of buildings on this little strip of ground, many hundred feet removed from the plaintiff's land, can affect the value of that land injuriously is somewhat difficult to understand; but there is evidence in the record from which such an inference could be drawn, and the question must therefore be decided. It will be borne in mind that the railroad company owns the property on both sides of Nelson street at the point where the excavations are in contemplation, and that presumptively it owns the fee to the entire street at that point, subject always to the public right to its use as a highway. It will also be borne in mind that at the present Nelson Street Bridge the street runs into a sort of cul-de-sac, being at that point some 30 feet higher than the level of the railroad right of way, so that for the block between Madison avenue and the present bridge the space beneath the surface of the street is entirely useless to the city for water or sewer pipes, or for any other conceivable municipal purpose. It will hardly be contended that the city would not ordinarily have the right to excavate its streets and build bridges across the chasm caused thereby, if, on account of the peculiar topography of the surroundings, and in the wise exercise of the discretion vested in it, it was deemed necessary or prudent. Is it, then, necessary that the surface ground under the bridge must forever remain idle for any purpose whatever? We think the true answer to be that the fee would remain just where it had been all along, and that the rule applicable to it would be in no wise different from the rule governing all public highways, viz., that the abutting property owners could put it to any use not inconsistent with its use as a public highway. Under the proposed arrangement between the city and the railroad company the latter will get only what it already has—the right to use its fee in the street in a manner not inconsistent with the right of the public to a highway. The case of Coker v. Railway Company, 123 Ga. 483, 51 S. E. 481, is not in any sense in conflict with what is here ruled. There it was proposed virtually to abandon a street and close it for all time to the public. For a brief time a substitute was to be provided in the form of an improvised parallel street, which was to furnish an outlet for the travel which would have gone over the street which it was proposed to close, but the agreement between the city and the railroad company contemplated that eventually the new street should be given back to the railroad company, while no substitute was provided to take its place. It was held that the power to "open, lay out, to widen, straighten, or otherwise change" streets contained in the city's charter did not comprehend the power to make the changes indicated. Here there is no question of abandoning a street or of changing its course. The public will have the same thoroughfare open to it that it has to-day. Its convenience will not be lessened, nor the distance one will have to go between any two points increased in the slightest degree by the proposed improvement. The only difference will be that, instead of going over a dirt surface, it will pass over a metal viaduct. The case of Hanbury v. Woodward Lumber Co., 98 Ga. 54, 26 S. E. 477, is very closely in point, if it is not controlling of the question now under discussion. It was there held that where, as in the present case, the fee to a street was in the abutting lot owners, the municipal corporation holding only an easement as for a right of way, "the municipal corporation may, with or without express statutory authority, in the exercise of its general discretion touching the control of the public ways, permit the owner of the fee to appropriate to its own private personal use that portion of the land covered by such street which is opposite to his abutting lots, provided such use be not inconsistent with the reasonable exercise upon the part of the public of its concurrent right of way." Counsel for the plaintiffs sought to distinguish the Hanbury Case from the case at bar, but the distinction drawn is one of fact only; in principle there is none.

3. There remains to be considered only the question raised by the cross-bill of exceptions, viz., whether the court erred in passing the order seeking to amend the original judgment by an adjudication that the plaintiffs would suffer special damages not shared by the general public. Construing the order in the light of the judgment denying an injunction, and of the evidence introduced on the trial, we think it is clear that the trial judge intended to go on record as saying that in his opinion the plaintiffs would, on account of the contemplated nine months' obstruction of Nelson street, suffer special damages of a temporary character, which, however, were not of sufficient seriousness or importance to warrant the grant of an injunction. It would probably have been best had this expression on a pure question of fact been omitted, as it had no material bearing on the case as decided. As the case in its present form, however, will not reach the jury, this expression in the order can have no influence upon its subsequent determination; and for this reason the judgment on the cross-bill will not be reversed. See Wardens v. Savannah, 69 Ga. 749; Bleyer v. Blum, 70 Ga. 559. In view of the ruling announced in the first division of this opinion, and of the decision of this court in Tuggle v. Atlanta, 57 Ga. 114, it would seem to be immaterial whether special damage of this sort be suffered or not.

Judgment on both bills of exceptions affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except COBB, P. J., disqualified.

PATTON et al. v. CITY OF ROME et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POWERS — VACATING PART OF STREET.

Under the legislative authority granted to a municipality in its charter to "open, lay out, widen, straighten, or to otherwise change streets, alleys and squares in said city," the city may vacate and sell to an abutting landowner, a private individual, a strip or part of a street, which strip will be thereafter closed to the use of the public, where it appears that the selling and closing of the strip or tract will have the effect to straighten and make more uniform in width the street from which the tract is taken and sold, without having the effect to close or prevent the free use by the public of said street.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 722, 1429.]

2. SAME—CONTRACTS—ULTRA VIRES.

A contract upon the part of a municipality to sell the strip or part of the street to a private individual, as set out in the preceding headnote, is not an ultra vires act; and the court below did not err in refusing to enjoin the city from proceeding to consummate the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 629.]

3. SAME—CHANGE OF STREET—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES.

Having legally exercised the power to change the street, it was the duty of the mayor and council to appoint assessors under that section of the charter which provides that "whenever the said mayor and council shall exercise the power above delegated"—that is the power and authority to open, lay out, widen, straighten, or otherwise change streets—"they shall appoint two freeholders, and the owners of said lots fronting on the said streets or alleys shall, on five days' notice, appoint two freeholders, who shall proceed to assess the damages sustained or the advantages desired [derived?] by the owner or owners of said lots, in consequence of the opening, widening, straightening, or otherwise changing said streets or alleys."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by Ida N. Patton and others against city of Rome and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Ida N. Patton, Mrs. Mary M. Brumby, and James B. Nevin, as executrices and executor of the estate of Helen A. Nevin, deceased, and individually as citizens, taxpayers, and lot owners, sought to enjoin the city of Rome from selling to E. J. and J. Henderson Lanham a strip of land, 30 feet wide by 132 feet in length, off the eastern side of North Fourth avenue in said city, in which petitioners claimed, as representatives of the estate and as individuals, general interest as citizens and taxpayers and special interest as abutting lot owners; the city having agreed to sell said strip to the Lanhams in order that they might close the same and erect thereon a three-story brick building, claiming power and authority so to do under and by virtue of its charter. The language of that section of its charter under which the city is proceeding to sell the strip is as follows: "That the said mayor and council shall have full power and authority to open, lay out, widen, straighten, or to otherwise change streets, alleys and squares in the said city of Rome. Whenever the said mayor and council shall exercise the power above delegated, they shall appoint two freeholders, and the owners of said lots fronting on the said streets or alleys shall, on five days' notice, appoint two freeholders, who shall proceed to assess the damages sustained or the advantages desired by the owner or owners of said lots, in consequence of the opening, widening, straightening, or otherwise changing said streets or alleys; and in case said assessors can not agree they shall select a fifth freeholder; the said assessors to take an oath that they will faithfully discharge their duties, and each party to have the right to enter an appeal to the superior court of Floyd county within ten days of the rendition of said award: Provided, if any property owner shall fail after notification to appoint assessors by the time prescribed, then the two assessors appointed by the city shall proceed to make the assessment, and in the event they shall fail to agree they shall call in a third freeholder, who shall be sworn and act with them, and the finding of the majority shall stand as the award, unless appeal be entered as provided for in this section." Acts 1882-83, p. 438, § 57. In their petition the plaintiffs allege that as representatives of the said estate they are the owners of property on the western side of North Fourth avenue, across the street from the aforementioned strip, and that, if the city be allowed to sell the strip, their property will be greatly damaged; that the street at this point has been 95 feet wide for 50 years, and that the Lanhams have announced their intention to build thereon the three-story brick building aforementioned, which, taking into consideration the fact that the street would then be but 65 feet in width, would greatly mar the enjoyment of petitioner's property, "cutting off light and air, * * * obstructing the view, and taking away, to that extent, petitioner's right of ingress and egress"; that petitioners and those under whom they claim have been in possession of the property for more than 50 years. Petitioners insist that the charter of the city of Rome gives "no authority to close any part of said street, no authority to sell any part of this street, and that only by express legislative authority can such action be had"; that there is no claim that said strip is no longer useful or convenient to the public, but "the same is being done solely for the benefit of private individuals, to wit, the proposed grantees," and that such proposed action by the mayor and council of said city is an injury to petitioners and a gross abuse of power; that the injuries threatened are irreparable and cannot be easily computed in damages, and that they have no sufficient remedy at law. Wherefore they pray, as aforesaid, that the city be enjoined from proceeding further "in this attempted disposition of said part of Fourth avenue," that the Lanhams be enjoined from erecting any building on said tract of land or otherwise obstructing the same, and that the freeholders (Brett and Wilkerson), whom it was alleged the city had appointed as assessors to determine what damage would be sustained by petitioners by reason of said sale, "be enjoined from interfering with petitioners' rights in said street, and from entering any judgment for or against petitioners." The land to be sold is a strip 30 feet wide by 132 feet in length on the east side of North Fourth avenue, beginning at the corner of that avenue and Broad street. The street north of this strip is 65 feet wide, and hence, in the event the proposed sale is made, the whole of North Fourth avenue will be of even width, to wit, 65 feet. Furthermore, by taking off this strip, the eastern line of North Fourth avenue will be on a line with, and, as it were, a continuation of the east line of South Fourth avenue, thus making the eastern boundary of South Fourth avenue, which is south of Broad street, and the east line of North Fourth avenue, which commences at the northern line of Broad street, but the continuation of one straight line. Other facts were alleged in the petition which it is not necessary to set out. In its answer to the petition the city of Rome admitted practically all of the facts alleged in the petition, except that the proposed sale would injure petitioners in any respect, and this it denied. It admitted that it had proceeded with the sale of the strip in question, and had appointed two certain freeholders to assess the damages that might be sustained by abutting lot owners under the power given it by that portion of the charter quoted. In conclusion the answer said: "This defendant answers, not only for itself, but for said Brett and Wilkerson as assessors, as it is only under the authority of this defendant that said Brett and Wilkerson are acting." The Lanhams answered, setting up substantially the same defense offered by the city. After the answers were filed the petitioners moved the court to strike them on the ground that they set forth "no defense to said petition, either in law or equity," which motion the court did not entertain. Evidence was introduced by defendants, in rebuttal to the sworn petition, to the effect that the proposed sale of said strip and the erection thereon of a three-story brick building would enhance the value of neighboring property. After argument was had the court denied the injunction, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Halstead Smith and Leaborn & Barry Wright, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). 1-3. That municipalities may be given power and authority to change, obstruct, or even vacate streets by legislative grant, in the absence of constitutional restriction, there can be no doubt. Coker v. Railway Company, 123 Ga. 483, 51 S. E. 481. See, also, Adair v. City of Atlanta (decided at this term) 52 S. E. 739. And, as it is not contended in the case at bar that there is any constitutional inhibition against the provisions of the charter of the city of Rome giving to it the power to "open, lay out, to widen, straighten, or to otherwise change streets, alleys and squares in said city," the only question to be determined is whether or not the language quoted confers upon the city, expressly or by necessary implication, the power to sell the tract which is the subject of this action. In the case of Trustees v. City of Atlanta, 93 Ga. 474, 21 S. E. 74, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, in construing this identical language, said: "This grant is comprehensive enough to embrace the alteration of a street in any respect, whether on, below or above the surface of the earth." "To widen, straighten, or to otherwise change" surely seems to be about as broad as the statute could be made. Indeed, it would be hard to conjecture a better legislative expression to cover the specific facts of this case. By making the proposed change, the street will be more uniform in its width and appearance. It will be straightened in the sense that it will be to a certain extent free from very pronounced irregularities in shape, and the street will remain open to the free and unobstructed use by the public. Hence it follows that the court did not err in refusing to grant the injunction restraining the city from selling the described strip and appointing assessors under the section of the charter set out in the third headnote.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

BISHOP v. BISHOP.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. DIVORCE—TEMPORARY ALIMONY—SECOND ACTION.

Where a husband brought a libel for divorce against his wife, and pending the suit temporary alimony was awarded to her, and the suit terminated in a verdict denying the divorce applied for, if the husband subsequently brought a second libel for divorce against his wife, based on another ground, the allowance of alimony pending the first suit was no bar to an application by her for temporary alimony pending the second action.

2. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY OF HUSBAND.

Where a libel for a divorce was brought by a husband against his wife on the ground of desertion, and pending the litigation she applied for temporary alimony, which he resisted on the ground that she had been living an immoral life since their separation, the husband was not a competent witness to testify to the adultery of the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 159½, 172.]

3. SAME—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE IN CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Although the attorney for the wife, while cross-examining the husband as a witness, asked him why he had separated from his wife, and the witness replied, because he caught her in bed with another man, there was no error in excluding this evidence on motion of such attorney. The exclusion of the husband as a witness from testifying to such a fact is based on public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 192.]

4. DIVORCE—ALIMONY—CHARACTER OF WIFE..

On the hearing of an application for temporary alimony, evidence merely tending to show that the general reputation of the wife is bad is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 619.]

5. SAME—ALIMONY AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.

There was no abuse of discretion in the amount of alimony and counsel fees allowed in this case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by G. B. Bishop against Dollie Bishop. From an order granting temporary alimony, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

George W. Bishop filed a libel for divorce against his wife on the ground of adultery. She denied the plaintiff's charge, and filed a cross-libel against him. She applied for temporary alimony pending the action, which was allowed to her, and which the husband contends that he paid. On the trial the jury found that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant should be granted a divorce. Subsequently the husband filed a second libel for divorce against his wife, alleging desertion of him by her. The defendant denied the plaintiff's allegation, and made application for temporary alimony and an allowance for counsel fees pending this suit. The plaintiff contested her right to alimony on the ground that she had been living a life of immorality and shame since their separation. He also pleaded that the allowance of temporary alimony during the former litigation, and the verdict of the jury denying a divorce to either party, amounted to an adjudication which barred her claim for temporary alimony during the present suit; and he filed a plea of res adjudicata accordingly. On the hearing of the application for temporary alimony the presiding judge ordered the plaintiff to pay to the defendant $50 as counsel fees, and $10 per month as temporary alimony. To this ruling he excepted.

T. J. Ripley, Thos. L. Bishop, and W. H. Withers, for plaintiff in error. Lewis W. Thomas, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The award of temporary alimony to the wife pending a suit for divorce brought against her by her husband terminated with the conclusion of that case. If the husband afterward brought a second suit for divorce against her, she could again apply for temporary alimony pending that litigation. The allowance of temporary alimony pending the former suit, in which he failed, was no bar to a similar allowance pending the second suit. If he could bring a second libel for divorce against his wife, there was nothing to prevent her from applying for alimony and counsel fees in connection therewith. The plea of res adjudicata was without merit. See Mitchell v. Mitchell, 97 Ga. 795, 25 S. E. 385.

2. At common law a party to a cause was excluded from testifying. By the enabling act of 1866 this disability was, as a general rule, removed, but with certain exceptions. One of these is stated in Civ. Code 1895, § 5272, where it is declared that nothing contained in the act referred to "shall apply to any action, suit or proceeding in any court, instituted in consequence of adultery." This exception was based, not merely on the rights of individual parties, or made solely for their benefit, but rested on a sound public policy which prevented husband and wife from mutually destroying the character of each other because of quarrels or disagreements between themselves. At common law the legal civil existence of the wife was merged into that of the husband. The Code of this state still declares that "her legal civil existence is merged in the husband, except so far as the law recognizes her separately, either for her own protection, or for her benefit, or for the preservation of public order." Civ. Code 1895, § 2473. It is also declared: "There are certain admissions and communications excluded from public policy. Among these are: (1) Communication between husband and wife." Civ. Code 1895, § 5198. Such communications are protected even after the relation has ceased. Lingo v. State, 29 Ga. 470. So a letter written by a husband to his wife, indicating the state of his feelings toward a third person and toward herself in relation to that person, is not admissible in evidence in behalf of such person on his trial for the homicide of the husband. Wilkerson v. State, 91 Ga. 729, 17 S. E. 990, 44 Am. St. Rep. 63. Except in certain specified instances, neither a husband nor a wife is competent to give evidence in any criminal proceeding for or against the other. Pen. Code 1895, § 1011, par. 4. These illustrations suffice to show the public policy underlying the rule of exclusion of the evidence of the husband and the wife. The expression "any action, suit or proceeding in any court, instituted in consequence of adultery," used in Civ. Code 1895, § 5272, is not to be given a narrow or restricted meaning. In Sloan v. Briant, 56 Ga. 59, it is said: "Whether it be the immediate or the remote cause is immaterial, if the suit be the consequence of adultery as the cause. The words 'in consequence' apply as well to the initiatory as to the proximate cause of this suit." In Graves v. Harris, 117 Ga. 817, 45 S. E. 239, it was held that "the plaintiff, in an action for alienating the affections of his wife and inducing her to commit adultery, was incompetent at the trial to testify as a witness to any fact." See, also, Thomas v. State, 115 Ga. 235, 41 S. E. 578; Cook v. Cook, 46 Ga. 308.

3. The evidence was heard orally, and, while the husband was being cross-examined, counsel for the wife asked him, "Why did you separate from your wife, Dollie Bishop?" To this the witness answered, "Because I caught her in bed with another man." Counsel for the wife moved to rule out this answer, and the motion was sustained over objection. It is contended that, as it was made in response to a question of counsel for the adverse side, the court should have refused to rule it out. Where the question affects only the interest of the parties, "upon an oral examination a party asking a cross-question and eliciting an unfavorable reply, which the other side could not have introduced, cannot have the legitimate answer to his own question ruled out." Anderson v. Brown, 72 Ga. 714. This was decided in regard to a jury trial. But where witness was not competent to testify as to the facts stated in his answer, and it appeared that it was not directly called for, although to some extent responsive, it was held that there was no error in excluding it. First National Bank of Gainesville v. Cody, 93 Ga. 145, 19 S. E. 831. Where, in the progress of a trial, the court observes that a rule of public policy has been or is being violated in practice, it may of its own motion call attention to it, and have the proper corrective applied. Goodrum v. State, 60 Ga. 509. The question put to the husband was why he had separated from his wife. In answer to this he sought to testify to his wife's adultery. The court might have excluded the testimony of his own motion, and there was no error in excluding it upon motion of counsel for the wife. A husband or wife does not become competent to testify as to the adultery of the other because no objection is made. In undefended divorce cases the plaintiff would not be allowed to testify to the adultery of the defendant, although the latter was not represented or objecting. Public policy forbids that a husband should be permitted to thus testify, although there may be no objection, or even if there should be an agreement for him to do so. If adultery was not involved in this issue, the evidence would have been wholly immaterial.

But it is evident that it was directly relied on to prevent a judgment for alimony in favor of the wife.

4. Evidence was offered on behalf of the husband to show that the reputation or general character of the wife was bad. This was rejected by the court, and we think correctly so. General reputation may be proved in some cases, as to show that a house is one of ill fame. But it is no defense to an application for alimony by a wife to merely prove that her general character is bad.

5. There was no abuse of discretion in the amount of alimony and counsel fees fixed by the presiding judge.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

(124 Ga. 411)

BROWN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CERTIORARI—BOND.

The bond which the applicant for the writ of certiorari in a criminal case tried in a county court is required by section 765 of the Penal Code of 1895 to give, unless he makes the prescribed pauper affidavit in lieu thereof, is a bond for his personal appearance to abide the final judgment of the court in the case.

2. SAME—APPROVAL.

This bond must be an approved bond, and an approval thereof by the county court judge is in conformity to law; and when, in response to the writ of certiorari, such judge sends up to the superior court, as a part of the proceedings in the case, a bond of this character, this, under the decision in Watson v. State, 11 S. E. 610, 85 Ga. 237, is equivalent to an approval thereof by him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Putnam County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Alex Brown was convicted of a misdemeanor in the county court. From a judgment dismissing certiorari to the superior court, he brings error. Reversed.

W. T. Davidson, for plaintiff in error. Joseph E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., S. T. Wingfield, and Turner & Adams, for the State.

FISH, C. J. Alex Brown was tried in a county court for an alleged misdemeanor, and convicted. He carried his case by certiorari to the superior court, where the certiorari was, upon motion of counsel for the state, dismissed, upon the ground "that no bond was given by the defendant, or pauper affidavit made as required by the statute, as a condition precedent to the grant of the writ, and that no such bond or affidavit appeared of record." To this judgment of dismissal he excepted.

1. In response to the writ of certiorari the judge of the county court sent up to the superior court, along with his answer, a bond signed by the plaintiff in certiorari as principal and another person as surety, executed upon the very day that the accused was convicted in the county court. This bond was witnessed by the sheriff, and upon it was an affidavit by the surety as to his solvency, which was also witnessed by the sheriff. The condition of this bond was that the accused should appear at the next term of the superior court for the county, and from day to day and term to term, to answer the final judgment in the case. Was the obligation of this bond such as the statute requires? We think it was. Section 765 of the Penal Code of 1895, which prescribes conditions to be complied with in order to obtain the writ of certiorari to review a criminal case tried in a county court, as amended by the act of December 7, 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 61), is as follows: "The writ shall not be granted unless the accused shall file his affidavit stating that he has not had a fair trial and has been wrongfully and illegally convicted, and shall give bond and security, or make affidavit as is required of persons when carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court; and the execution and filing of said bond shall operate as a supersedeas of the judgment rendered in said court for space of ten days." It will be observed that the statute does not expressly declare what the character of the bond shall be, but if there was nothing in the statute with reference to the bond, except the words "shall give bond and security," the natural and logical inference would be that the bond should be such as would be appropriate to a criminal case, and not a bond which would be appropriate in a civil case, but unsuited to a criminal case, such as a bond for the eventual condemnation money and all future costs, which the applicant for the writ of certiorari in a civil case is, by section 4639 of the Civil Code of 1895 required to give. A certiorari bond, whether it be given in a civil or in a criminal case, is to secure the satisfaction by the applicant for the writ of the final judgment of the court. For this purpose an eventual condemnation bond is appropriate in a civil case, and a bond for the appearance of the accused, and his submission, in the event the final judgment is against him, to the sentence imposed by the court, is appropriate in a criminal case. So, although the eventual condemnation bond which section 4639 of the Civil Code of 1895 requires an applicant for the writ of certiorari to give, unless he makes the prescribed pauper affidavit in lieu thereof, is not in terms expressly confined to civil cases, it has been held by this court that the provisions of that section apply exclusively to civil cases, and have no application to a criminal prosecution. Mohrman v. Augusta, 103 Ga. 841, 31 S. E. 95; Colvard v. State, 118 Ga. 13, 43 S. E. 855. But the character of the bond required by section 765 of the Penal Code of 1895 to be given in order to obtain the writ of certiorari in a criminal case tried in a county court is not left to be inferred from the nature of the case in which it is required to be given, but is indicated by the words "as is required of persons when carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court." While, strictly speaking, no bond is absolutely required of persons carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court, yet in order to obtain a supersedeas in a bailable case, and thus prevent the sentence of the lower court from being carried into execution while the convicted person is seeking to have the judgment against him set aside by the Supreme Court, a bond is required, unless the accused is unable to give bond and will make the affidavit prescribed by the statute in lieu thereof. Section 1077 of the Penal Code of 1895, in reference to criminal cases carried to the Supreme Court, provides that the bill of exceptions, when properly filed, "shall operate as a supersedeas, upon the plaintiff in error complying with the following terms: Where the offense is bailable, the defendant shall enter into a recognizance before the clerk, with security to be approved by him, in a sum to be fixed by the presiding judge, conditioned for the personal appearance of such defendant, to abide the final order, judgment or sentence of said court. If the offense is not bailable, the judge shall order a supersedeas at the time of filing the bill of exceptions. If the party is unable from his poverty to give the recognizance, the judge shall order a supersedeas upon the filing of an affidavit as provided in civil cases, but the defendant shall not be set at liberty without the recognizance." The bond here described is the bond referred to in section 765 (Pen. Code 1895) by the words, "as is required of persons when carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court." This will more clearly appear, we think, when we consider the language of the statute as it stood before the adoption of the Code of 1895. The county court act of January 19, 1872, provided that no writ of certiorari in a criminal case "shall be granted * * * unless the party applying shall give such bond and security or make such affidavit as is permitted in the Code of Georgia, for parties in criminal cases carrying up cases to the Supreme Court of Georgia." Acts 1871-72, p. 296. This provision of the statute was codified in section 302 of the Code of 1873, and in the section of the same number in the Code of 1882, with but very slight and immaterial alteration; the words "shall give bond and security or make such affidavit as is permitted * * * for parties in criminal cases carrying up cases to the Supreme Court" being retained. Persons carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court were then, and are now, "permitted to give bond and security, or make the affidavit," provided for in section 1077 of the Penal Code of 1895, and thereby obtain supersedeas of the judgment of the trial court. The word "required," which was substituted in the Code of 1895 for the word "permitted," which appeared in the original act and in the Codes of 1873 and 1882, refers to the same bond and security, and the same affidavit, previously referred to by the word "permitted." The words "such bond and security" and "such affidavit as is permitted . . . for parties in criminal cases carrying up cases to the Supreme Court," clearly and unmistakably mean the same kind of a bond and the same kind of an affidavit as is permitted in carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court. So, taking the statute as it now stands, we find that, while the language is somewhat different, the meaning is unchanged. For to "give bond and security, or make affidavit," in one case "as is required" in another, is to give the same kind of a bond or make the same kind of an affidavit. In the opinion in Memmler's Case, 75 Ga. 576, which was a certiorari in a criminal case tried in a county court, it was distinctly recognized that the terms and conditions of the bond in such a case should be the same as that of the supersedeas bond given when carrying criminal cases to the Supreme Court. So far as we are aware, the general practice, when giving bond in cases of this character, has been in conformity to this view. It follows that the obligation of the bond given by the applicant for the writ of certiorari on the day that he was convicted was such as the statute required.

2. Although the statute does not so expressly declare, we think it clear that the bond which it requires is an approved bond. The law does not contemplate that the person required to give the bond shall be allowed to give it in just such sum and with just such security as he may see fit. As was said in Stover v. Doyle, 114 Ga. 85, 39 S. E. 939, by Presiding Justice Lumpkin, in reference to the certiorari bond required to be given in a civil case: "The statute necessarily means an approved bond." This is the well-established rule in civil cases, where the statute is silent upon the question of the approval of the bond. Hamilton v. Phenix Ins. Co., 107 Ga. 728, 33 S. E. 705; Wingard v. Southern Railway Co., 109 Ga. 177, 34 S. E. 275; Stover v. Doyle, supra; Dykes v. Twiggs County, 115 Ga. 700, 42 S. E. 36. These cases also hold that the bond must be approved by the judge or magistrate who tried the case in the first instance, and that a writ of certiorari issued before such a bond has been filed is void; and the case last cited lays down the rule that the bond itself must, either upon its face or by other written evidence bearing the official signature of such judicial officer, show that it has been duly approved by him. The reasoning upon which this interpretation of the statute in reference to the writ of certiorari in civil cases is based would seem to apply with equal force to the statute in reference to such a writ in a criminal case tried in a county court. But, owing to the construction placed upon the last-mentioned statute in Watson v. State, 85 Ga. 237, 11 S. E. 610, we are bound to hold, in the present case, that an approval by the county court judge of the bond given by the plaintiff in certiorari can be, and must be, implied from the mere act of such judge in sending up this bond to the superior court as a part of the proceedings in the case. In the Watson Case, which involved a certiorari in a criminal case tried in a county court, there was a motion to dismiss the certiorari "upon the ground that Watson had given no bond assessed by the county judge and approved as required by law." This motion was sustained by the judge of the superior court, but this court reversed the judgment, holding that "if, in response to the writ of certiorari, after a conviction in the county court, the judge of that court sends up, as a part of the proceedings in the case, a bond with security given by the defendant, this is equivalent to an approval of the bond by him." In Stover v. Doyle, and in Dykes v. Twiggs County, supra, the Watson Case was noticed, but this court refused to apply the ruling there made to a certiorari in a civil case, leaving it to stand simply as an interpretation of the statute applicable to writs of certiorari in criminal cases tried in county courts. We are now dealing with a case of the latter character, and one which, under the facts disclosed by the record relatively to the question under consideration, is exactly like the Watson Case. We have examined the record in that case, which is of file in this court, and find that the bond there given by the applicant for the writ of certiorari was an appearance bond, signed by him as principal and another person as surety, and neither attested nor approved by any one. If the sending up of that bond to the superior court by the county court judge was equivalent to an approval thereof by him, then, in the present case, the sending up by the judge of the county court of the appearance bond given by the accused and attested by the sheriff amounted to an approval of such bond by such judge. And if, in that case, the approval of the bond could be thus made by the county court judge after the writ of certiorari had issued, then it must follow in the present case that the approval of the bond could be made when the judge of the county court answered the writ of certiorari.

It follows from the foregoing that the judge of the superior court erred in dismissing the certiorari, and his judgment is therefore reversed. All the Justices concurring.

HOPE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE.

When a party is induced to go to trial upon the statement of a witness that he will testify to a given state of facts, to which another witness would testify if he were present, and during the progress of the trial the witness communicates to the party that he will not testify as promised, and no motion for a postponement is made, a new trial will not be granted upon the ground of the surprise resulting from the withdrawal by the witness of his promised statement.

2. SAME.

There was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sandersville; P. R. Tallafarro, Judge.

Andrew Hope was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

The accused was arraigned upon a presentment charging him with the offense of adultery and fornication, and, upon being convicted, made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The motion for a new trial, beside the general grounds, contained two special grounds—one based upon newly discovered evidence, and the other setting forth the following statement of facts: The defense relied upon two witnesses to establish an alibi, and these witnesses were absent when the case was called for trial; but counsel for the accused was assured by another witness that he could swear to the alibi of the accused, and, relying upon this witness to establish such fact, the accused went to trial. During the trial this witness informed counsel for accused that he could not testify to the alibi, and the accused was thus prevented from setting up this defense. Attached to this second ground was an affidavit of counsel that the facts set forth were true; but there was no affidavit from the persons named in the ground that, if they had been present, they would have testified to an alibi.

M. L. Gross, for plaintiff in error. G. H. Howard, Sol., for the State.

COBB, P. J. When counsel for the accused learned that the witness upon whose statement he relied in reference to the proof of an alibi had misled him, he should have called the attention of the court to the matter, and made a motion for a postponement of the case. As knowledge of this fact came to him pending the trial, he could not take the chances of a favorable verdict, and, after an unfavorable verdict, insist upon a new trial being granted on account of a fact which came to his knowledge before verdict. In Rolfe v. Rolfe, 10 Ga. 143, the evidence, which by oversight had not been introduced, was offered pending the trial, and it was held that under the circumstances it was error to reject the evidence, and a new trial was granted on this ground. Even if the ruling laid down in the case of Wilson v. Brandon, 8 Ga. 136, is to be followed at all at the present time, the present case, upon its facts, is not controlled by that ruling. In that case the motion for a new trial contained an affidavit of the absent witness that, if present, he would have testified to the fact which the plaintiff had failed to prove on account of being misled by the statement of another witness. That case should not be extended beyond its peculiar facts.

2. The alleged newly discovered evidence was impeaching in its nature, and the rule is well settled that the discretion of the judge in overruling a motion for a new trial based upon the discovery of evidence of such a character will not be controlled. The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant the new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

DUGGAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

The fact that since the conviction of the accused the prosecutor has said that he procured the testimony of the principal witness for the state by bribery is not cause for a new trial. The witness could not be impeached by mere hearsay; and, besides, testimony purely impeaching in its character is not cause for a new trial. Hardy v. State, 43 S. E. 434, 117 Ga. 40.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2331, 2332.]

2. SAME—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Nor is it cause for a new trial that, since the verdict was rendered, the accused and her counsel have discovered that a certain person will swear that the prosecutor sought to bribe him to testify falsely against the accused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2331, 2332.]

3. SAME.

The fact that counsel for the accused failed to move for a continuance upon the ground of the absence of certain witnesses subpoenaed for the purpose of proving an alibi, because he was assured by another witness, who was present at the trial, that an alibi could be proved by him, but discovered, after the trial had begun, that an alibi could not be proved by this witness, is not cause for a new trial. Hope v. State (this day decided) 52 S. E. 747.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2300-2305.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

MORGAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES.

The absence of a witness, who is competent and cognizant of material and relevant facts is a proper subject of comment in the argument of counsel before the jury, and it is error for the court to give an instruction which entirely eliminates from the jury's deliberation the effect of such argument.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1073.]

2. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—EVIDENCE.

In the trial of one charged with the offense of stabbing, conduct of the injured person subsequent to the occurrence under investigation is irrelevant, and testimony relating thereto should be excluded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; O. R. Crisp, Judge.

Will Morgan was convicted of the crime of stabbing, and brings error. Reversed.

R. D. Feagin, for plaintiff in error. Allen Fort, Jr., for the State.

EVANS, J. The plaintiff in error, Will Morgan, was tried in the city court of Americus upon an accusation charging him with the offense of stabbing. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and he made a motion for a new trial. Exception is taken to the overruling of this motion.

1. It appeared at the trial that Charlie Taylor, the person whom the accused was charged with having stabbed, was temporarily in Sumter county at the time the offense was alleged to have been committed, and subsequently returned to his home, in Cuthbert, Ga., after swearing out a warrant against the accused. Taylor did not appear in his capacity of prosecutor at the commitment trial, nor was he present at the trial in the city court, nor was his absence accounted for by the state, though the evidence disclosed that he was then living at Cuthbert. Counsel for the state, in the opening argument before the jury, said he would anticipate an argument which defendant's counsel would probably make concerning the absence of the prosecutor, and insisted that there was no necessity to have him at the trial, if the case could be made out without him; that the state had called eyewitnesses to the difficulty, and it would have imposed extra and useless expense upon Sumter county, in the way of witness fees and the expense of sending after Taylor, to secure his presence at the trial. In answer to this argument, counsel for the accused stated to the jury that the law did not allow the prosecutor fees for attending court and prosecuting a case, and it was a weak argument for the state to explain the lack of its highest and best evidence, where the liberty of one of its citizens was at stake, by insisting that it would have been expensive to the county to have produced that evidence at the trial; and the defendant's counsel further argued to the jury that the absence of the prosecutor was a fact which they had a right to consider, that it might show he was absent of his own volition, because he realized he was in the wrong, and did not care to convict an innocent man. No objection was made to the argument of counsel for the state, but the defendant's counsel sought to meet it in the manner just indicated. The court, before concluding its charge to the jury, instructed them that "the fact that the prosecutor, Charlie Taylor, is not present at this trial has absolutely nothing to do with the case." Exception is taken to this instruction, on the ground that it amounted to an expression of opinion by the court as to the weight and effect of the evidence before the jury, and because it tended to prejudice the jury against the argument of defendant's counsel, and cause them to favor the argument of counsel for the state. In a note appended to the motion for a new trial, the presiding judge states that "the charge excepted to was given just before the conclusion of the charge, in answer to the argument of defendant's counsel that the absence of the prosecutor from the trial was a reason for the acquittal of the defendant, as it tended to show that the prosecutor realized he was in the wrong, and therefore felt no interest in the case," and that the "court immediately thereafter charged the jury that if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, from the evidence introduced on the trial of the case, of the guilt of the accused, it would be their duty to convict the defendant; on the contrary, if they did not believe the defendant guilty, or if they [had] a reasonable doubt of his guilt, it would be their duty to acquit." As the court intended this charge to be "in answer to the argument of defendant's counsel," it is not unreasonable to suppose that the jury so understood the instructions and regarded the argument as not worthy of consideration, since the court had explicitly told them that the absence of the prosecutor had "absolutely nothing to do with the case." Indeed, it is hard to conceive how the accused could, in the face of this unequivocal assertion by the court, have gotten any benefit from the argument made in his behalf concerning the failure of the prosecutor to appear against him at the trial. Whether or not the instruction was proper depends upon a correct determination of the question whether, as matter of law, the absence of the prosecutor was a circumstance which the jury were not at liberty to take into consideration in passing upon the relative weight and sufficiency of the evidence upon which the state relied for a conviction, as compared with that offered by the defense, which tended very strongly to show that the accused was justified in cutting Taylor with a knife.

In the argument of cases, counsel should be allowed considerable latitude of speech; and so long as extraneous facts are not injected or improper language used, the trial judge should not interfere. The premises of the advocate should be founded upon some fact or group of facts brought to light upon the investigation; his conclusion, however absurd or illogical, goes to the jury as the result of his reasoning, and not as a statement of fact. The defendant's counsel insisted before the jury that the absence of the wounded man was a circumstance persuasive of the conclusion that had he been present at the trial, he would have sustained the defendant's plea of self-defense. In anticipation of this argument, the solicitor had urged that no such inference could be drawn from the injured man's failure to appear to prosecute or testify. These conflicting deductions from the circumstance of his absence were peculiarly within the jury's domain, and exclusively for their solution. "It is customary to permit attorneys to comment upon the absence of witnesses, or their nonproduction, when they are shown to be cognizant of the facts in issue. It is a mere matter of argument, and may be discussed by either side, trusting to the good sense of the jury to properly estimate the value of such arguments." Chicago R. Co. v. Krayenbuhl (Neb.) 98 N. W. 44. In the case of Inman v. State, 72 Ga. 269, it was held that it was legitimate for counsel in argument to allude to what had transpired in the case in the presence of the jury, from the time it was called through its entire progress. So liberal has been the practice of permitting a discussion of collateral issues by counsel that it has been held: "Where, in the trial of an action for damages against a railroad company for personal injuries, the evidence as to the company's alleged negligence was conflicting, it was legitimate for the plaintiff's counsel to argue to the jury that the failure of the defendant to introduce and examine as a witness one of its employees who was present at the time when the injuries in question were sustained was a circumstance from which an inference could be drawn that, if this employee had been introduced and examined, he would have testified to facts prejudicial to the defendant." W. & A. R. Co. v. Morrison, 102 Ga. 319, 29 S. E. 104, 40 L. R. A. 84, 66 Am. St. Rep. 173. The absence of the person who instituted the prosecution and who would have been a competent witness for the state was a proper subject of comment by defendant's counsel; and it was for the jury, and not the court, to determine whether the conclusion of counsel was correct. The trial judge erred in giving an instruction which entirely eliminated from the jury's deliberation the effect of such argument. McBride v. Macon Tel. Pub. Co., 102 Ga. 422, 30 S. E. 999. The error of this instruction was not cured by the subsequent charge that the jury should only convict in case it appeared that the defendant's guilt was established beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence. Two conflicting accounts of the transaction were presented by the evidence. If the deduction sought to be drawn from the absence of the wounded man could be of any avail to the defendant, it would be the effect on the minds of the jurors inclining them to accept as true the version of the affair as narrated by his witnesses.

2. It was not error to exclude from evidence the conduct of the person alleged to have been stabbed subsequent to the occurrence under investigation. What he did on returning to the scene after he was cut could not illustrate the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and was therefore irrelevant. The case must undergo another investigation, and it is not necessary to discuss the evidence, or matters complained of which are not likely to arise on the next trial.

WATSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—CONTRACT TO LABOR—FALSE PRETENSES—ACCUSATION—SUFFICIENCY.

When an accusation based on the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90) alleged that the accused contracted with the prosecutor to perform certain services as a farm laborer, and to ditch for the prosecutor, with intent to procure from him money and other things of value, and not to perform the services so contracted for, and that without good and sufficient cause the accused failed and refused either to perform said services, or to return the money advanced, to the damage of the prosecutor in the sum named, and that after so contracting he procured advances in a named amount, with intent not to perform the services so contracted for, and without good and sufficient cause failed and refused either to do so or to return the money so advanced, to the loss and damage of the prosecutor in that amount, such accusation was fatally defective, in that it did not allege when the services were to commence, or for what time they were to continue, or that the prosecutor contracted and agreed to pay any amount whatever to the defendant for such services so to be rendered. A judgment based on a verdict of guilty on such an accusation should have been arrested on motion. Pressley v. State, 52 S. E. 750.

Aaron Watson was convicted of a misdemeanor, and brings error. Reversed.

Aaron Watson was arraigned on an accusation based on the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). It alleged that the accused "having contracted with said M. E. Morgan to perform for him certain services, to wit, services as a farm laborer, and to ditch for said M. E. Morgan, with intent to procure from him money and other things of value, and not to perform the services so contracted for, did without good and sufficient cause fail and refuse either to perform said services or to return the money so advanced, to the loss and damage of said M. E. Morgan in the sum of $12.75, and, after having so contracted, did thereby procure from said M. E. Morgan $12.75 in cash, of the value of $12.75, with intent then and there not to perform the services so contracted for, and did then and there, without good and sufficient cause, fail and refuse either to perform said services or to return the money so advanced, to the loss and damage of said M. E. Morgan in the sum of $12.75." After conviction he made a motion in arrest of judgment, on the ground, among others, that the warrant and accusation failed to allege any time when the service was to commence, what length of time it was to continue, or that the prosecutor at the time contracted and agreed to pay any amount whatever for such services so to be rendered. He excepted to the overruling of this motion, and also to the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1906.)

1. JURY—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—VIOLATION OF MUNICIPAL ORDINANCES.

The present Constitution of this state does not guaranty a trial by jury to one charged with the violation of a valid municipal ordinance; but he may be summarily tried and convicted, without a jury, in a police court having jurisdiction to try petty offenders against the peace, good order, and security of the municipality.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Jury, § 152.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCES—PUNISHMENT—INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE.

To punish such an offender by confining him at labor under municipal control is not obnoxious to the constitutional inhibition against "involuntary servitude, save as a punishment for crime, after legal conviction thereof."

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—SUMMARY TRIALS—FORM OF ACCUSATION.

The constitutional declaration that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law does not contemplate that a petty offender who may be tried summarily without a jury shall be furnished with a formal accusation or written statement of the charge preferred against him. It is sufficient if he be given timely information of the nature of the charge and be afforded full opportunity to present his defense.

4. SAME—SENTENCE—CONFINEMENT IN CHAIN GANG.

A recorder of a city may try offenders against the municipal ordinances, and impose on them such sentences as are authorized by law. But where one charged with the infraction of a municipal ordinance is sentenced to confinement for three months in the county chain gang, along with violaters of the laws of the state, upon conviction by the recorder alone and without a right to a trial by a jury, and with no record except certain entries upon the recorder's docket (stating a case of the city against the defendant, the offense with which he was charged, the name of the arresting officer, and that after hearing the evidence it was ordered that the defendant be committed to the county chain gang for the space of three months), such sentence is in violation of the Constitution, which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law. A provision in a municipal charter which authorizes punishment for offenses against the ordinances of the city by confinement of the offender in the chain gang of the county, where persons convicted of misdemeanors against the state and felons whose punishments have been reduced are confined, is unconstitutional.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Application for habeas corpus by Rufus Pearson against E. A. Wimblish. The court remanded applicant to custody, and he brings error. Reversed.

An application for the writ of habeas corpus was presented to the judge of the superior court of Bibb county in behalf of Rufus Pearson, who was alleged to be held and restrained of his liberty by E. A. Wimblish, superintendent of the Bibb county chain gang, under a pretended sentence and commitment of the recorder's court of the city of Macon, imposing upon the applicant the infamous punishment of being confined at hard labor in the chain gang of that county, for the term of three months. It was alleged that on October 28, 1905, Pearson was arrested without a warrant by a police officer of the city and committed to the city prison, where he was detained till the morning of the 30th of October, when he was taken before the city recorder, and, without any written charge, information, or accusation being furnished him, brought to trial without the benefit of counsel and without the right to demand or have a jury pass upon his guilt or innocence; that after a pretended trial before the recorder the sentence above stated was passed upon the applicant, and thereupon the recorder made out a writ of commitment, placing him in the custody of the superintendent of the Bibb county chain gang, who on the same day took charge of his person, manacled him in irons, which were riveted around his legs, clothed him in penitentiary stripes, and put him at hard labor on the public roads of the county. It was further alleged that the Bibb county chain gang was composed of the quota of felony convicts allotted to the county by the state under the act approved August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 65); of convicts who had been convicted of a felony, but had been sentenced as for a misdemeanor under the provisions of Pen. Code 1895, §§ 1036, 1037; of misdemeanor convicts; and of offenders summarily tried and convicted in the recorder's court. The charge brought against applicant was that of being drunk and disorderly, in violation of a city ordinance declaring that "any person who shall be found in the streets drunk, or acting in a disorderly, riotous or tumultuous manner * * * shall be arrested by the officers of the police force and confined in the city prison until such time as he can be brought before the recorder, to be dealt with as he may think proper and necessary." The act of November 21, 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 257, § 59), in so far as it undertook to authorize the recorder to sentence offenders to the county chain gang, was attacked as unconstitutional and void, on the grounds that (1) an offender against a municipal ordinance who is sent to the county chain gang under the provisions of that act is "deprived of his liberty, convicted of an infamous crime, and sentenced to an infamous punishment" without having a written accusation preferred against him or having the benefit of counsel, and without the right to have his guilt or innocence determined by the verdict of a jury of his peers, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the state of Georgia and of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, guarantying to every one accused of a criminal offense that he shall not be convicted thereof without due process of law; (2) because such a sentence as that imposed upon the applicant subjects one found guilty of a mere petty offense, less than a crime, to involuntary servitude, contrary to the inhibition contained in our state Constitution, as well as in the thirteenth amendment to the federal Constitution; (3) because such a sentence, when imposed for such a minor offense, subjects the offender to a cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the rights guaranteed to him by paragraph 9, § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state, and deprives him of the equal protection of the law assured to him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and (4) because conviction in a municipal court, when followed by such a sentence, offends the provisions of paragraph 1, § 18, art. 3, of the Constitution of Georgia, which preserves the right of trial by jury to every one accused of a criminal offense, which an infraction of a municipal ordinance necessarily becomes when the punishment visited upon the offender is the same as that imposed upon one found guilty of an infamous crime. The applicant declared that neither under any act of our General Assembly, nor under any ordinance of the city of Macon, were any rules of procedure established for the recorder's court such as preserved the constitutional rights of one charged with a penal offense, either in the first instance or upon appeal, and that his conviction in that court, in accordance with the practice which therein obtained, was a mere nullity.

The writ of habeas corpus was issued, and in response thereto the official to whom it was directed answered, in substance, as follows: The arrest of Pearson without a warrant was authorized by law. On the hearing before the recorder's court, the charge against him was read to him, he was asked if he was ready for trial, and he replied, "Yes." He was given ample notice of the offense with which he was charged, and also given full opportunity to make any defense he might have. After being put upon full notice of the charge against him, witnesses were sworn and examined in the case; and after the evidence for the prosecution had been heard he was told that he could make any statement in his own defense which he wished, and he availed himself of the privilege of making a statement. Thereupon he was convicted by the court, which was a police court for the city of Macon, having jurisdiction to try violators against the municipal laws in a summary manner; and he was arrested, tried, and convicted in the same manner as all other persons charged with similar violations of law are arrested and tried in the recorder's court. He was subsequently confined in the Bibb county chain gang, but not clothed in penitentiary stripes; and respondent, as the superintendent thereof, now holds him in custody, by virtue of the commitment issued by the recorder's court, after due and legal conviction therein, and after Pearson had been accorded a fair and impartial trial. No traverse to this answer was filed, but on the hearing in the court below the facts therein recited were recognized as true, taken in connection with an agreed statement of facts as to what appeared by the docket entries in the recorder's court and as to how the chain gang of Bibb county was conducted. These entries gave the number of the case and the date on which it was docketed, as well as the date of the arrest and the name of the arresting officer; defined the charge as "drunk and disorderly," and recited that after hearing the evidence in the case it was ordered by the court that the defendant be committed to the county chain gang for and during the space of three months. The commitment, a copy of which was attached to the petition for habeas corpus, formally stated the character and situs of the recorder's court, and styled the case as that of "The Mayor and Council v. Rufus Pearson," and the offense to be "drunk and disorderly"; recited that upon hearing the evidence in the case, the defendant was found guilty, whereupon it was ordered and adjudged by the court that the said defendant, then present in court, "do work in the chain gang" of the county for the term of three months, "to be computed from the date he is received by the superintendent of the public works," and that in the meantime he be committed to the city barracks. It purported to have been issued in open court, was dated October 30, 1905, and was signed, "Curtis Nottingham, Recorder of the City of Macon."

After hearing argument, the court below passed an order refusing to discharge the petitioner and remanding him to the custody of the respondent. To this order Pearson excepted, and in this court urged all of the grounds of attack upon the conviction and sentence in the recorder's court which he presented to the judge of the superior court in the petition for habeas corpus. The plaintiff in error takes the position that, under the facts admitted by the answer and the agreement of counsel, his discharge from further custody was demanded.

Glawson & Fowler and Akerman & Akerman, for plaintiff in error. Winter Wimberly and Jesse Harris, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after making the foregoing statement of facts). 1. In most, and perhaps in all, of the Constitutions of the different states there is contained the phrase, "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," or words of similar import. With striking unanimity this and equivalent expressions have been construed to mean that the right of trial by jury as it existed in the colonies prior to the Revolution should be preserved. The privilege was not enlarged, nor was the right extended to instances where summary trial without a jury was authorized and practiced. This construction has been given to the guaranty of jury trial as contained in the first and all subsequent Constitutions of this state. Flint River Steamboat Co. v. Foster, 5 Ga. 195 (7), 48 Am. Dec. 248. Clearly, then, that clause of the Constitution: "The right of trial by jury, except where it is otherwise provided in this Constitution, shall remain inviolate, but the General Assembly may prescribe any number, not less than five, to constitute a trial or traverse jury in courts other than the superior and city courts" (Civ. Code 1895, § 5876)—is only preservative of jury trial as it existed when Georgia became an independent state and a part of the United States, except as modified in the present Constitution. As was said by Jackson, C. J., in Hill v. Dalton, 72 Ga. 319, "such or equivalent provisions in the Constitution of the United States and all the Constitutions of this state have never been held to apply to police of cities and towns and arrests and trial, with fine and imprisonment therein, under ordinances thereof." "In England, violations of municipal by-laws, where the penalty is a fine, or by authority of Parliament a fine and imprisonment, have always been prosecuted in a summary manner, although Magna Charta secures the right of trial by jury." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 433. Municipal offenses usually are confined to breaches of by-laws and ordinances which in their nature are mala prohibita, and which by legislative sanction have been enacted by the municipality for its health, peace, and tranquillity. The offenses are petty in their nature, and in this state have always been prosecuted without a jury. While it may be doubted that the Legislature may delegate to a municipality the right to declare certain acts offenses against the corporation, and offenders thereof constitutionally subject to summary trial, it is very generally held that the transgression of municipal regulations enacted under the police power for the purpose of preserving the health, peace, and good order, and otherwise promoting the general welfare within cities and towns, may be prosecuted without a jury. McInerney v.

City of Denver, 17 Colo. 302, 29 Pac. 516; Byers v. Commonwealth, 42 Pa. 89; In re Kinsel (Kan.) 67 Pac. 634, 56 L. R. A. 475; Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 8 Sup. Ct. 1301, 32 L. Ed. 223; Mayor of Monroe v. Meuer, 35 La. Ann. 1192; Natal v. Louisiana, 139 U. S. 621, 11 Sup. Ct. 636, 35 L. Ed. 288; State v. Conlin, 27 Vt. 318; Goddard v. State, 12 Conn. 448; Williams v. Augusta, 4 Ga. 509; Floyd v. Eatonton, 14 Ga. 354, 58 Am. Dec. 559; Hill v. Mayor of Dalton, 72 Ga. 319. At common law, such disorderly offenses as common swearing, drunkenness, and a vast variety of others, formerly punished by a jury in the court-leet, were summarily tried by a justice of the peace, without a jury. 4 Bl. Com. *281. Offenses of this kind, as well as all others which were summarily triable without a jury in this state in colonial times, are cognizable in a police court, which, under our system of jurisprudence, is the forum in which such petty offenses may be tried.

But it is urged that while one summarily tried and convicted of a petty offense might be punished by fine or imprisonment, either or both, he could not be punished by imprisonment and involuntary servitude. The reply to this argument is obvious; if the offense was of such a character as to be summarily tried without a jury at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the Legislature might authorize any suitable penalty not antagonistic to the organic law. Whether the penalty by involuntary labor on the public works in the chain gang of Bibb county is violative of any provision of the United States or state Constitution will be discussed in a later part of this opinion.

Another clause of the Constitution is invoked as providing a constitutional guaranty of trial by jury even for petty offenders. "Every person charged with an offense against the laws of this state shall have the privilege and benefit of counsel; shall be furnished, on demand, with a copy of the accusation, and a list of the witnesses on whose testimony the charge against him is founded; shall have compulsory process to obtain the testimony of his own witnesses; shall be confronted with the witnesses testifying against him, and shall have a public and speedy trial by an impartial jury." Civ. Code 1895, § 5702. It is first to be determined whether the violation of a municipal ordinance is an "offense against the laws of this state." All the authorities concur that it is within the constitutional power of the Legislature to confer upon a municipality authority to make reasonable by-laws, rules, and ordinances necessary for the security, welfare, and convenience of the city, for preserving peace, order, and good government within the same, not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the land. Vason v. Augusta, 38 Ga. 542. There is a clear distinction between offenses against the "laws of the state," directly enacted by the Legislature, and offenses against the ordinances of a city, respecting the method of prosecuting and punishing offenders against the same. Hood v. Von Glahn, 88 Ga. 414, 14 S. E. 564. This particular clause first appeared in the Constitution of 1861, and again in the Constitution of 1868. The framers of the Constitution most probably had this distinction in mind, which was made in Williams v. Augusta, supra (decided in 1848), when this clause of the Constitution was drafted. If a jury trial was intended for all persons accused of crime or for all offenders of the penal laws, whether of a general character affecting the whole state and directly enacted by the Legislature, or municipal ordinances confined to offenses against the health, peace, and good order of a city, the restrictive words, "offense against the laws of this state," would hardly have been employed. These words should be given their ordinary signification; and, when thus interpreted, the safeguards thereby guaranteed apply to persons charged with a violation of one of the criminal statutes designed to protect the public at large, and not to offenders against the ordinances of a town or city. To extend the language of the Constitution to embrace offenses against a municipality, which were never triable by a jury, would be to attribute to the framers of that instrument an intent and purpose really never entertained by them. Neither of the clauses of the Constitution above quoted extend the right of trial by jury to a person accused of a violation of a municipal ordinance, and such offenders may be summarily tried in a police court without a jury.

2. It does not necessarily follow, because in the prosecution for the violation of an ordinance in a police court the offender is not entitled to a trial by jury, that the offense committed is not a "crime" in the sense in which that word is used in section 1, art. 1, par. 17, of the Constitution, forbidding "slavery or involuntary servitude, save as a punishment for crime after legal conviction thereof." This constitutional prohibition was directed against any attempt to re-establish slavery, which had but recently been abolished, or any system of servitude resembling the same. Mayor of Monroe v. Meuer, 35 La. Ann. 1192. The word "crime" was used in its generic sense, and comprehended all penal offenses—offenses against the ordinances of a municipality as well as offenses against the penal laws of the state. In many jurisdictions, a summary proceeding to enforce the penalty for the infraction of an ordinance has been characterized as a "quasi criminal" action. In the early cases of Williams v. Augusta and Floyd v. Eatonton, supra, language to this effect was used arguendo. But, as was pointed out by Fish, J., in Barnett v. City of Atlanta, 109 Ga. 169, 34 S. E. 322, the question presented for determination in those cases was the meaning of the term "criminal cases" as used in that clause of the Constitution of 1798 which gave to the superior courts exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases, except as therein provided; and it was held that reference was had to violations of the public laws of the state, and not to infractions of municipal ordinances. A valid municipal ordinance is a law of local application; an offense against the city results from its violation. McRae v. Mayor of Americus, 59 Ga. 170, 27 Am. Rep. 390. It is penal in its nature; otherwise, an offender could not be arrested and taken in custody for its violation. Infractions of municipal ordinances are always termed "petty offenses." An offense against the law is a "crime," in the broad meaning of that word. It is none the less an offense because the offender may constitutionally be tried in a police court without a jury. The clause of the Constitution which is preservative of trial by jury is applicable both to civil and criminal cases. It does not include petty offenses of the character we have discussed; neither does it embrace equity causes, which are always classified as civil actions. Equity causes were not tried by a jury when the Constitution was adopted, and for this reason it has been held that this clause did not render such cases triable by a jury, as other civil actions. Because the right to a jury is denied a suitor in equity affords no sufficient reason why such causes may not be denominated as civil.

Furthermore, it would seem an inevitable conclusion that if imprisonment may in the first instance follow conviction, the proceeding is to be regarded as criminal. This court has in several adjudications treated a trial in a municipal police court as a criminal proceeding. Thus it was held that the decision of the superior court on certiorari, reversing the judgment of a municipal court convicting one of the violation of a municipal ordinance, is not subject to review by the Supreme Court, because the proceeding was criminal and the city stood in the place of the state. Macon v. Wood, 109 Ga. 149, 34 S. E. 322; Hawkinsville v. Ethridge, 96 Ga. 326, 22 S. E. 985. So, also, it was held that a prosecution for a violation of a municipal ordinance is a "criminal case" within the meaning of the statute requiring that in all criminal cases the bill of exceptions shall be tendered and signed within 20 days from the rendition of the decision excepted to. Barnett v. Atlanta, supra. See, also, Paulk v. Mayor of Sycamore, 104 Ga. 24, 30 S. E. 417, 41 L. R. A. 772, 69 Am. St. Rep. 128. The definition of the word "crime" in the Penal Code does not militate with the construction we are giving to that word as used in this clause of the Constitution. The Penal Code of 1895 (section 31) declared a "crime or misdemeanor shall consist in a violation of a public law, in the commission of which there shall be a union or joint operation of act and intention, or criminal negligence," and that (section 2) "every crime, other than a felony, as therein defined, is a misdemeanor." This definition appertains to the subject-matter of the Penal Code, wherein only offenses against the public laws of the state are considered. Municipal offenses are not treated as violations of public laws, but as infractions of the local laws of the municipality, which have no place in the Penal Code of the state. If, therefore, as we conclude, the violation of a valid municipal ordinance is a "crime" within the purview of this constitutional provision, notwithstanding it may be summarily prosecuted in a police court without a jury, then a sentence to involuntary servitude as a result of legal conviction is not violative of our organic law.

3. Article 1, § 1, par. 3, of the Constitution of Georgia, declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, except by due process of law." Civ. Code 1895, § 5700. Counsel contend that the accused was deprived of the protection afforded by this clause of the Constitution, inasmuch as he was not furnished with a written accusation setting forth the offense with which he was charged, nor tried by a jury of his peers. We have already endeavored to show that the trial of petty offenses in the recorder's court without a jury is the substantial equivalent of a trial at common law before a justice of such offenses. In those trials before a justice of the peace, the offender was not entitled either to a jury or to a written statement of the charge preferred against him. All that was required after his appearance in person was secured was that he should be informed of the charge and should be given an opportunity to defend, that the witnesses be sworn in his presence, and that a record should be made of his conviction. 4 Bl. Com. *283. The common-law courts held that it was necessary to summon the party accused before he was condemned. Blackstone says: "After this summons, the magistrate, in summary proceedings, may go on to examine one or more witnesses, as the statute may require, upon oath, and then make his conviction of the offender in writing, upon which he usually issues his warrant, either to apprehend the offender, in case corporal punishment is to be inflicted upon him, or else to levy the penalty incurred by distress and sale of his goods. This is, in general, the method of summary proceedings before a justice." In the case of King v. Venables, 2 Ld. Raym. 1405, 1 Strange Rep. 631, it appeared that an order was passed by two justices of the peace, suppressing an alehouse, and that subsequently they passed another order, in which the fact was recited that the defendant had continued in violation of the first order to sell ale, whereby he was committed to jail. No summons appeared to have been issued, prior to this last order, calling upon the defendant to show cause why sentence should not be pronounced upon him for his disobedience of the first order; and the case was tried in his absence. On certiorari, it was held that in all summary proceedings, of which nature were these orders, a summons was necessary, in order that the offender might be afforded an opportunity to appear and make his defense. But, as a justice is punishable if he enters sentence without first summoning the offender to appear before him, the presumption was that summons had been issued, that the justices had jurisdiction, and had proceeded regularly. The orders were accordingly affirmed. Afterwards, however, it being made to appear to the court by affidavits that the justices had, in point of fact, proceeded in making the last order without summoning Venables, the court granted leave to file an information against them.

In the present case, the question of the validity of the arrest of the accused is not involved. The contention is that the trial was a nullity, not that his arrest was illegal. When he was brought before the recorder's court and informed of the charge against him, he was asked if he was ready for trial, and responded in the affirmative. He was afforded an opportunity to make his defense, and the witnesses appearing against him were sworn and testified in his presence, substantiating the charge of which he was accused. The procedure followed was substantially the same as that pursued at common law before justices of the peace in the summary trial of petty offenders. Hence we cannot say that the accused was not accorded a trial in accordance with due process of law, because of the failure to prefer a written accusation specifically defining the offense with which he is charged. In the case of Natal v. Louisiana, 139 U. S. 621, 11 Sup. Ct. 636, 35 L. Ed. 288, the Supreme Court of the United States held that an ordinance passed under legislative authority by the city of New Orleans, prohibiting the keeping of any private market within six squares of any public market of the city, under the penalty of being sentenced, upon summary conviction before a magistrate without a jury, "to pay a fine of $25 and to be imprisoned for not more than 30 days if the fine is not paid, does not violate the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States." In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Gray remarked (page 623 of 139 U. S., page 637 of 11 Sup. Ct., 35 L. Ed. 288): "The case is too plain for discussion." The test which we have applied in determining whether the procedure in the recorder's court of the city of Macon is in accord with due process of law, within the meaning of our state Constitution, and the conclusion announced by us, must be considered as sufficiently meeting the contention that such procedure does not conform to due process of law, as understood when the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution was adopted. So far as summary conviction for a petty offense is concerned, that amendment does not guaranty either a jury trial or the formality of furnishing an offender with a written accusation or statement in writing of the charge brought against him.

4. It is further contended that the penalty imposed of labor in Bibb county chain gang was a denial of due process of law, because of the nature of the penalty inflicted. For a person lawfully to be made to suffer punishment as a lawbreaker, there must not only be process of law, but due process. Process which may be sufficient to authorize punishment for petty offenses by fine, imprisonment for a reasonable time in the city barracks (or even to work upon the public works of a city, if there be in the charter any authority to impose such a sentence as confinement at labor under municipal control), will not suffice for sending a person to a county chain gang for several months. When the punishment imposed is the same, or of the same nature, as that inflicted upon offenders against the laws of the state, and to be suffered in company with them, due process requires a trial to some extent analogous to the trial of persons accused of misdemeanors against the state. To call the offense "petty" for the purpose of trial, but as serious as a violation of a state law for the purpose of punishment, is inconsistent. If the punishment is of the same character as that imposed for a state offense, the infraction of the municipal ordinance cannot be called a "petty" offense in comparison with one against the state. A sentence of a city recorder, without a right to a trial by a jury and with no more formal procedure than an entry on a docket, which subjects the prisoner to work in a county chain gang for three months, along with persons duly convicted of the violation of state laws, is not due process. It is declared in Pen. Code 1895, § 1036, that all felonies, save those therein enumerated, "shall be punished by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary for the terms set forth in the several sections of this Code prescribing the punishment of such offenses; but on the recommendation of the jury trying the case, when such recommendation is approved by the judge presiding on the trial, said crimes shall be punished as misdemeanors. If the judge trying the case sees proper, he may, in his punishment, reduce such felonies to misdemeanors." Even if those regularly convicted of felonies, but who are left in the custody of the county authorities, be kept separately, nevertheless those falling within the provisions of the Penal Code above referred to are detained in the county chain gang. If a person who is convicted of some petty municipal offense can, after trial before the recorder, be sent to the county chain gang, he would not only be sentenced to a punishment similar in its nature and character to that imposed for misdemeanors against the state, but he would be placed in direct association with, and be confined along with, felons whose punishments have been reduced under recommendation. It cannot be that such a sentence can be imposed in Georgia by one man alone, trying a criminal case. If the sentence can be for 3 months in the county chain gang, it may be for 6 or 12 months, if the Legislature should permit it. In fact, where would be the limit of legislative power to prescribe the extent of punishment to be meted out on a sentence of a recorder? It is not a question of the person who may be subjected to such a punishment. It is a question of whether our organic law has intrusted such arbitrary power of punishment to be imposed, even upon the humblest citizen, by a municipal recorder sitting alone. The intrusting of such power of punishment for so-called petty offenses to a single man is not consonant with the spirit of our institutions or with our Constitution, which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Process which tries a man without formality for a "petty offense," and punishes him in the same manner as, and along with, criminals violating the laws of the state, with no right to a jury trial, no record save the entries upon a recorder's docket, and upon his judgment alone, is not due process. We do not hold that the recorder's court of the city of Macon is illegal, or that the recorder cannot proceed to try offenders against the municipal ordinances and pass such sentences as the law authorizes; but what we hold is that a sentence which requires the offender to be confined at labor in the county chain gang along with violaters of the state laws does not furnish constitutional authority for such confinement, and that the provision of the charter of the city of Macon which authorizes the confinement of offenders against municipal ordinances in the county chain gang for not more than six months is unconstitutional.

The fact, however, that the accused has been illegally sentenced, will not result in his absolute discharge from custody where a legal sentence can be imposed. Direction is given that the applicant be not confined in the county chain gang, but be taken therefrom and carried before the recorder to be sentenced in accordance with law. Littlejohn v. Stella, 128 Ga. 427, 431, 51 S. E. 890, and citations; Coleman v. Nelms, 119 Ga. 807, 46 S. E. 451.

Judgment reversed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

HOUSTON et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS — GRANTS UNDER HEAD-RIGHT LAW — CONCLUSIVENESS.

A grant under the "headright laws," which is apparently issued conformably with the law, is not open to collateral attack.

2. EVIDENCE — BEST AND SECONDARY.

When it is shown that a muniment of title cannot be produced, parol evidence as to its contents is admissible, and has the same probative value as original evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 582-584.]

3. FISH — OYSTER BEDS — TRESPASS — OWNERSHIP.

Pen. Code 1895, § 588, makes it a misdemeanor for a person, without authority from the owner of a private bed in which oysters are planted, to take or catch any oysters therein. Relatively to a trespasser who is indicted under this section the ownership of the oysters is immaterial.

4. SAME — EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, which is approved by the trial judge.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bryan County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Cuffy Houston and others were convicted of stealing oysters, and bring error. Affirmed.

This case comes to this court upon a writ of error sued out in behalf of Cuffy Houston and Ned Maxwell to review the judgment of the court below overruling their motion for a new trial. They were tried upon an indictment framed under the Penal Code of 1895, § 588, charging them jointly with the commission of a misdemeanor, in that, on a day named, they did "take from the private bed of Silas B. Rogers, the owner thereof, oysters of the value of $1.50, without authority from said owner," contrary to the laws of this state, etc. Both were convicted. Aside from the general grounds that their conviction was contrary to law and the evidence, complaint is made in the motion for a new trial that the presiding judge erred in refusing to direct a verdict of not guilty, on motion of their counsel made after the conclusion of the evidence for the prosecution, and the verdict of the jury is specifically assailed on the grounds: (1) That there was no evidence introduced by the state in support of the allegation in the indictment that the oysters taken were the property of Silas B. Rogers, but, on the contrary, the ownership, if any, was proved to be in the Belvedere Oyster Company, a copartnership consisting of Ira G. Rogers, Edward Rogers, and Silas B. Rogers; and (2) that "the state failed to show any title in the said Silas B. Rogers to the salt marsh where it is alleged the oysters were taken, no complete chain of title having been shown." The motion for a new trial also contained an assignment of error on the admission in evidence of a grant from the state to Philip D. Cory, which the movants characterized as a grant "conveying a tract of salt marsh in which there was admittedly not a foot of high or habitable land capable of being cultivated, and which was admittedly submerged entirely by salt water every high tide, recurring twice each 24 hours." The objection urged against the admission of this grant was that "such lands were not subject to be granted by the state under any laws thereof, and any grant purporting to convey such lands was void, as being contrary to law, without authority of law, contrary to the policy of the law, and therefore constructively fraudulent; and such grant therefore could not operate to destroy the public right of fishery in such lands." The grant was dated August 28, 1890, and referred to an annexed plat of land, which was described in the grant as a "tract or parcel of land containing nine hundred and seventy-six acres, situate, lying and being in the county of Bryan," and having certain designated boundaries. A map of this tract, showing its shape and boundaries according to a survey made August 15, 1890, and duly recorded, was also introduced by the state. Across that portion of the map which represented the tract surveyed were written the words, "Philip D. Cory, 976 acres marsh lands."

Geo. W. Beckett and N. J. Norman, for plaintiffs in error. W. B. Stubbs and Livingston Kenan, Sol. Gen., for the State.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The grant to Cory was not open to collateral attack unless it was patent on its face that it was void or issued without authority of law. Civ. Code 1895, § 3220; Hilliard v. Connelly, 7 Ga. 172. This grant was issued under the headright system, which counsel for the plaintiffs in error contends is not applicable to marsh lands, but only to habitable and cultivatable lands. As supporting this view, we are referred to the various headright laws. See Prince's Dig. 517, 521, et seq.; Cobb's Dig. 660, 680. The conclusion sought to be drawn is that, if this contention be sound, then the grant issued without authority of law and should have been excluded from evidence. There is nothing in the grant to indicate that the land covered thereby is not inhabitable or cultivatable. The grant refers to an attached plat on which the words "marsh lands" are written; but we cannot say that the grant was not issued in accordance with law; nothing else appearing therefrom to indicate that the land was not such as could be legally granted. On its face the grant is perfectly regular, and apparently it was issued conformably to law. Upon the abolition of the land court the ordinary was vested with authority to discharge all the duties, which, under the various headright laws, devolved upon the land court. When the application for the grant was before the ordinary, his decision that the land could be lawfully granted was judicial in its nature, and it is entitled to all of the presumptions which usually attach to judgments rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction. So far as the papers themselves disclose, it may be that, while the bulk of the land was marshy, there was in this large tract more or less high ground, which rendered it habitable and suitable for settlement and improvement. Hence, if we concede, for the purposes of the argument, that land unfit for settlement and cultivation does not come within the operation of the headright laws, and that a fraud may have been perpetrated by the applicant for the grant in representing that the marsh lands were cultivatable, in whole or in part, or could be made so, yet the fraudulent procurement of the grant would not authorize a collateral attack upon it. Only in a direct proceeding to which the state was a party could it be set aside on the ground that it was improvidently granted or was procured by fraud. Calhoun v. Cawley, 104 Ga. 335, 30 S. E. 773. Even if the grant was not authorized by law, it is not open to collateral attack; its illegality not appearing on its face. Vickery v. Scott, 20 Ga. 795. It follows that the grant was properly admitted in evidence.

2. Counsel for the plaintiffs in error further insists that the evidence was insufficient to sustain their conviction; the state having failed to show title to the land in Silas B. Rogers. The grant from the state to Cory was introduced, and also a deed to the land from Cory to George L. Appleton. The state further proved, by parol evidence, that Appleton had conveyed the land by deed to Silas B. Rogers, but that this deed was not accessible; it having been either lost or misplaced by him. There was no objection to this secondary evidence of title from Appleton to Rogers. When it is shown that a muniment of title cannot be produced, parol evidence as to its contents is admissible and has the same probative value as original evidence. It appeared by competent evidence that the title to the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed was in the person named in the indictment as the owner of the private bed from which the oysters were taken.

3. The further contention is made that there was a variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof with respect to the ownership of the oysters. The proof was that the prosecutor, Silas B. Rogers, and his two sons had formed a partnership and were conducting business under the firm name of the Belvedere Oyster Company, and that they were jointly interested in the cultivation and sale of oysters which had been planted in the bed upon which the accused were charged with having committed a trespass. Pen. Code 1895, § 588, makes it a misdemeanor for a person, without authority from the owner of a private bed in which oysters are planted, to take or catch any oysters therein. Relatively to a trespasser who is indicted under this section, the ownership of the oysters is immaterial. The statute is designed to protect the owner of the land where the oysters are being cultivated; and, when it appears that oysters are wrongfully taken from a private bed of which he is the owner, the offense is established. The indictment in this case did not undertake to allege the ownership of the oysters, but only that they were taken from the private bed of Silas B. Rogers, the owner thereof, without his authority.

4. The evidence authorized a finding that the accused wrongfully and knowingly entered upon the lands of the prosecutor and took therefrom oysters which had been planted in a private bed belonging to him. The finding of the jury was approved by the trial judge, and we will not disturb the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

INGRAM v. STATE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER JEOPARDY.

The judge of a city court, to which an indictment charging the accused with a misdemeanor has been by the superior court transferred for trial, has no right, without the consent of the defendant, after the case has been submitted to the jury and the evidence for the state introduced, to suspend the trial, withdraw the case from the jury, and require the accused to give bond for his appearance at the next term of the superior court of the county, or, in default thereof, to be committed to jail, to answer to the charge of a felony; and if he does so, the accused, having been placed in jeopardy, is entitled to an order for his final discharge as upon a verdict of acquittal, upon a motion duly made therefor in such city court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sparta; F. L. Little, Judge.

Jonas Ingram was charged with crime, and brings error. Reversed.

R. H. Lewis, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Moore, Sol., for the State.

FISH, C. J. At the September term, 1904, of Hancock superior court, the grand jury returned an indictment against Jonas Ingram, charging him with having committed the offense of adultery and fornication with one Carry Barnes; he being a married man, and she an unmarried woman. The indictment was transferred to the city court of Sparta, in which court the case came on to be tried at the October term, 1905, thereof. After the jury had been impaneled and sworn, and the state had introduced its evidence and closed, the court, being of opinion "that the evidence developed that a felony and not a misdemeanor had been committed" by the accused, over the objection of the defendant, ordered that the trial be suspended and the case be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, and that the accused be required to give bond in a designated sum for his appearance at the next term of the superior court of the county, in default of which he be committed to jail to answer to the charge of rape. After this the accused made a motion for his discharge, upon the ground that he had been placed in jeopardy, which motion was overruled by the court, whereupon he accepted.

Where the indictment or accusation is not fatally defective, the law recognizes two reasons only as justifying the discharge of the jury before they have agreed upon a verdict and legally returned it into court, viz., the prisoner's consent, and necessity in some of its various forms, one of which is mistrial. Lancton v. State, 14 Ga. 426. And where a criminal case has been submitted to a jury upon a valid indictment, and is withdrawn from their consideration by the judge for any reason other than the two above named, it is equivalent to an acquittal of the accused. Reynolds v. State, 3 Ga. 53. The present case should therefore be considered as if the jury, upon the trial in the city court, had acquitted the defendant and he should subsequently have been indicted for rape and placed upon trial in the superior court and a plea of former acquittal filed. There is some confusion in the decisions of this court in reference to the test for determining the question of former jeopardy. See Gully v. State, 116 Ga. 527, 42 S. E. 790, wherein the cases are collected and commented on. In the early case of Roberts v. State, 14 Ga. 8, the court said: "To avoid any confusion on this subject, we adopt the rule as it is otherwise more generally, and perhaps more accurately expressed, viz., that the plea of autrefois acquit or convict is sufficient, whenever the proof shows the second case to be the same transaction with the first." As was said in Gully's Case, supra, this is the rule adopted and generally followed in this state, and was applied in the following cases: Holt v. State, 38 Ga. 187; Jones v. State, 55 Ga. 625; Buhler v. State, 64 Ga. 504; Goode v. State, 70 Ga. 752; Knight v. State, 73 Ga. 804; Knox v. State, 89 Ga. 259, 15 S. E. 308. In Holt's Case, supra, he and six others were indicted for the offense of assault with intent to murder, the indictment charging them with shooting at a named person, at a stated time and place, with intent to murder her. Upon failure of trial under demand, the accused were discharged at a subsequent term. After this Holt and five of the others were indicted for riot, this last indictment charging them with having, at the same time and place, feloniously and maliciously shot a loaded pistol at the same person named in the former indictment, and with striking and beating her. Holt filed a plea of former acquittal, which was stricken on demurrer. This court held that the striking of the plea was error. In delivering the opinion of the court, Warner, J., used this language: "If the state thinks proper, by its prosecuting officer, to indict a party for an assault with intent to murder, upon a given state of facts, and upon the trial thereof the defendant is acquitted, can the state then prefer another indictment, alleging precisely the same state of facts [with the exception of the malicious intent], and put the party again upon his trial for the same criminal acts, by altering the name of the offense? The state having made its election as to the nature and character of the offense for which it will prosecute the party upon a given state of facts, if, upon the trial, the defendant is acquitted, ought not the state to be bound by its election, and not be permitted again to indict and prosecute the defendant for the same criminal acts, under the name of another offense? The question to be answered is, has the defendant been arraigned and put upon his trial upon a sufficient legal accusation, for the same criminal acts with which he is charged the second time? If he has, then he has been put in jeopardy, within the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, and cannot be tried the second time for the same criminal acts, under the same, or a different named offense. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the provision of the Constitution which declares, 'Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb,' for all practical purposes, to be a mere shadow and delusion. These views are in accordance with the ruling of this court in Roberts & Copenhagen v. State, 14 Ga. 8."

Applying the same transaction test, the accused in the present case has been arraigned and put upon trial in the city court, upon a good indictment, for the same criminal act for which he was bound over to answer in the superior court, and the judge of the city court erred in not granting the motion for his discharge. Section 27 of the act establishing the city court of Sparta (Acts 1905, p. 353) provides: "If upon the trial of any case it shall appear to the judge that the evidence makes the case a felony against the accused, he shall thereupon suspend the trial and commit or ball over the defendant to the next superior court as in preliminary examination." While this language is sufficiently broad to cover a case being tried under an indictment, as well as one being tried under an accusation, we think it clear that if construed to apply to such a case, this provision of the act would be violative of the provision of the Constitution declaring that no person shall be put in jeopardy of life or liberty more than once for the same offense, save on his or her motion for a new trial after conviction, or in case of a mistrial. Counsel for the state cite Cunningham v. State, 80 Ga. 4, 5 S. E. 251; but the ruling there made has no application here. There the accused was brought before a county court and an accusation preferred against him, charging a misdemeanor. Thereupon he waived indictment by the grand jury and demanded a jury trial in the county court; and it was held that "this amounted to an agreement to be tried under the provisions of the act regulating trials in [that] court, including the right of the judge of that court, if at any time during the progress of the trial he should be of the opinion that the evidence produced before him made the offense of a felony instead of a misdemeanor, to stop the trial at once and commit the defendant to jail, or require him to give bond for his appearance at the next term of the superior court." But in the case before us the accused did not waive indictment by the grand jury and consent to be tried in the city court. He was already indicted and was before the city court for trial under the indictment. His trial in the city court was not a matter of choice with him, but of compulsion. His consent to be tried there was neither given nor invoked. The shield of the constitutional provision in question was over him, and could not be removed without his consent. Besides, the time for a preliminary investigation has passed, for the grand jury had already investigated the case and returned an indictment, and the judge of the city court had no more power to resolve the trial into a preliminary one than the judge of the superior court would have had, if the case had been on trial, under the indictment, in that court. In State v. Blevins, 134 Ala. 213, 32 South. 637, 92 Am. St. Rep. 22, the accused was placed on trial in the inferior criminal court of Mobile, under an affidavit and warrant charging him with the offense of assault and battery, and after the evidence was all in and the argument concluded, the judge, being of opinion from the evidence that the offense of assault with intent to ravish had been committed by the accused, ordered that unless he should enter into a recognizance to appear before a higher named court to answer the latter charge, he should be committed to jail until legally discharged. The accused sued out a writ of habeas corpus and was discharged, and the state excepted. The Supreme Court of Alabama held: "If the trial of the accused for a misdemeanor, upon issue joined on a plea of not guilty, proceeds to the conclusion of the evidence and reaches the stage of calling for a judgment of the court on the issue as made, he is placed in jeopardy, and the court has no jurisdiction to bind him over to a higher tribunal to answer for a greater offense for the same act."

It follows that the judge of the city court erred in refusing to sustain the motion for the discharge of the accused, and the judgment is therefore reversed. All the Justices concurring.

MILLINDER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — CONTRACT OF HIRING—FALSE PRETENSES—EVIDENCE.

It is not necessary in an indictment under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), making it illegal for a person to procure money or other thing of value on a contract to perform services with intent to defraud, to allege that the term of service had expired before the indictment was preferred. Proof of a failure to perform the services contracted for, and proof of failure to return the money or other thing of value advanced, even during the term of service provided for in the contract, is sufficient, under the act, to establish prima facie the intent to defraud which the act punishes.

2. SAME—LOSS TO HIRER.

Loss or damage to the hirer is an essential ingredient to the offense defined in the act above referred to.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence discloses that there was no loss or damage to the hirer, the verdict was unauthorized, and it was error to refuse to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Dawson; A. M. Raines, Judge.

Aaron Millinder was convicted of contracting to perform services with intent to defraud, and brings error. Reversed.

Aaron Millinder was convicted on an accusation charging him with cheating and swindling, under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). There was demurrer to the accusation, upon the ground that the time in which the labor contracted for was to be performed had not expired at the date of the accusation, and that the time in which the money procured by reason of the contract might be repaid, as provided in the act, had not expired. This demurrer was overruled. After conviction, a motion for a new trial upon the general grounds was made and overruled.

M. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. M. J. Yeomans, Sol., for the State.

COBB, P. J. There was no merit in the demurrer to the accusation. The offense with which the defendant was charged was the procurement of money and other things of value by entering into a contract to perform labor as a cropper which he had no intention to perform. The act provides that satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring of money, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced, with interest thereon, at the time said labor was to be performed, etc., shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent to defraud. The failure to perform the services contracted for is a breach of the contract which may occur before the contract expires. It may occur the first day the contract begins to run. It follows that the time when the money procured is to be returned is when there has been a failure to perform the services contracted for, or, in other words, when the contract is broken.

2. The evidence introduced by the state failed to show that the landlord, Bridges, suffered any damage or loss by the breach of the contract upon the part of the accused. Bridges testified: "I cannot say how much I was damaged. I cannot say that I was damaged any." The evidence further shows that, while the amount advanced the accused in supplies, fertilizers, etc., amounted to something over $200, his part of the crop was worth more than $500. Loss by or damage to the person contracted with, and from whom money or other thing of value is procured, is a necessary element in the offense with which this defendant is charged.

The evidence did not warrant the verdict; and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is reversed. All the Justices concurring.

CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — STATEMENT OF ACCUSED.

"It is the duty of the presiding judge to instruct the jury substantially in the terms of the statute touching the prisoner's statement, when he makes a statement, and in no case should this be omitted." The failure to so charge will be cause for a new trial, except where it is manifest from the record that the accused was not injured thereby. This did not appear in the present case. *McCord v. RIDGLEY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY — UNLAWFULLY SHOOTING AT ANOTHER—EVIDENCE.

Under the uncontradicted evidence, the accused was guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another, if not of the graver offense of assault with intent to murder, and the verdict of guilty of the former offense was rightly upheld by the trial court.

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

The contention of the accused that the shooting was caused by misfortune or accident was not sustained by the evidence introduced in his behalf, nor would the jury have been warranted in finding him guilty of no higher offense than that of a bare assault and battery. Accordingly it was not incumbent on the presiding judge to present this theory of the defense in his charge to the jury, or to instruct them as to the law relating to a mere assault and battery.

STEVENS v. McCURDY.

MORTGAGES—OCCUPANCY OF PREMISES BY THIRD PERSON—RENTS—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE.

A. was the owner of a lot upon which was located a storehouse, in which he was engaged in business as a merchant. He executed a security deed conveying the lot to B. After default in the payment of the debt that the deed was given to secure, A. was adjudged a bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy took possession of the stock of goods and sold the same to C. B. did not prove his debt in the bankrupt court, but brought suit in the state court, obtained a special lien upon the land, and sold the land. The proceeds from the sale were not sufficient to pay the debt. The purchaser of the stock of goods from the trustee in bankruptcy went into possession of the storehouse, and remained in possession until after the sheriff's sale. The trustee in bankruptcy had made no attempt to administer the land as a part of the assets of the bankrupt's estate. After the discharge of the trustee in bankruptcy, B. brought suit against the purchaser of the goods for rent of the storehouse from the time that he entered into possession until he surrendered possession to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. Held, that a demurrer, on the ground that the petition set forth no cause of action, was properly sustained.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by John F. Stevens, executor of E. M. Baker, against J. F. McCurdy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John F. Stevens, as executor of the estate of Mrs. E. M. Baker, brought suit against J. F. McCurdy, and alleged in substance: The testatrix made a loan of $2,000 to one J. A. Campbell, and to secure its payment Campbell executed a security deed to her, conveying a lot of land in De Kalb county. Campbell remained in possession of the premises, conducting thereon a general merchandise business, and after default in the payment of his note was adjudged a bankrupt. A trustee in bankruptcy took charge of Campbell's effects, and on December 22, 1902, sold the stock of goods on the premises to McCurdy. On the same day McCurdy took possession of the goods and of the storehouse, which stood upon the premises, and occupied the storehouse until November 3, 1903. The plaintiff did not prove his claim under the note against Campbell in the bankrupt court, but sued in the state court, and obtained a special judgment subjecting the land covered by the deed to the payment of the note. On November 3, 1903, the land was sold, under this judgment, and, after the payment of costs, the proceeds were applied to the debt, leaving a large balance still due. On March 1, 1903, plaintiff demanded rent of McCurdy for the storehouse occupied by him, and possession of the premises, both of which were refused. The trustee in bankruptcy did not attempt to administer the real estate above described, and prior to this suit was discharged. Whereupon the plaintiff brings his action against McCurdy for rent of the storehouse, at the rate of $15 per month, which he avers is a reasonable rent, from December 22, 1902, the date of the defendant's entry to March 1, 1903, the date of demand by plaintiff, and for double rent from March 1, 1903, to November 3, 1903, the date of the sale of the land. The defendant demurred, on the ground that the petition set forth no cause of action, and also on special grounds. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

Green, Tilson & McKinney, for plaintiff in error. J. E. & L. F. McClelland, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. To maintain an action for rents there must exist between the parties the relation of landlord and tenant. In the absence of an express contract creating this relation, an obligation to pay rent is generally implied "when title is shown in the plaintiff and occupation by the defendant"; "but if the entry was not under the plaintiff, or if possession is adverse to him, no such implication arises." Civ. Code 1895, § 3116. In the present case there was no express contract of rent, and the relation of landlord and tenant must arise under the above rule of law, or the action will fail. An absolute deed, although made to secure a debt, passes title to the grantee. The plaintiff held such a deed to the premises in dispute, and so establishes the first requisite towards maintaining his action. Occupation of the premises by the defendant was also shown; and so the sole question in the case is whether or not the entry of the defendant as shown by plaintiff's petition was not under plaintiff, or possession was adverse to plaintiff, in which case the obligation to pay rent will not arise.

It is claimed that a deed to secure a debt was in effect a common-law mortgage, in that both passed title, and both gave the grantor an equity of redemption. The English courts have held a mortgagee entitled to rents from a lessee of the mortgagor under a lease executed after the mortgage, upon notice to the lessee by the mortgagee of his claim. This is put upon the ground that a mortgagor holds the premises like a tenant at will; that a mortgagee can sue in ejectment and recover mesne profits, and would therefore be entitled to sue in assumpsit for the rents; and that a lessee of the mortgagor is in fact a lessee of the mortgagee; the mortgagor acting as agent of the mortgagee, and upon notice to the lessee the mortgagee would be entitled to rents for past occupation, if unpaid at time of notice, as well as rents accruing in the future. Pope v. Biggs, 32 Revised Reports, 667, and cases cited. We do not think it was ever contemplated that the grantor in a security deed should occupy such a position as that outlined above. Until default in the payment due by him, the grantor is entitled to the possession of the premises. It is true that this court has held in numerous cases that an action of ejectment may be brought upon a security deed by the grantee against the grantor, after default, but this may be successfully defended by a tender of the amount due (Biggers v. Bird, 55 Ga. 653); and in such a suit in ejectment mesne profits are not recoverable save during the pendency of the action, and then only to be applied in payment of the debt. Polhill v. Brown, 84 Ga. 343, 10 S. E. 921.

It should be borne in mind that the plaintiff in this case did not sue in ejectment, but brought a statutory proceeding, obtaining a special judgment subjecting the land in question to its payment. A separate suit for rent by the grantee against the grantor could not be maintained, even after default, as the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between them. "One who makes to a creditor, for the purpose of securing a debt, a deed to land, but retains possession of the land, does not thereby become the 'tenant' either of such creditor or his vendee, and is not subject at the instance of the latter to be ejected from the land as a tenant holding over." Ray v. Boyd, 96 Ga. 808, 22 S. E. 916. But it is said that, in the present case, recovery of rent is sought, not against the grantor, but against a tenant of the grantor, after default by the latter, which entitles the grantee to possession of the land. It is readily seen that while the relation of landlord and tenant may not exist between the grantor in a security deed and his grantee after default (because the entry of the grantor was not under the grantee), such a relation may exist between the grantee and a tenant of the grantor, whose entry after default by the grantor was an entry under the grantee. If the tenant of the grantor entered before the latter's default notice by the grantee to the tenant, after the grantor's default, might possibly operate as if the tenant had attorned to him. Morrow v. Sawyer, 82 Ga. 226, 8 S. E. 51. So, if McCurdy, the defendant, was a tenant of the grantor in the security deed under which the plaintiff, as grantee therein, claims rent, he might have become a tenant of the grantee upon notice by the latter to him of his claim. Campbell, the grantor in the security deed, was adjudged a bankrupt after default in the payment of the debt to secure which the deed was given. If Campbell had put McCurdy in possession, he might possibly be looked upon as an agent of the grantee in putting McCurdy into possession of the premises; or, as the trustee in bankruptcy stood in Campbell's place, any tenant put in by such trustee, upon notice from the grantee might be liable to him for rent. The trustee sold the stock of merchandise in the store upon the premises in dispute to McCurdy. McCurdy took possession of the stock of merchandise, and remained in possession of the premises. If this entry was such an entry as would entitle the trustee to maintain an action for rent, the plaintiff might maintain such an action. For after notice to McCurdy by the grantee, treating this as an attornment, McCurdy would become the tenant of the plaintiff. But McCurdy did not enter as a tenant either under Campbell or the trustee in bankruptcy. His entry was under a license to take possession of the stock of merchandise. By remaining in possession of the premises, he abused his license, and became a trespasser ab initio. Markham v. Brown, 37 Ga. 281, 92 Am. Dec. 73. As a trespasser, no action for rent could lie against him.

The demurrer to the petition was therefore properly sustained, and the judgment of the court below is accordingly affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

FRIEDMAN v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

RAILROADS—ACTIONS—VENUE.

A suit for damages against a railway company for the breach of a contract of affreightment may, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2334, be brought either in the county in which the contract was entered into, or in the county wherein the carrier undertook to render full performance by delivery of the shipment in good order to the consignor or the person designated by him to receive the same.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Geo. T. Cann, Judge.

Action by Samuel Friedman against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A suit for damages was brought by Samuel Friedman against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, the allegations of fact upon which the plaintiff relied for a recovery being, in brief, as follows: On January 22, 1904, plaintiff shipped from Dublin, in this state, via the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad, to Vidalia, the point at which that road connects with the defendant's line of railway, a car load of cattle, consigned to plaintiff at Savannah, Chatham county, Ga. The defendant received this car of cattle in the afternoon of January 22d, in good order, from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company, and then and there undertook to ship and transport the same to Savannah with reasonable dispatch and care, and there deliver the cattle to plaintiff in good order. In the ordinary course of transit, if defendant had performed its duty, the cattle would have been delivered to plaintiff not later than Saturday morning, January 23d; but the defendant failed to perform its duty to transport the cattle within a reasonable time over its route from Vidalia to Savannah, and contrary to its legal duty, and in violation of its contract as a common carrier, permitted the cattle to remain in the car from the time it received the same till Sunday morning, January 24th, although the distance from Vidalia to Savannah is only about 80 miles. In consequence of the cattle being in transit for something like 41 hours, instead of 12 to 16 hours, within which time they should have been carried, 7 head were missing. Plaintiff was advised on Sunday morning of the arrival of the car, and went to inspect the cattle. He found them in bad condition, as a result of the acts of the defendant, and refused to accept the shipment, but was prevailed on by the company's agent to do so, upon his assurance that the defendant would pay the damages. On opening the car, plaintiff found that, "in addition to the seven head that had been destroyed," the other cattle had sustained injuries caused by bruises and by loss of rest, feed, and water. Some of them died, some had fever, and others were so badly injured and bruised as to necessitate feeding and pasturing them before putting them on the market. Though the car arrived in Savannah about midnight on Saturday, the defendant permitted the cattle to remain in the car till late Sunday morning, notwithstanding some of them were down in the car, and unable to get up, and were being trampled on and bruised and injured. The defendant company acted in bad faith in refusing to pay his claim for damages after having induced him to pay the freight and accept the shipment upon the assurance that the damages would be paid. The defendant demurred to the petition, one of the grounds of the demurrer being that it appeared from the plaintiff's pleadings that the alleged cause of action did not arise in Chatham county, in which county the suit was brought, but arose in the county of Montgomery, and therefore jurisdiction over the cause of action, if one existed, was lodged exclusively in the superior court of Montgomery county. The plaintiff having announced his election to treat the action as one arising ex contractu, the court passed upon the demurrer, and sustained that ground of it which invoked a decision as to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the suit. To this judgment dismissing the action the plaintiff excepts.

W. B. Stubbs and Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. J. Randolph Anderson, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). The allegations of the petition sufficiently set out a contract and a breach thereof, as against a demurrer raising the sole question of venue. The plaintiff construed his own petition to state a cause of action arising ex contractu, and the court, adopting this construction, held that the defendant was not suable in Chatham county, and dismissed the action. Civ. Code 1895, § 2334, provides that "all railroad companies shall be sued in the county in which the cause of action originated, by any one whose person or property has been injured by such railroad company, its officers, agents or employes, for the purpose of recovering damages for such injuries; and also on all contracts made or to be performed in the county where suit is brought; any judgment rendered in any other county than the one in which the cause so originated shall be utterly void. But if the cause of action arises in a county where the railroad company liable to suit has no agent, then suit may be brought in the county of the residence of such company." By the terms of this section, a railroad company must be sued in the county where the tort was committed, if the company has an agent in that county. So. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 655, 23 S. E. 836; Coakley v. So. R. Co., 120 Ga. 960, 48 S. E. 372. If the action is ex contractu, then the venue is either the county where the contract was made or the county where the final act of execution of the contract was to be performed. Unless we give this meaning to the words of the statute, "contracts made or to be performed," they will not receive their ordinary signification.

No question as to the meaning of so much of this section as relates to the venue of actions arising ex contractu seems to have been heretofore raised in this court. We have not been cited to a single case where a construction of this part of section 2334 was invoked. The case of Mitchell v. Georgia Railroad, reported in 68 Ga. 644, was a suit against the railroad company on a written contract for the shipment of live stock from Atlanta, in Fulton county, Ga., to Union Point, a station located in Greene county. The suit was brought in Greene county, where full performance of the contract was to be completed by delivery of the shipment to the consignee. The plaintiff offered an amendment to the petition, which was disallowed; and on an exception to the ruling of the trial judge, refusing the amendment, Speer, J., on page 648, said: "Railroad companies are liable to be sued, not only in any county where the cause of action originated, but also on all contracts made or to be performed in the county where the suit is brought. The suit upon the written contract or upon the cause of action arising therefrom, as the contract was to be performed in Greene county, was properly brought in that county." This decision was rendered before the amending act of 1892, but the only change made in the law by that act was to strike out the provision that railroad companies should be "liable" to suit in certain jurisdictions, and to introduce in its stead the requirement that railroad companies "shall" be sued, if at all, only in those counties wherein the filing of an action is expressly authorized. In other words, while under the old law the right to sue in certain designated jurisdictions was permissive, the amending act made the choice of venue compulsory. We hold the clear import of Civ. Code 1895, § 2334, as applied to suits against railroad companies for breach of contract, to be that suit may be brought either in the county where the contract was entered into, or in the county where the final act of performance under the contract was to be consummated.

The petition alleged that the contract entered into by the railroad company was an undertaking to transport the cattle from Vidalia to Savannah, in Chatham county, and there deliver the same to the plaintiff, the person who made the contract. It follows that the suit for the breach of this contract was properly brought in the county where the delivery in good order was to be made—where the contract was to be performed.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

YOUNG v. SMITH & KELLY CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

NEGLIGENCE—DEFECTIVE BUILDING—LIABILITY OF SUBCONTRACTOR.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from the City Court of Savannah; T. M. Norwood, Judge.

Action by Henry Young against the Smith & Kelly Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Henry Young brought an action against the Smith & Kelly Company, a corporation, for damages alleged to have been sustained by him on account of the negligence of the defendant. The material allegations of the petition were as follows: The foreign owners of a steamship consigned her to J. F. Minis & Co. at the port of Savannah, Ga., to be loaded by them with cotton. Prior to the delivery of the ship to Minis & Co., it was delivered to the Smith & Kelly Company, to be loaded with phosphate rock. The rock was put into the hold of the vessel through its hatches, and the Smith & Kelly Company contracted with the owners of the vessel to replace and securely fasten the hatches on the sides or combings thereof; which agreement was one usually entered into between ship-owners and stevedores doing business in the port of Savannah, and was a custom well known and understood among shipowners, ship laborers, and employes in that port. Within 24 hours after the loading of the vessel with phosphate rock by the Smith & Kelly Company had been completed, it was placed by such corporation in the custody of the consignees, Minis & Co., to be loaded with cotton. Plaintiff, a laborer of Minis & Co., went to one of the hatches, with the intention of removing the top of the same in order to store cotton in the hold. The Smith & Kelly Company, or its servants, had covered this hatch with tarpaulins. Plaintiff walked on the top of this hatch, as usual and customary in such cases, and in the line of his duty, to remove the tarpaulins and take up the covering of the hatch, which had been placed there by the servants of the Smith & Kelly Company. While engaged in this work, one of the compartments or partitions of the hatch, by reason of being insecurely fastened by the servants of the Smith & Kelly Company, gave way and turned over, precipitating plaintiff into the hold below, injuring him as set out in the petition. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

E. H. Abrahams and R. L. Colding, for plaintiff in error. O'Connor, O'Byrne & Hart-ridge, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts). The general rule is well established that an independent contractor is not liable for injuries to a third person, occurring after the contractor has completed the work and turned it over to the owner or employer and the same has been accepted by him, though the injury result from the contractor's failure to properly carry out his contract. 1 Thomp. Neg. par. 686; Whart. Neg. § 438 et seq.; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 209. There are some modifications of this rule. Among them are cases where the work is a nuisance per se, or where it is turned over by the contractor in a manner so negligently defective as to be imminently dangerous to third persons. See above-cited authorities. The present case, we think, falls within the general rule. The Smith & Kelly Company was an independent contractor. It had fully completed its contract for loading the vessel with prosphate rock, and had turned it over to the consignees, Minis & Co. The work was not a nuisance, nor was the condition of the hatch as left by the Smith & Kelly Company imminently dangerous in itself. Plaintiff, a laborer of this firm, was injured, as the petition alleged, by the negligent failure of the Smith & Kelly Company to perform its contract with the owners of the ship. It is clear that under the rule above announced, the plaintiff, if he had been a servant of the owners of the vessel, would have had no cause of action against the Smith & Kelly Company. As he was a servant of Minis & Co. and not of the owners, the rule is equally applicable, and he had no cause of action against the defendant. Fulton County Street Railway Co. v. McConnell, 87 Ga. 756, 13 S. E. 828, is cited for the plaintiff in error. There a street railway company, having authority under its charter to construct a railway in a public street, had the work done by an independent contractor. An injury to a person passing along the street was caused by the negligence of a servant of the contractor in unnecessarily and improperly laying down loose rails in advance of the workmen engaged in constructing the track. In a suit against both the railway company and the contractor, the contractor was held liable for the consequences of such negligence. The railway company was held not liable, on the ground that it had not reserved any control over the conduct of the contractor in executing the work.

Counsel for plaintiff in error also cited Ridgeway v. Downing Company, 109 Ga. 591, 34 S. E. 1028. In that case the owner of a vacant city lot, who for years had suffered the public to use a thoroughfare over the same, employed an independent contractor to construct a building thereon, according to certain specifications, including piling for the foundation. The contractor dug a trench for such purpose across the thoroughfare. It was held that the owner of the lot was not liable for a personal injury sustained by one who fell into the trench by reason of its unguarded condition. The nonliability of the owner was put upon the same ground as that announced in Fulton County Street Railway Co. v. McConnell; that is, that the owner had no immediate direction and control over the work. Both of these cases were governed by the decision rendered in Atlanta & Florida Railway Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, 164, 13 S. E. 277, 27 Am. St. Rep. 231, where it was held: "Where an individual or corporation contracts with another individual or corporation exercising an independent employment, for the latter to do a work, not in itself unlawful or attended with danger to others, such work to be done according to the contractor's own methods, and not subject to the employer's control or orders, except as to the results to be obtained, the employer is not liable for the wrongful or negligent acts of the contractor or of the contractor's servants." This rule is embodied in section 3818, Civ. Code 1895, and exceptions thereto in section 3819. There is nothing in these cases in conflict with the general rule that an independent contractor is not liable for injuries to a third person, occurring after the completion of the work and its acceptance by the owner or employer, resulting from the failure of the contractor to properly carry out his contract. The petition was properly dismissed upon general demurrer, as it set forth no cause of action against the defendant.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

PROPELLER TOWBOAT CO. OF SAVANNAH v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where an agent sends a telegram for an undisclosed principal, the principal may maintain an action in his own name for damages resulting from an error in transmission which brought about delay in the delivery of the telegram.

The petition set forth a cause of action, and the damages claimed were not too remote to be the subject of a legal recovery.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; T. M. Norwood, Judge.

Action by the Propeller Towboat Company of Savannah against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Propeller Towboat Company of Savannah brought suit against the Western Union Telegraph Company, and alleged: The plaintiff entered into a charter party with the Savannah Lighterage & Transfer Company, whereby the plaintiff became the lessee of a schooner, the Hilda, owned by the lighterage company. Under the terms of the charter party six lay days were allowed for loading the schooner, and "for each and every day's detention by default of said party of the second part [the towboat company], or agent, $56 per day shall be paid by said party of the second part to said party of the first part," etc. While the schooner lay at Lambert's Point, Va., the plaintiff, desiring her to proceed to Newport News, Va., requested the lighterage company to so instruct the captain by wire, which was attempted to be done on that day, December 15, 1903, by the lighterage company sending him a telegram over the line of the Western Union Telegraph Company. No answer being received, the lighterage company, at request of plaintiff, on December 18, 1903, again telegraphed the captain of the schooner to proceed to Newport News. The first telegram had not been delivered, by reason of an error in transmission, and the first and second telegrams were delivered at the same time on December 18, 1903. Upon receipt of these telegrams the schooner proceeded at once to Newport News, arriving there December 19, 1903, but, having to wait her turn at loading, did not complete loading until December 28, 1903. It is alleged that the schooner arrived at Lambert's Point on December 11, 1903, and having six lay days for loading, if the telegram of December 15, 1903, had been delivered promptly, could have proceeded at once to Newport News and loaded immediately without any delay, completing the act of loading within the time limit of the six lay days. But by reason of the failure to deliver the telegram until December 18, 1903, the schooner did not reach Newport News until December 19, 1903, and between December 16th and December 19th so many vessels had come in that the loading of the Hilda was delayed until December 28, 1903. For this delay the towboat company was compelled to pay and did pay demurrage, as agreed in the charter party, $56 per day for 10½ days, amounting to $602. A demurrer to the petition was filed, upon the ground that it set forth no cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

O'Connor, O'Byrne & Hartridge, for plaintiff in error. Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. The telegram which has given rise to this controversy was sent by the lighterage company to the captain of the schooner Hilda. The lighterage company, in so sending the telegram, acted as the agent of the towboat company; the latter being an undisclosed principal. There is no question about the right of an undisclosed principal to sue a telegraph company for negligence in the delivery of telegrams. "The governing principle is that an undisclosed principal, as the ultimate party in interest, is entitled, against third persons, to all advantages and benefits of such acts and contracts of his agent, and consequently that he may sue in his own name on such contracts. Story, Ag. § 418 et seq; Dodd Grocery Company v. Postal Telegraph Company, 112 Ga. 685, 37 S. E. 981, and see cases cited. The judge in the court below based his rulings sustaining the demurrer to the petition upon the ground that, before recovery could be had of the telegraph company, the plaintiff must show itself to have been under a legal obligation to pay the amount of demurrage to the lighterage company, which it now seeks as damages arising from the failure of the telegraph company to deliver promptly the message sent over its line. Under this test the plaintiff made out a case. The charter party provides: "It is agreed that the lay days for loading shall be as follows: Six (6) days. And that for each and every day's detention by default of said party of the second part, or agent, $56 per day shall be paid by said party of the second part, or agent, to said party of the first part, or agent." The telegraph company, after its acceptance of the message for transmission, became the agent of the towboat company. Its negligent failure to deliver the telegram was the negligent act of its principal, so far as the lighterage company was concerned. See Western Union Tel. Co. v. Lumber Company, 114 Ga. 580, 40 S. E. 815, 88 Am. St. Rep. 36; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760; and Brooke v. Western Union Tel. Co., 119 Ga. 694, 46 S. E. 826. Had the lighterage company sued the plaintiff in this case for the demurrage justly due it, the plaintiff could not have escaped liability under cover of the Western Union Telegraph Company's negligence.

It was said that the damages were too remote. In the case of Western Union Tel. Co. v. Fatman, 73 Ga. 285, 54 Am. Rep. 877, the court held that the commissions a ship broker would have made by securing a vessel were proper damages for the nondelivery of a telegram. Mr. Chief Justice Jackson said: "The damages are said to be too remote. Not so. They were precisely what the plaintiff would have made by his contract with Nisbet if the cablegram had reached him at 11:10 a. m." And in the case of Walden v. Western Union Tel. Co., 105 Ga. 275, 31 S. E. 172, where a shipment of guano was ordered by wire, and it appeared that the intending purchaser had contracted with other parties for the sale of such guano, the nondelivery of his telegram, which prevented the shipment to him of the guano, gave rise to an action for damages, in which the measure was the amount he would have earned, had he been able to carry out his contract for the sale of the guano. Counsel for plaintiff in error relies upon the cases of Georgia Railroad v. Hayden, 71 Ga. 518, 51 Am. Rep. 274, and White v. Blitch, 112 Ga. 775, 38 S. E. 80, as authority to show that the damages claimed in the present case were too remote and speculative to be the basis of a recovery. We think, however, that these cases are distinguishable from the case at bar. In the case first referred to, stress was laid upon the fact that the railway company was ignorant of the peculiar character of the business of the traveler, as there was nothing in the case to put the company upon notice that a delay of the train upon which the traveler was riding would occasion a loss to him. In the second case cited, damages were claimed for a failure to furnish machinery for ginning cotton in thorough repair and machinery suitable for ginning a crop of a given year, the damages claimed being the diminution in the market value of cotton, and it was held that the pleading which set up this damage did not set forth sufficient facts from which it could be determined whether or not such damages had been sustained even if they were legally recoverable. And as to whether the damages claimed for the rotting of a portion of the cotton and the decrease in weight were recoverable, it was said that it could not be reasonably claimed they were sustained because of the plaintiff's failure to comply with his undertaking, and it was further said that there were no sufficient facts set forth in the pleading to show that the conclusion stated therein was correct. It is to be noted in reference to these cases that neither was decided by a full bench, the first being decided by two justices and the last by five justices.

Error to Circuit Court, Ritchie County.
Action by T. P. Jeffrey and others against Frederick Lemon and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Davis & Son, for plaintiffs in error. F. H. McGregor and Van Winkle & Ambler, for defendants in error.

McWHORTER, P. This is an action of ejectment brought by T. P. Jeffrey, Thomas E. Davis, and others against Frederick Lemon and others in the circuit court of Ritchie county for two tracts of land, 900 acres and 439 acres, respectively. The immediate title claimed by plaintiffs to the 900 acres is a tax deed dated May 26, 1879, executed by G. W. Amos, clerk of the county court of Ritchie county, to W. L. Hitchcox, E. J. Knight, and J. P. Strickler, the said 900 acres being a part of a tract of 1,430 acres sold by the sheriff of Ritchie county on the 8th day of June, 1874, for the taxes of 1871, charged to and returned delinquent for said taxes in the name of David Kerr and others; and to the 439 acres is a tax deed dated the 6th day of May, 1879, executed by the same clerk to the same parties, purchased by the vendees at a tax sale thereof on the 9th day of June, 1874, the said 439 acres being a part of a tract of 500 acres charged to and returned delinquent in the name of David Kerr and others, and was sold for such delinquent taxes for the years 1871 and 1872.

On the 30th day of December, 1786, there was granted by the commonwealth of Virginia a tract of 2,000 acres of land to James Henry, assignee, etc., said tract being known as "Robert Lilburn No. 15." The same became delinquent and forfeited to the commonwealth. In 1845 Peter G. Van Winkle, commissioner of delinquent and forfeited lands of Ritchie county, reported the same as delinquent and forfeited, and caused the same to be surveyed, and under decree of the circuit court of law and chancery of said county sold 1,430 acres, so much of said tract of 2,000 acres as he found not covered by other titles on which the taxes had been paid, at which sale William Campbell became the purchaser and received a deed from the said Van Winkle, commissioner, therefor, dated the 9th of September, 1846. Campbell conveyed the same afterwards to David Kerr and others on the 10th day of October, 1864. The same commissioner, Van Winkle, in another proceeding against 2,000 acres granted by the commonwealth of Virginia, by patent 18th of April, 1786, to James Newport and others, attorneys in fact and trustees of Isaac Sidman, under like decrees of said court sold and conveyed 500 acres of said 2,000 acres to William Campbell, who also afterwards, on the 10th day of October, 1864, conveyed the same to David Kerr and others. On the 2d day of December, 1871, the said 1,430 acres were sold in the name of David Kerr and others for the nonpayment of the taxes of 1870; A. I. Rogers being the purchaser. On the 20th day of November, 1873, G. W. Amos, clerk of the county court of said county, conveyed the 1,430 acres to said A. I. Rogers under the said purchase. The defendants claim under a grant from the commonwealth of Virginia dated the 2d day of April, 1860, for 970 acres, based upon a survey made on the 29th day of June, 1858, made by virtue of land office treasury warrant No. 24,983. A verdict was rendered for the defendants. The plaintiffs moved to set aside the verdict and grant them a new trial on various grounds mentioned, which motion, being considered, was overruled, and judgment entered thereon for defendants, to which judgment plaintiffs obtained a writ of error and superseas.

Some 20 assignments of error are set out in the petition, but it seems unnecessary to discuss them in this case. Plaintiffs rely upon their tax deed of May 26, 1879, from Amos, clerk of county court of Ritchie county, for their title to the 970 acres, and on the deed of May 6, 1879, from the same clerk, for the 439 acres; the former a part of the 1,430 acres sold for the taxes delinquent for the year 1871, sold June 8, 1874. The evidence shows that the tract of 1,430 acres was not on the assessor's books for any of the years 1873 to 1880, both inclusive, in the name of David Kerr and his co-owners, or of any one or more of them, so that the same was forfeited to the state for nonentry on the land books, being omitted therefrom more than 5 years. Besides this, the said 1,430 acres was sold by the sheriff of Ritchie county on the 2d day of December, 1871, to A. I. Rogers for the delinquent taxes in the name of David Kerr and others for the year 1870, and conveyed to the purchaser by said clerk, Amos, by deed dated November 20, 1873. So we have as to the 1,430 acres two outstanding titles: First, the title of Rogers; and, second, the forfeiture to the state. As to the 500-acre tract, out of which the plaintiffs claim the 439 acres under said tax deed of May 6, 1879, the record shows that the same was omitted from the assessor's books for the years 1875 to 1880, both inclusive. Plaintiffs' deeds for the 900 acres and the 500 acres, dating in May, 1879, were after the forfeiture of both of said tracts. Davis v. Living, 50 W. Va. 431, 40 S. E. 365, seems to be conclusive of this case. Syllabus point 1 in said case holds that: "If the defendant in an ejectment suit shows that the land in controversy has been omitted from the land books of the proper county for five successive years before the trial, he makes a prima facie case of forfeiture and defeats the plaintiff's right to recover, unless plaintiff can show that the land was assessed improperly in another county and the illegal taxes thereon paid, or that the land has been redeemed, regranted, or resold, so as to reinvest the title in him." It is further held in said case (Syl., point 2): "If, on the undisputed facts, the case is plainly for the defendants, all errors committed by the court on the trial are harmless errors so far as the plaintiff is concerned." The forfeiture to the state of the title of the 1,430 acres and the 500 acres being complete before the plaintiffs took the deeds for the 900 acres and the 439 acres, they took no title.

There is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it must be affirmed.

CLARK v. EMERY et al.

1. PARTNERSHIP—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

Where one who has acquired options upon certain lands enters into a written contract with another, empowering him, in the absence of the optionee, to accept the options and make sale of the lands, and providing that all profits shall be distributed equally between them, this is not a contract creating a partnership for the purchase and sale of lands, and does not entitle the person so empowered to make such sale to share in the profits arising therefrom, unless such sale be made by him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, §§ 13-16, 20.]

2. SAME—TEST—INTEREST IN PROFITS.

As to whether or not a partnership exists depends upon the true contract and intention of the parties, as ascertained from all the facts of the case; and the true test as to whether the partnership does exist is, did the supposed partner acquire by his bargain any property in, or control over, or specific lien to, the profits while they remained undivided, in preference to other creditors? If he did, he is a partner; and if otherwise, not.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Action by Joseph E. Clark against Jonas W. Emery and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank P. Corbin and H. L. Robinson, for appellant. John C. Bane, R. W. Irwin, and Frazer & Frazer, for appellees.

SANDERS, J. The plaintiff filed his bill in the circuit court of Monongalia county, claiming to be an equal partner with the defendant Emery in the profits arising from the sale of certain coal properties made by the defendant Emery to defendants Cochran.

Emery answered, denying that Clark is interested as a partner, or otherwise, in said lands, or the profits arising therefrom. Upon the hearing the circuit court entered a decree dismissing the plaintiff's bill, and it is from this decree that he has appealed.

The plaintiff predicates his suit upon a verbal contract which he claims was made between him and Emery, and says that afterwards, on the 8th day of May, 1901, for the purpose of more perfectly defining their respective interests in whatever profits might arise from a sale of the properties, and in order to confer full power on the plaintiff to sell and dispose of the same in the absence of Emery, they entered into the following written agreement:

"This agreement entered into this 8th day of May, 1901, by and between J. W. Emery and J. E. Clark, both of Washington Co., Pa., witnesseth: That both the parties hereto being equally interested in a certain option or contract made between said J. W. Emery and W. B. Hess and P. S. Johnson of Monongalia Co., W. Va., said contract covering the right of sale of from 2,300 to 2,500 acres of coal lands in said Co., W. Va., and dated May 6th, 1901. Now it is understood and agreed that in case of the absence of J. W. Emery from any cause that the said J. E. Clark is hereby fully empowered to accept said coal under the terms of contract with Hess and Johnson and conduct the sale of the property with full and absolute rights in the premises as though the contract were made in said Clark's name. All profits to be distributed equally between said Clark and Emery.

"Witnesseth our hands and seals the day and year above written.

"J. E. Clark. [Seal.]

"J. W. Emery. [Seal.]

"Attest: Geo. L. West."

The defendant Emery claims that no such verbal contract was made, but that, if found to have been made, it was a contract for the sale of real estate, and, to be binding, must be in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby, and that the contract dated the 8th day of May, 1901, is not such a contract or memorandum as can be enforced, and does not operate to take the verbal contract without the statute of frauds. And, also, Emery claims that said writing of May 8th is not a contract creating a partnership between him and Clark, but that it was only executed for the purpose of giving Clark, in his absence, the power to accept certain options, and to sell and dispose of the property acquired thereunder, and that, if he should make sale thereof, he was to have one-half of the profits realized therefrom. We do not feel called upon to determine whether or not the written contract of May 8th is a contract for the sale of real estate, and whether or not it violates the statute of frauds, because the plaintiff, in our opinion, upon a proper construction of the very terms of the contract, is not shown to be a partner with Emery, nor entitled to any part of the profits arising from a sale of said property, unless the sale was made by him.

It would seem, from the construction of the contract alone, that it was only intended to give to Clark the power to accept the options in the absence of Emery, and make sale of the lands. The fact that it is recited that they are equally interested in the property does not make this true, unless, as a matter of fact, they are so interested, and, if so, under the claim of Clark himself, it must be upon the verbal contract which he claims he had with Emery. The concluding part of the contract, wherein it says "all profits to be distributed equally between said Clark and Emery," is not inconsistent with the claim of Emery that, in case Clark should make the sale, he was to have one-half of the profits realized therefrom, but it is entirely in accord with Emery's contention that this writing was only given to empower Clark, in the absence of Emery, to accept the options and make sale. It cannot be correctly said that it created a contract of partnership between the parties, to continue an indefinite period, and to entitle Clark to share in the profits, without consideration or responsibility. There is nothing agreed upon and fixed by its terms, except that Clark, in the absence of Emery, is given power to accept the options and make sale of the property, and, upon his doing so, the profits were to be divided equally between them. This does not fix and define a partnership relation between the parties, but only provides for the doing of certain things by Clark in the absence of Emery, and in the event of the accomplishment of these things he to have one-half of the profits. That part of the contract which says they are "equally interested in a certain option or contract" is mere recital, and forms no part of the agreement. The only agreement expressed is that, in the absence of Emery from any cause, Clark shall have full power to accept the coal under the terms of the contract with Hess and Johnson, and conduct the sale of the property with full and absolute rights in the premises as though the contract were made in Clark's name, and all profits to be divided equally between Clark and Emery. It seems that this contract is complete within itself, and that it is not necessary or proper to admit evidence to vary, add to, or explain its terms. It is perfectly well settled that, when there is no ambiguity in a written contract, parol evidence will not be received to vary, contradict, add to or explain its terms, by proving that the agreement of the parties was different from what it appears by the writing to have been. Campbell v. Fetterman's Heirs, 20 W. Va. 398; Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. 611; Howell v. Behler, 41 W. Va. 610, 24 S. E. 646. "A writing is presumed to contain the whole of the contract, and will be protected from any invasion of extrinsic stipulations, if, upon inspection and study of the writing itself, read, it may be, in the light of surrounding circumstances, in order to its proper understanding and interpretation, it appears to contain the engagement of the parties, and to define the object and measure the extent of such engagements, and to have been designed by the parties to be the repository and evidence of their final intentions." 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1090.

But, if the written contract does not purport to disclose a complete contract, or, if in reading it in the light of the situation of the parties and the facts and circumstances, it appears not to contain all the stipulations of the parties on the subject, then the above rule does not apply, but, under these circumstances, parol evidence is admissible to show what the rest of the agreement was. But that part of the contract which is sought to be proven must not be repugnant to or inconsistent with the written contract; for, where a contract rests partly in writing and partly in parol, the written part must not be contradicted. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1091-1093; Heatherly v. Bancy, 81 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. 754; Mathews v. Jarrett, 20 W. Va. 415; Caperton's Adm'r's v. Caperton's Heirs, 86 W. Va. 479, 15 S. E. 257; Scrags v. Hill, 37 W. Va. 706, 17 S. E. 185.

The plaintiff claims that the contract of May 8th is not a complete contract between the parties, but that it contained a part of their agreement, and that the defendant's explanation of it is clearly inconsistent therewith and repugnant thereto. Admit that this contract only partially contains the stipulations and agreements of the parties, and that it may be added to or explained by parol, still we fail to see from the facts adduced anything inconsistent with the claim of the defendant Emery. And, as we have observed, the written contract does not create a partnership between Emery and Clark, and from a careful scrutiny of the other evidence we fail to find anything which would justify us in finding that there existed a partnership between the parties, but it was only intended that Clark should share in the profits in case he should sell the property. In 1900 the defendant Emery learned of this field of coal, and that Parker S. Johnson and W. B. Hess had options on it, and thereupon he went to Morgantown to see Johnson in reference to it, and then learned, through Johnson, that Johnson and Hess had transferred their options to John C. Neff. Later, and in the month of December following, he saw the plaintiff, Clark, and had a talk with him about these lands. In this conversation Clark spoke of his connection with the Wayne Iron & Steel Company and the Clyde Coal Company, and said that, if he had an option on this coal, he thought he could sell it to these companies. The matter then rested in abeyance until in April, 1901, except that Clark in the meantime made an effort to secure an option from Neff, but failed to do so. On the 26th of April, 1901, Emery secured an option from Neff, and on the following day procured one from Johnson, beginning at the expiration of Neff's option, which was on the 2d day of May. After Emery had secured these options he immediately informed Clark of the fact, and called his attention to the conversation which he had had with him in relation to a sale of the property to the Wayne Iron & Steel Company and the Clyde Coal Company, and then agreed with Clark that, in the event he made the sale of the property, he would divide the profits arising therefrom. Clark proceeded to try to interest these companies in the sale of these lands, taking the matter up with Sanford, the superintendent of the coal company. The property was examined by the superintendent, and on the 8th day of May, 1901, the date of the written contract, Clark, Emery, and Sanford met at Brownsville, at which time the sum which Sanford should receive and the price at which the property was to be offered to the companies were agreed upon, and it was at this meeting that the contract between Clark and Emery was prepared and signed. Up to this time there had been no definite contract between them.

A sale to the companies was not consummated, but Clark, still interesting himself in making a sale, proposed to Emery that probably a sale could be negotiated through Liggett, of Pittsburg, and Emery agreed that, in the event he made a sale of the property through Liggett, he could share equally in the profits; and shortly afterwards a writing was entered into between Clark and Emery and Liggett, by which Liggett was empowered to sell for a certain price, and providing that all over and above that price he could have as his compensation for making the sale. This effort was also fruitless, and nothing further was done in the matter for nearly a year, when Emery made a sale of the property to the defendants Cochran, and since this sale the plaintiff asserts that he is entitled to one-half of the profits. He was not interested in making this sale to Cochran, took no part in it, and did nothing in regard to it. And not only is this so, but, the time limit for the Johnson and Hess options being about to expire, it became necessary that they should be accepted. They were accepted by Emery, and all contracts taken in his name individually; he thereby becoming responsible for the entire purchase money. No liability attached to Clark. No sum was paid by him, and in no way did he become responsible for a dollar in the negotiation of these options. And, not being liable, not taking any part in making this sale, it resting in abeyance for nearly a year after the effort to sell through Liggett was made, it does not seem reasonable that a contract such as is contended for by him existed. Considerable stress is laid upon the fact that in the contract between Clark and Emery and Liggett it is recited that Clark and Emery are parties of the first part, and that they own or control certain coal lands. It is undertaken to conclude from this that there is an admission of partnership upon the part of Emery; but, in view of all the circumstances connected with and surrounding this transaction, this recital is not inconsistent with the theory of Emery, because, as claimed by him, if Clark had made the sale to the companies referred to, or through Liggett, he would have been equally interested in the profits arising from the sale; and, this being the fact, it cannot be held that there is any inconsistency in the contract as claimed by Emery and the written contract with Liggett.

The testimony of John C. Neff, to the effect that Emery came to him and asked for an option on the lands in question, and that he refused to give it to him, informing him that he had told Clark that he would wait until the latter found out whether or not he had a buyer, whereupon Emery told him that he and Clark were partners, and that whatever he did would be satisfactory with Clark, is relied upon to establish the fact of the partnership between Clark and Emery. But it will be observed that the witness says Clark thought he had a buyer for the coal, and that buyer was either the company or the manager of the company for which Clark was working. Admitting that Emery told Neff that he and Clark were partners, which Emery denies, still Emery does not deny that as to the sale to the company, which Clark claimed he could make, they were to share equally in the profits. And at the time he had this conversation with Clark he fully believed that Clark would share in the profits, because Clark had led him to strongly believe that he could make sale to one of the companies. If Clark was a partner with Emery, why were the contracts and options all taken in Emery's name? Why did Emery advance all the money, and become individually liable to the landowners? These facts are certainly not consistent with the plaintiff's claim, but speak most strongly against him.

The only proper deduction from the facts is that Clark was empowered to make sale, and, if he did so, he was to receive for his services one-half of the profits. "To constitute a partnership between parties who share in the profits, the interest in the profits must be mutual—each person must have a specific interest in them as a principal trader. He is not a partner merely because he receives a part of the profits as compensation for his services." Sodiker v. Applegate, 24 W. Va. 411, 49 Am. Rep. 252. And in this case, delivering the opinion of the court, Judge Snyder says: "If persons merely occupy the relation of principal and agent, employer or employé, or factor, no partnership can be predicated upon the fact that such agent, employé, or factor receives a part or share of the profits for his services or other benefits conferred. * * * In every partnership there is a community of interest, but every community of interest does not create a partnership. There must be a joint ownership of the partnership funds, or a joint right of control over them, and also an agreement to share the profits or losses arising therefrom." Chapline v. Conant, 3 W. Va. 507, 100 Am. Dec. 766. There is nothing to show any liability upon Clark for losses and expenses, which is deemed an important fact tending to show that the contract is not one of partnership.

It is claimed that such transactions as we have here under consideration have been passed upon at different times by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and uniformly held to be the operations of a partnership, and the cases of Howell v. Kelly, 149 Pa. 473, 24 Atl. 224, and Frazer et al. v. Linton, 183 Pa. 186, 38 Atl. 589, are cited. In the first of these cases the court decided that profits realized in a single transaction, procuring options on coal lands, and reselling them at a profit under a parol agreement, can be recovered in an action by one partner against the other, and that the statute of frauds has no application, and in the other case it was held that when a bill in equity is filed by one partner against the other for an account, where the evidence establishes the existence of the partnership, but no definite arrangement as to the division of the profits, the presumption of law is that the profits were to be equally divided. While it is unnecessary for us to either affirm or repudiate the doctrine enunciated in these decisions, yet the doctrine therein pronounced seems to be sound. But, whether so or not, it has no application here, because there it was found from the evidence that a partnership existed, and here the reverse is found. Of course, if we should find the existence of a partnership, then the doctrine of these cases might be applied.

We see no error in the decree of the circuit court, and it is affirmed.

ADKINS v. HUFF et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 30, 1906.)

DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION—RESERVATION.

Under a clause in a deed, reserving to the grantor therein standing timber on the land thereby conveyed, using the following terms: "Said first party, J. M. A., reserves and still owns all timber," etc., and requiring the same to be removed from the land within a specified time, the grantor does not hold absolute and unconditional title to the timber so reserved, and such of it as remains unsevered at the expiration of the time limited is the property of the owner of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 462–465.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wayne County.
Bill by Milton J. Adkins against David W. Huff and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant Huff appeals. Reversed.

Taylor & Welch, for appellant.

POFFENBARGER, J. David W. Huff complains of a decree of the circuit court of Wayne county overruling in part his motion to dissolve an injunction awarded against him on the bill of Milton J. Adkins, and perpetuating the same in so far as it was not dissolved. The injunction, as perpetuated, inhibits the said David W. Huff and his codefendant, David E. Huff, from preventing, obstructing, or hindering said Adkins and his employes from cutting and removing certain timber on a tract of land, containing 43 acres, owned by the said David W. Huff. The claim of Adkins to the timber is based upon a reservation in a deed by which he conveyed the land to said Huff. The language of the clause reserving the timber is as follows: "Said first party, M. J. Adkins, reserves and still owns all timber down to a railroad tie size excepting poplar 42 inches and less in circumference 2 feet above the ground which the said David W. Huff is to have for building timber. * * * And the said M. J. Adkins is to have 34 months from this date to remove said reserve timber off of said land and to have all rights to cut, haul, and saw and remove said timber and tan bark, and to set sawmill in the calf pasture field, and to remove same as if it was his own land."

The circumstances and transactions which led up to this litigation were as follows: The deed was executed by Adkins November 16, 1900. The consideration was $400, of which $100 was paid at the date of the deed, and for the residue three $100 notes were executed by the grantee, payable, respectively, in 10, 22, and 34 months after the date thereof, and payment thereof was secured by a vendor's lien. The first and second of these notes were paid as they became due. About three months before the last one became due David E. Huff, father of the grantee, who had aided his son in negotiating for the land, proposed to Adkins that, with the consent of said David W. Huff, he execute a new deed to him, David E. Huff. Very soon afterwards this was done, and the old deed delivered back to Adkins. As to the purpose of this transaction, the parties differ in their pleadings and evidence. Adkins contends that the purpose was to vest the title absolutely in David E. Huff; he having represented himself as having paid all the purchase money that had been paid, and his son as desiring to abandon the purchase. The two Huffs say the intention was merely to give the father security upon the land for $230 which he had loaned his son to aid in paying for it. David W. Huff admits that he consented to the execution of the deed for that purpose, and both he and his father say the understanding was that it should be an exact copy of the first deed, except that the name of the grantee should be changed and the reservation of the vendor's lien omitted. The new deed departed, however, from these specifications by altering the date at which the right of Adkins to cut and remove timber should expire. By the first deed such right would have expired September 16, 1903. This one specified April 1, 1904, as the time limit. In lieu of the vendor's lien, Adkins took the note of David E. Huff for the last payment with personal security, and he says this change in the security was the consideration for the extension of time. In December, 1903, Adkins brought this suit to enjoin David E. Huff and David W. Huff from interfering with his alleged right to cut and remove timber from the land, and from hauling away and otherwise molesting the railroad ties which he had made on the land, after September 16, 1903, and the said David W. Huff from prosecuting a civil action against him in a justice's court for the recovery of damages resulting from alleged wrongful taking of timber. A preliminary injunction was awarded in conformity with the prayer of the bill, but the court, on the hearing, sustained the motion to dissolve so much of the injunction as restrained the prosecution of said civil action, and, being of the opinion that under the clause in said first deed, reserving to Adkins title to the timber, said Adkins had the absolute title to the timber, and not a defeasible title or a mere license to cut and remove the same, perpetuated so much of the injunction as restrained the defendants from molesting him in the exercise of his right to cut and remove it.

The return to Adkins of the deed made by him to David W. Huff, and the execution of another deed to David E. Huff, containing a clause extending the time for the removal of the timber, did not, in any way, affect the rights of the parties as fixed and determined by said first deed. The title still remained in David W. Huff. When land has been conveyed by a deed, it cannot be reconveyed from the grantee to the grantor by a return of the deed or cancellation thereof. It must be reconveyed by another deed. Jones v. Neale, 2 Pat. & H. 339; Grayson v. Richards, 10 Leigh, 57; Seibel v. Rapp, 85 Va. 32, 6 S. E. 478; Vaughn v. Moore, 89 Va. 925, 17 S. E. 326. At the date of the deed executed to David E. Huff, therefore, Adkins had no title in himself to convey or reserve. Hence, the time limit fixed by the deed to David W. Huff remained unchanged. If, by the reservation in the deed to David W. Huff, absolute and unconditional title to the timber remained in the appellant, it may be that a court of equity had jurisdiction by injunction to prevent obstruction to his right to enter upon the land, sever the timber, and carry it away. It would have been an interest in the land, and the owner thereof would have had, by implication, a right of access to it, the only adequate remedy for deprivation of which might have been in equity. This is merely suggested, not decided. But if, by his deed, he retained only a lease for the period of 34 months, with the right to cut and remove timber within that time, or a conditional title to the timber, a title dependent upon the severance thereof within the period of time limited, or a present title, defeasible by the expiration of the period of time limited without a severance of the timber having been effected, no right of his has been invaded, impaired, or interfered with.

The authorities are practically uniform in holding that an instrument granting standing timber, and containing a clause requiring or permitting it to be removed within a specified time from the date of the grant, gives no absolute and unconditional title to the property. Some courts hold the right of the grantee to be a license, others a lease, and others a defeasible title to the timber. By the great weight of authority it is determined that no right or title exists in the grantee after the expiration of the time specified in the deed or contract. Strong v. Eddy, 40 Vt. 547; Judevine v. Goodrich, 35 Vt. 19; Utley v. Lumber Co., 59 Mich. 263, 28 N. W. 488; Wasey v. Mahoney, 55 Mich. 194, 20 N. W. 901; Haskell v. Ayres, 35 Mich. 89; Haskell v. Ayres, 32 Mich. 93; Kelam v. McKinstry, 69 N. Y. 264; King v. Merriman, 38 Minn. 47, 35 N. W. 570; Fletcher v. Livingston, 153 Mass. 388, 28 N. E. 1001; Reed v. Merrifield, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 155; Golden v. Glock, 57 Wis. 118, 15 N. W. 12, 46 Am. Rep. 32; Larson v. Cook, 85 Wis. 564, 55 N. W. 703; Clark v. Guest, 54 Ohio St. 298, 43 N. E. 862; Pease v. Gibson, 6 Greenl. 81; Webber v. Proctor, 89 Me. 404, 36 Atl. 631; Howard v. Lincoln, 13 Me. 122. No distinction seems to be made in this respect between rights conferred by deed and those conferred by contracts which have not the form, nor all the requisites, of a deed. The grants in the following cases were all by deed: Reed v. Merrifield, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 155; Golden v. Glock, 57 Wis. 118, 15 N. W. 12, 46 Am. Rep. 32; Pease v. Gibson, 6 Greenl. 81; Webber v. Proctor, 89 Me. 404, 36 Atl. 631. In all the other cases above cited the instruments were contracts, some wholly executory, and others passing an equitable title; the purchase money having been fully paid.

No reason is perceived why there should be any difference between a grant of the timber on a tract of land and a reservation thereof in a deed conveying away the land. Reservations are sometimes held to have the force and effect of exceptions. Harris v. Cobb, 49 W. Va. 350, 38 S. E. 559. When they do, they can be of no higher dignity than a grant. A thing excepted remains in the grantor by retention. The title, therefore, cannot be more effectually in him by an exception than by a grant thereof to him. Therefore, if this reservation could be treated as an exception of the timber from the grant of the land, it would stand on the same footing as if the land, without any exception or reservation, had been granted and a deed executed by the grantee conveying the timber back. When such grants are made with a clause requiring or permitting the removal of the timber within a specified time, the grantee takes, at most, a present defeasible title. Mee v. Benedict, 98 Mich. 260, 57 N. W. 175, 22 L. R. A. 641, 39 Am. St. Rep. 543. See, also, the authorities above cited. The only case found which conflicts with this view is Halstead v. Jessup, 150 Ind. 85, 49 N. E. 821, in which the rights of the parties were governed by a contract, and in which the court held that the purchaser, in the absence of a forfeiture clause in the contract, might remove the timber sold after the expiration of the time fixed for its removal. The distinction which the court attempted to make between this case and the numerous others, some of which are above referred to, is not at all clear. A case very similar to the one now under consideration is that of Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 3. A deed was executed conveying a tract of land. At the same time the grantee executed and delivered to the grantor a writing which recited his purchase of the land, and then said: "This is to certify that all the sawing pine and whitewood timber that is now upon the above-described tracts of land belongs to the said Robert M. Moore, who is sole owner thereof; and that said Robert M. Moore has by agreement thirty months from this date to remove the same." It was held that the contract and deed should be read and construed together as parts of a single transaction, and that, being so read, the vendor had title to so much of the timber as he should remove within 30 months, the time specified. In reaching a conclusion the court said: "The adoption of these separate provisions respecting ownership and the right of entry, together with the particular circumstances, most clearly denotes that it was in the minds of the parties that Moore should hold an interest, as well as a right of entry. The written understanding that he should 'own' the timber was as much a part of the principal transaction as the grant of the land, and it found its consideration in that transaction, and it ought to be allowed to operate as was intended, unless prevented by some rule of law, and I am aware of no such rule. Whether the technical effect of the arrangement was to preserve to Moore the conditional right or to transfer it to him is, in my judgment, a thing of no practical importance. That it was one or the other is unquestionable, and my brethren are inclined to regard it as substantially a transfer or release. Goodtitle ex dem. Edwards v. Bailey, Cowp. 597; Wickham v. Hawker, 7 M. & W. 63; Rowbotham v. Wilson, 8 H. of L. Cases, 348. It served to secure to Moore, as against Bradley and all others having notice, the existing ownership of such of the timber as he should take off in 30 months." A deed which grants or reserves standing timber on land without any limitation of time for the removal thereof is deemed a grant or reservation of an interest in the land, absolute and unconditional. Magnetic Ore Co. v. Markbury Lumber Co., 104 Ala. 465, 16 South. 632, 27 L. R. A. 434, 58 Am. St. Rep. 73; Walt v. Baldwin, 60 Mich. 622, 27 N. W. 697, 1 Am. St. Rep. 551. When timber is conveyed by deed with a covenant of warranty and an habendum clause, it conveys an interest in the land, although there be a time limit, but it vests either a defeasible title to the timber or a leasehold estate in the land for the time limited, with a right of appropriation to be exercised during the term. White v. Foster, 102 Mass. 375.

The deed now under consideration grants a tract of land. But for a subsequent clause, this would carry the timber. Said subsequent clause reserves the timber with certain exceptions, and fixes a limit of time within which it shall be removed. In determining what right the grantor thereby secured to himself, all parts of the deed must be considered. The grant is not to be cut down by the subsequent reservation to any extent beyond that indicated by the intention of the parties as gathered from the whole instrument. A reservation is not necessarily an exception. Primarily it is a new interest created out of the thing granted. Adkins may have still owned the timber, under the language of the clause referred to, but, if so, his title, as tested by the principles above stated, was a defeasible one, wherefore it failed, by reason of the nonperformance of the condition upon which it was held. The reservation in the deed vested in him a present title to the timber, but his failure to remove it operated to divest it out of him and vest it in the grantee of the land. If this be not the true interpretation of the deed, then the principles announced in Null v. Elliott, 52 W. Va. 229, 43 S. E. 173, apply, and no title vested in Adkins as to the timber remaining uncut at the expiration of the time specified for removal. Having no right to the standing timber, the appellee was not entitled to the protection of an injunction in attempting to cut and remove it. As to the timber already severed, he had a remedy at law for the recovery of the possession of it, if it belonged to him.

For the reasons above stated, it is plain that the circuit court erred in entering the decree complained of, as well as in refusing to dissolve the injunction. Therefore the decree entered in this cause on the 1st day of June, 1904, will be wholly reversed and set aside, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed, with cost to the appellant in the circuit court, as well as his costs in this court.

MANN et al. v. MERCER COUNTY COURT et al.

1. COUNTIES—COUNTY COURTS — CALLING ELECTION—NATURE OF DUTIES.

The duties imposed upon county courts by section 15 of chapter 39 of the Code of 1899, as amended by chapter 95, p. 206, of the Acts of 1901, are ministerial.

2. SAME—TIME FOR PROCEEDING — ADJOURNMENT.

Such courts cannot prevent action upon a petition filed under said statute at the term at which it is filed by adjourning the term.

3. SAME—BASIS OF ACTION.

Such courts must base their action on the record made in the proceeding, and not upon personal knowledge of their own members not in any way made part of such record.

4. SAME.

Knowledge and belief of the members of such court, to the effect that the petition so filed is not signed by the requisite number of legal voters, constitutes no defense upon an application for a mandamus to compel action thereon, when the petition bears the requisite number of signatures and is verified as the statute provides, and no other evidence bearing on the question appears in the record of the proceeding as it remains in said court.

5. EQUITY—JURISDICTION — SUPERVISION OF GOVERNMENTAL ACTS.

In the absence of a statute conferring it, courts of equity have no power to control, by injunction or otherwise, public officers and tribunals in the exercise of purely legislative or governmental functions.

6. SAME—FRAUD.

Fraud, perpetrated by private persons in the procurement of the exercise of a legislative or governmental power, of itself affords no ground of equity jurisdiction, unless it is expressly given by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, §§ 21-23.]

7. COURTS—ADJOURNMENTS.

Section 2 of chapter 114 of the Code of 1899, authorizing circuit and county courts to adjourn from day to day until their business is dispatched or until the ends of their terms, does not limit or restrict the common-law powers of such courts to adjourn to a distant day, or, as it is sometimes expressed, from time to time, provided the day fixed be not beyond the time to which the term could legally continue.

8. SAME.

Section 10 of chapter 114 of the Code of 1899 does not limit the period of time over which a circuit or county court may adjourn. Its purpose is to prevent the loss of a term by reason of the failure of any court to sit on any day appointed by law, or by its own adjourning order, for that purpose.

9. MANDAMUS — COMPELLING OFFICIAL ACTION.

A court or other tribunal, charged with the performance of a mandatory duty at a given term or session, which adjourns without having performed such duty, may be reconvened and compelled to perform such duty by mandamus; and the act, when so done, will be deemed to have been performed at the term or session at which the law required it to be done.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Mandamus, § 62.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Mandamus, on petition of Edwin Mann and others, against the county court of Mercer county, and others. Writ awarded.

Brown, Jackson & Knight and Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for petitioners. C. W. Smith, J. H. Holt, and J. W. Kennedy, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the 31st day of October, 1905, this court, upon the petition of Edwin Mann and 1,939 other citizens and legal voters of Mercer county, awarded a mandamus nisi, directed to the county court of said county and the commissioners thereof, commanding said commissioners to reconvene as such county court, and make and enter an order calling a special election for the determination of the question whether the county seat of said county shall be removed from the town of Princeton therein to the city of Bluefield in said county, and be relocated at said city, in accordance with the prayer of the petition of said Mann and others which had theretofore been presented to said county court. Said petitioners, on the 30th day of September, 1905, presented to the county court their said petition, for the calling of said election, properly verified by affidavit, and accompanied by a bond of $5,000, as required by the statute, and the court permitted the petition and bond to be filed, and made and entered an order directing said election to be held on the 12th day of December, 1905, and then adjourned until the following Tuesday, the 3d day of October, 1905. Upon reconvening on that day it set aside said order upon the motion of James Scott and others, and thereupon the petitioners again presented the petition and bond to the court, and asked that they be filed and an order made providing for the holding of such election, but the court refused so to do. The action of the court in setting aside said order and refusing to re-enter the same was based upon the theory that at the time of its entry, as well as at the time of the application for a re-entry thereof, the court was not legally in session. It had convened in regular session on Wednesday following the second Tuesday in September, 1905, and adjourned from day to day and from time to time until said 30th day of September. Some of these adjournments were for longer periods than three days. One of them was from the 21st day of September until the 26th. On said last-named day an adjournment was taken until the 30th day of September.

The principal defenses set up in the return to the writ were the following: First. The petition presented to the county court did not contain the signatures of a sufficient number of legal voters. Second. An injunction had been awarded by the circuit court of said county inhibiting and restraining the said petitioners from moving for, and said county court and the commissioners thereof from ordering, an election upon the petition of said Mann and others until the further order of the said circuit court. Third. At the time of the presentation of said petition to the county court of said county the regular term thereof at which said petition could have been filed had ceased and ended by operation of law, by reason of the adjournments which had occurred. Fourth. If said term had not so ended, there had been a final adjournment thereof on the 3d day of October, 1905, wherefore it could not be reconvened for the transaction of business which it was its duty to perform at that term.

The proceeding for obtaining the calling of an election for the relocation of a county seat is special and statutory, and the duty of the county court as to it purely ministerial. Doolittle v. County Court, 28 W. Va. 158. Section 15 of chapter 39 of the Code, as amended by chapter 95, p. 206, of the Acts of 1901, prescribes minutely the duty of the county court respecting the same. The petition shall be signed by two-fifths of all the legal voters of the county, to be estimated by allowing one vote for every six persons in the county, as shown by the last preceding census, and an affidavit shall be appended thereto that the petitioners are, as affiant verily believes, legal voters of said county. At the same term at which such petition is filed the court shall make an order that the vote be taken at the next general election to be held in said county upon the question of such relocation at the place named in the petition, if a general election is to be held in that year, and, if none is to be so held, the court shall, at the same session at which the petition is filed, fix a day for, and order the holding of, a special election upon the question of such relocation. A petition containing the requisite number of names, and so verified by affidavit, makes a prima facie case, and if it is not in any way contested, nor the prima facie case thus made overthrown, the court must act upon it as it is. The affidavit is the only proof required, and the court cannot ignore the petition and refuse to act merely because members of it are of opinion that some of the persons whose names appear therein are not legal voters. That the requisite number of names was subscribed to the petition is not denied. The only fact controverted by the answer is that a sufficient number of the petitioners are legal voters. That was a matter to be determined by the county court according to the record as it was in that court at the time it was called upon to act, and, as the record then stood, it was bound to find and determine that the petition was sufficient, because there was no evidence that any person whose name appeared in the petition was not a legal voter. In order to sustain the position taken in this court, it would be necessary for the record, as it remains in the county court, to show that enough of the names subscribed to the petition to reduce the entire number below the requisite two-fifths were names of persons who were not legal voters. There should be at least some evidence tending to rebut the prima facie case made by the petition. Acting upon mere personal knowledge or belief of its own members, not in any way put into the record of the proceeding so as to permit the correctness thereof to be inquired into, the court could not refuse to order the election. The return fails, not only to show anything in the record indicating insufficiency of the petition, in the respect above mentioned, but also that anybody proposes to test its sufficiency by any attack upon it. What the action of this court might be, if it appeared that upon the reconvening of the county court counter affidavits and other evidence would be adduced showing such defect in the petition, we are not called upon to say. No such showing is made.

The function performed by a county court in ordering an election under the statute hereinbefore referred to is legislative or governmental in its nature. It neither concerns nor affects any private right in the legal sense of the terms. Injunction is not a remedy which may be invoked by the citizen for the purpose of controlling public officers or tribunals in the exercise of their functions and powers. In order to sustain it the plaintiff must show that he has a special interest, in respect to which he will suffer a special injury of a private nature. It is not enough that the community in which he resides will be injuriously affected by some governmental or legislative action. Injunction is not within his reach until in some way his private, personal or property rights are invaded. "Courts of equity have no jurisdiction, independent of statute, to enjoin at the suit of citizens the proceedings of county officers because of the illegality of the act creating such county, when no question of private right is involved." High on Inj. (4th Ed.) § 1249. "A court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere in disputes concerning municipal elections, and when a court has assumed jurisdiction in such a case, and has enjoined a board of municipal officers, such as the common council of a city, from canvassing the returns of a municipal election, which is made their duty by law, such injunction will be regarded as absolutely void for want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter." Id. § 1250. "Equity will not interfere to prevent the enforcement of a city ordinance simply on the ground of its illegality, nor will it assume jurisdiction to question the lawful election of officers, or the validity of the ordinance per se, for the purpose of protecting citizens from an uncertain and remote injury." Id. § 1243. These general principles have been asserted by this court in Morgan v. County Court, 53 W. Va. 372, 44 S. E. 182. See, also, Spelling on Inj. § 630; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 817; Fleming v. Guthrie, 32 W. Va. 1, 9 S. E. 23, 3 L. R. A. 53, 25 Am. St. Rep. 792. Courts cannot interfere by appeal, injunction, or otherwise with the exercise of governmental powers and functions, when the statute does not expressly authorize such interference. County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. 747; County Court v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. 488.

The Legislature, in prescribing the mode of calling and holding elections for the relocation of county seats, has failed to provide any mode of reviewing or controlling the officers or tribunals charged with duties in respect thereto. If courts of equity should interfere on the ground of a want of remedy, the very object which the Legislature sought to avoid might thereby be accomplished, namely, the filling of the courts with controversies of a political nature, a matter entirely foreign to the ordinary jurisdiction of equity. No doubt the citizen has the right to appear before the county court and remonstrate and point out insufficiencies and defects in the petition, and contest the truth of its allegations, but it does not follow that he may appeal from the action of the court, or have a power of control over it by means of an injunction from a court of equity. The Legislature has seen fit to vest in the county courts power to call such elections, without providing any special mode of review of their action. Who shall say the Legislature could not do this? What authority or reason in law is there for saying it may not give county courts power to order such elections, whenever, in the opinion of the court, it shall seem expedient to do so? Undoubtedly it could do so. Having full and unrestricted power over the subject, it could have made the affidavit appended to the petition conclusive evidence of the truth of the facts stated in it. So also, relying upon the ability and integrity of the county courts of the state, it could make their action upon the petition final, and was not bound to provide any mode of review or control. Whether it has done so we do not determine further than to say there is no special provision of that kind, and courts of equity have no such power under general law. Fraud is a ground of equity jurisdiction, but only when it works injury of a private nature. Why should there be any elaborate system of laws for the mere calling of an election? It only gives the people a chance to vote on the question. Of itself it effects nothing. Our statute safeguards the taxpayers by making the petitioners pay the expenses of the election. In view of the principles above stated and the nature of the act in question, we think the circuit court had no jurisdiction, and that its injunction is void.

The contention that the court was not in session at the times at which the petition was presented is founded upon sections 2 and 10 of chapter 114 of the Code of 1899. Said section 2 reads as follows: "The Supreme Court of Appeals and circuit and county courts may at any time adjourn from day to day until the business is dispatched, or until the end of its term." Said section 10 provides that, "although a court be not held on the first day of a term, it may nevertheless be opened on any subsequent day: Provided, in the case of a circuit or county court, the same shall be done before four o'clock in the afternoon of the third day. If, after a court is opened, it fail to sit on any day, it may nevertheless sit on any subsequent day of the term: Provided, in the case of a circuit or county court there be not more than three consecutive days of such failure." That the two sections have different purposes is perfectly apparent. The object of section 10 is to prevent the loss of a term of court, and discontinuance of pending cases, when, for any reason, the court fails to open on the day fixed for the beginning thereof, or on any day to which a term, after it had been opened, may have been adjourned. It does not purport to fix the time to which an adjournment may be made by any court, or place any limitation thereon. It merely continues the term by force of law, when the court has failed to commence business at the time appointed by law, or by its own adjourning order, for that purpose. Making no mention of, or reference to, adjournments, but ignoring the fiction by which the whole term is, for some purposes, considered a day, and assuming that the power of adjournment, possessed by all courts, will be exercised, it makes provision for failure to sit on the day to which a court may adjourn. As to when a court may adjourn, and for what period of time, it is absolutely silent.

It only remains, therefore, to determine the effect of section 2. By the common law a court has the inherent power to adjourn its session, not only from one day until the next, but to a distant day, or, as it is sometimes expressed, from time to time. Mechanics' Bank v. Withers, 6 Wheat. 106, 5 L. Ed. 217; In re Hunter, 84 Iowa, 388, 51 N. W. 20; Stirling v. Wagner (Wyo.) 31 Pac. 1032. The case last cited carefully reviews a large number of decisions of different states of the Union, and clearly shows that by the great weight of authority a court may so adjourn, unless the power to do so is restrained or limited by statute. Although our statute says adjournments may be from day to day, it does not necessarily follow that it means to limit the power of the court to an adjournment from one day until the next. Many statutes are simply declaratory of the common law. They are made for the purpose of avoiding all doubts and difficulties as to what the common law is and has been. Suth. Stat. Constr. § 329; Dwar. on Statutes, §§ 475, 477. This gives the statute effect under the rule that the courts, in construing statutes, must make them effect some purpose, for the Legislature is deemed to have had some reason for passing every statute. "A statute made in the affirmative, without any negative expressed or implied, does not take away the common law." Suth. Stat. Constr. § 320. No negative word or phrase appears in section 2. There is a presumption, also, that the Legislature does not intend to make any innovation upon the common law further than the necessity of the case requires, wherefore the courts will not, by construction, extend the effect of the language used beyond its natural meaning. Suth. Stat. Constr. § 454. This rule probably does not apply to merely remedial statutes or those relating to public policy, and may not therefore be applicable to this case. By the application of these rules it is difficult to reach a satisfactory conclusion as to what the Legislature intended. Under such circumstances it is highly proper to resort to the well-settled and very wholesome rule of contemporaneous construction. It is a fact known to the court, by the experience and observation of its members during their practice at the bar, their general knowledge of the proceedings of the circuit and county courts of the state, and information imparted by members of the legal profession, that said courts have almost, if not quite, uniformly interpreted and construed this statute as allowing adjournments from time to time as well as from day to day. Such has been the practice here since the formation of the state, and probably was, under the same statute, by the courts of Virginia prior to the organization of the state. Some of them cautiously avoid adjourning for more than three days, but, in most instances no such limit is observed. If section 2 inhibits an adjournment for more than one day, no authority for a longer adjournment exists. Section 10 does not confer it, and an adjournment for three days would be as unwarranted as one for 10 days. The only difference would be in this, that a failure for three days or less to sit would not destroy the term, while such failure for 10 days would do so. During all this time the Legislature has acquiesced in this construction of the statute. In some of the recent legislation of the state adjournments by the circuit courts from time to time have been expressly authorized. Code 1899, c. 112, § 5, relating to special terms. Such acquiescence on the part of the Legislature gives rise to the presumption that this construction of the statute is in conformity with its intent. "A contemporaneous construction is that which it [a statute] receives soon after its enactment. This, after the lapse of time, without change of that construction by legislation or judicial decision, has been declared to be generally the best construction. It gives the sense of the community as to the terms made use of by the Legislature. If there is ambiguity in the language, the understanding of the application of it when the statute first goes into operation, sanctioned by long acquiescence on the part of the Legislature and judicial tribunals, is the strongest evidence that it has been rightly explained in practice. A construction under such circumstances becomes established law." Suth. Stat. Constr. § 473, citing numerous cases, including Hahn v. United States, 107 U. S. 402, 2 Sup. Ct. 494, 27 L. Ed. 527; Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. Ed. 257; Pennoyer v. McConaughy, 140 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 699, 35 L. Ed. 363; and Hamilton v. McNeil, 13 Grat. 394. "The construction given to a statute by those charged with the duty of executing it ought not to be overruled without cogent reasons." Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. 690; Morris v. Board of Canvassers, 49 W. Va. 251, 258, 38 S. E. 500; United States v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760, 24 L. Ed. 588; Brown v. United States, 113 U. S. 568, 5 Sup. Ct. 648, 28 L. Ed. 1079.

Great evil would result from a judicial repudiation of this construction, for it would invalidate numerous judgments, decrees, and orders of the various courts of the state. This is a consideration not lightly to be passed over in reaching a conclusion as to the meaning of the doubtful language found in the statute. No adjudication by this court or by the Virginia court sustains the view taken by counsel for the respondents, nor does any reported decision expressly enunciate the proposition here asserted; but, under substantially the same statute, one authorizing adjournment from day to day, the Supreme Court of Virginia, in Langhorne v. Waller's Ex'rs, 76 Va. 213, virtually holds that an adjournment may be taken to a distant day. The court had adjourned from the 20th to the 23d of December, but did not sit on the 23d, nor until the 26th, and it was held that a judgment rendered by it before 4 o'clock on the 26th of December was valid. In the opinion it is said the power of the circuit court to adjourn from the 20th to the 23d was not questioned, and the appellate court expressly decided that such an adjournment could properly be made. The language in section 4 of chapter 114, and section 13 of chapter 18, lends countenance to the view that an adjournment can be for but one day, but it is all clearly reconcilable with the other construction. A provision in a notice to take depositions for continuing the taking thereof from day to day has been held not to authorize an adjournment to a distant day. Buddicum v. Kirk, 3 Cranch, 293, 2 L. Ed. 444; Raymond v. Williams, 21 Ind. 241; Harding v. Herrick et al., 3 Ala. 60. But the taking of depositions differs from the holding of a court, and, moreover, the opinions in the cases just cited are unsatisfactory, because they set forth no reason for the conclusions stated.

The reported decisions of this court disclose no instance of hardship, surprise, or other cause of injury or complaint arising out of the operation of the statute so construed. How could it occur? Every cause must be matured and placed on the docket of a circuit court before the first day of a term thereof, else it cannot be heard at that term, unless it be some special proceeding. If it is on the docket, and the parties want to be heard, they must attend on the day set for the hearing, and remain until some disposition of the case is made. If an adjournment over one or more days occurs, the record shows it and affords notice. The business of county courts affecting private interests is now, for the most part, ex parte in character, and the requirement of notice does not enter extensively into its transactions. If the Legislature did intend to prevent an adjournment to a distant day, in the interest of economy in the public expenditures, or for any other reason of public policy, the statute would probably have to be regarded as directory, for the length of the adjournment would not be of the essence of the holding of a term of court, and the statute contains no inhibitory language.

To hold that a county court or other tribunal, charged with the performance of a ministerial duty, at a given term, cannot be reconvened and compelled to perform that duty as of that term, when it has adjourned without having performed it, would place it in the power of every such body to refuse performance of its duty, and at the same time deny to those who are entitled to have it performed any remedy whatever. In order to evade performance of duty it would be necessary only to adjourn. In Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. 690, the power to reconvene a board of canvassers after a final adjournment on its part, without having legally performed its duties, was expressly declared and exercised, and that case has been followed by several others. Although a distinction between the county court sitting as a board of canvassers and a county court sitting as such is urged, no substantial ground therefor is perceived. The argument is that, as the court had finally adjourned, it would not, if reconvened, be in regular session, but in special session, and, as the action required of it can only be taken in regular session, it would be a vain and futile thing to require the members of the court to reassemble. The theory upon which a court or other tribunal is reconvened by mandamus, and compelled to perform its duty, is that it cannot legally adjourn as long as a mandatory duty rests upon it, respecting anything to be done at that term. The adjournment is final as to all other matters, but, as to that matter, there is not in law any adjournment, but only a formal adjournment and a physical absence of the members of the court. As to such matter, the court has no power to adjourn, if proper steps to prevent it are promptly taken; and, when the members reassemble under the mandate of a supervising tribunal, the court is in regular session quoad the duty it has failed to perform.

1. ANIMALS—RUNNING AT LARGE — OWNERSHIP BY NONRESIDENT—BONA FIDE CLAIM.

Code, § 2319, looks to the forfeiture by a nonresident of a fixed sum per head, for stock driven within the state during a certain period of the year, and suffered to range at large, but provides that within certain limits the section shall not apply to one "who * * * may own in said county any estate in land for one year, or other higher estate." Held, that the good faith of a nonresident, or a bona fide claim to title, would not bring him within the proviso.

2. PARTITION PROCEEDINGS—JURISDICTION—SERVICE ON NONRESIDENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The summons was not contained in the record of certain special partition proceedings. In the affidavit and order of publication, however, it appeared that a summons was issued, and a return made that defendants could not be found "after due search," and that defendants were nonresidents, having an interest in the subject of the action which was property within the jurisdiction of the court. The order of publication and notice of publication were full and explicit, and due publication was made of the summons according to law. The land was sold, the purchase money paid, the sale confirmed, and deed made to the purchaser by the commissioner. Held, that there was no defect in the proceedings sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the court so as to admit of collateral attack.

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Q. L. Rose against J. R. Davis and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff under section 2319 of the Code for the penalties mentioned therein. That section of the Code is as follows: "If any person who shall be a resident citizen of another state or one of the territories shall drive or cause to be driven into any county in this state any horses, mules, hogs, cattle, or sheep, between the first day of April and the last day of November, and suffer them to run at large in any marsh or forest range in this state, he shall forfeit five dollars for each head so permitted to run at large to any one who may sue for the same, or proceed by attachment, in case the offender is not to be found, one half to the party suing for the same, the other half to the school fund of the county. Provided, this section shall not apply to any non-resident, who for the time being may own in said county any estate in land for one year, or other higher estate, unless such non-resident shall bring into the range more than twenty head of any of said beasts for every two hundred acres of land owned by him in manner aforesaid in said county." There are other provisos, but they are not material to this case.

Fry & Howe, for appellant.

BROWN, J. It was admitted and found on the trial that plaintiff was a resident of this state, and that the defendants were non-residents. The plaintiff offered evidence to the effect that the defendants, in the year 1903, between the first day of April and the last day of November, drove or caused to be driven into Swain county 220 head of sheep and cattle, and ranged them in the forests of the Smoky Mountains in said county. The defendants offered evidence to the effect that they drove only 120 head, and also evidence tending to show that they had such an estate in 1,200 acres of land in said county as would justify them for driving that number of sheep and cattle into said county by bringing themselves within the purview of the first proviso contained in section 2319 of the Code. The plaintiff seeks to recover the penalty provided in the act for illegally driving and ranging 120 head of sheep and cattle in Swain county. The court submitted certain issues to the jury, to which there was no exception. The first issue was as follows: "Did the defendants or either of them drive, or cause to be driven, between the first day of April, 1903, and the last day of November, 1903, unlawfully and without right or authority drive or cause to be driven into the county of Swain, in the state of North Carolina, cattle or sheep, and unlawfully and without right or authority range or cause to be ranged in the forests and commons in said county and state, and cause them to run at large in the forests of said county; and if so, how many? Answer: No." The defendants contended that they did not drive more than 120 head of cattle and sheep during the said year, and sought to justify by showing a claim or title to certain land.

His honor charged the jury, among other things, that if the defendants believed in good faith, at the time they drove or caused to be driven into Swain county cattle and sheep and ranged them in Swain county, that they had a bona fide claim or title to 1,200 acres of land in Swain county, then they would have been entitled to range in Swain county 120 head of cattle and sheep, without being liable for the penalty therefor. In this instruction there was error. The question of the defendants' good faith or bona fide claim does not enter into the case. In order to justify the defendants in ranging at large their cattle and sheep in Swain county, the burden is upon them to show that they own an estate in land in said county for one year or other higher estate. Under the provisions of section 2319 of the Code, if a nonresident owns such an estate in land in said county, then he may bring into the range 20 head of the beasts mentioned in the statute. If he brings in more than 20 head of such beasts to range, then he must show such an estate in 200 acres of land for every additional 20 head which he may turn into the range.

It is contended by the plaintiff that the special proceeding for partition, entitled Samuel L. Davis et al. v. James A. Sparks and others, under which defendants seek to establish title to certain lands, is null and void for irregularity, and so much so that it may be attacked collaterally. We have examined it with care and do not find any grave irregularity in it—certainly nothing that avoids it on the face of the record. Although the summons in the special proceeding is not in the record, it sufficiently appears in the affidavit and order for publication that a summons was issued and that a return was made thereon that the defendants could not be found after due search. The affidavit for publication sets out the return of the sheriff and avers that defendants cannot be found "after due search." This is tantamount to "due diligence." It further states that defendants are nonresidents of this state and that they have an interest in the property, the subject of the action and in the jurisdiction of the court. The order of publication is equally full and explicit in its recitals, and it appears that due publication was made of the summons according to law. The notice of publication is set out in the record, and it is full and explicit. The land was sold for partition, and the purchase money paid by the purchaser, the sale confirmed and deed made to him by Everett, the commissioner, in due form.

We find no defects in the proceeding sufficient to avoid the sale, much less to oust the jurisdiction of the court.

New trial.

HYATT et al. v. DE HART et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. APPEAL — PRESUMPTIONS — BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR.

The presumption prevails on appeal, even in injunction cases, that the judgment and proceedings below are correct, and the burden is on appellant to assign and show error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3667, 3670.]

2. INJUNCTION—RESTRAINING ORDER PENDING HEARING—DISSOLUTION.

Where the relief demanded by injunction is a restraining order against a tax levied by virtue of an election which had been held under Laws 1901, p. 65, c. 4, § 72, as amended by Laws 1903, p. 756, c. 435, § 24, authorising a special school tax, and providing for the use of the tax in the education of the young, and the granting of the relief would seriously interfere with the education of the young, an injunction to the hearing is properly dissolved, where the judge found as facts that one-fourth of the freeholders of the district signed the petition for the election, and that, while there were some irregularities in holding the election and recording the result, these were not such as to vitiate the election or make the collection of the tax illegal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Ferguson, Judge.

Suit for injunction by R. H. Hyatt and others against S. A. De Hart and others. From an order dissolving a restraining order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. O. Fisher, for appellants.

CLARK, C. J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving a restraining order, which had been granted until the hearing, against a tax levied by virtue of an election, authorizing a special school tax, held by virtue of section 72, c. 4, p. 65, Laws 1901, as amended by section 24, c. 435, p. 756, Laws 1903. The evidence was conflicting. The judge found as facts that one-fourth of the freeholders of the district signed the petition for the election, and that a majority of the voters voted in favor of the special tax, and that, while there were some irregularities in holding the election and recording the result, they were not of such nature as to vitiate the election or make the collection of the tax illegal. Ordinarily, the findings of fact by the judge below are conclusive on appeal. While this is not true as to injunction cases, in which we look into and review the evidence on appeal, still there is the presumption always that the judgment and proceedings below are correct, and the burden is upon the appellant to assign and show error; and, looking into the affidavits in this case, we cannot say there was error below.

The general rule is that when the injunctive relief sought is not merely ancillary to the principal relief demanded in the action, but is itself the main relief, the court will not dissolve the injunction, but will continue it to the hearing. Marshall v. Commissioners, 89 N. C. 103. But, when the injunction is against the prosecution of enterprises which tend to develop the resources of the country, an injunction to the hearing will ordinarily be refused. Walton v. Mills, 86 N. C. 280. Certainly, therefore, an injunction to the hearing should be denied or dissolved on the state of facts here found when the relief sought will seriously interfere with the education of the young. There can doubtless be a speedy trial of the disputed issues of fact before a jury, and in the meantime the schools should not be interrupted when the weight of the testimony is found by the judge to be as above stated.

Affirmed.

M. MILLHISER & CO. v. LEATHERWOOD.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—NONSUIT—REVIEW.

The court, on appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, must assume that the evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case is true and view it in the aspect most favorable to him, drawing every legitimate inference therefrom which a jury could have drawn.

2. SAME—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR.

The refusal to dismiss a case at the close of plaintiff's case is not reviewable, where defendant introduced evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3614.]

3. JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—PERSONS CONCLUDED—PERSON NOT A PARTY.

A person is not bound by a judgment rendered in an action to which he was not a party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 1230-1233.]

4. PAYMENT—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where a creditor sent a claim to an attorney for collection, and in the settlement of another controversy between the debtor and a third person money came into the possession of the attorney and was deposited in a bank to his credit under arrangement that the attorney should send his own check to the creditor in payment of the claim, the question whether the creditor could recover from the attorney on the theory that the debtor had paid the claim to the attorney was for the jury.

Brown, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Gustavus Millhiser and others, trading under the firm name and style of M. Millhiser & Co., against R. L. Leatherwood. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

This action was brought to recover the sum of $647, which it is alleged the defendant received on a claim he held for collection as attorney for the plaintiffs, and which, upon demand, he has failed to pay over. This allegation is denied in the answer. The evidence tended to show that the plaintiffs had sold and delivered goods to Marr & Co. to the amount of $1,000. They paid $230, and the account, then amounting to $730, was sent by plaintiffs to defendant as their attorney for collection. Coffin & McDonald owned and operated a mill, and had contracted with one W. W. Ladd to saw logs for him. Coffin & McDonald failed to pay their hands, and Marr & Co. advanced the money, at their request, to the hands, and took an assignment of the claims of the hands against Coffin & McDonald, and filed liens upon lumber which belonged to Ladd. The defendant also represented Ladd as attorney. It was agreed between the defendant, as plaintiffs' attorney, and W. T. Conley, acting for Marr & Co., that if Conley would release the liens, and take down the notices of sale, which had been posted on the lumber piles, the defendant would assume the payment of the account of the plaintiffs against Marr & Co.; he stating at the time that Ladd, his client, had placed the money in the bank to his credit in order to pay the amount secured by the liens and discharge the same, and that he would pay the amount for which liens were filed out of this money. W. T. Conley, a witness for the plaintiffs, in this connection testified: "Defendant said that if I would take notices of sale off the lumber, so that he could load it, he would pay the Millhiser debt to the amount of the notices taken off. The debt amounted to $630, and the liens to $700." The witness further testified: "I told him the Millhiser debt was what I wanted to be paid, and that I would go on and take the liens off if he would apply the money to the payment of the Millhiser debt, and I then went and helped to take the notices of sale off the lumber, and it was then loaded and shipped away. Ladd had Noble to load the lumber. Leatherwood said he would pay the amount to Millhiser & Co., instead of paying it to me, as he held the claim against me, and I agreed to this. The next morning I went to the defendant to get a receipt, and he said that he was busy right then, and would give a receipt just as soon as the lumber was loaded." About two weeks afterwards, Conley saw the defendant, who told him that some of the checks he had drawn on the fund in bank had been returned protested, as they had drawn the money out before his checks were presented. Conley then asked defendant for a receipt for the claim of Millhiser & Co. against Marr & Co., and he replied that he would rather wait until he collected the money out of them. Defendant paid some of the lienors, but stopped paying when the money had been drawn from the bank. Sheriff Teague (who held the execution for the sale of the lumber issued in the proceedings to enforce the liens) testified that the defendant requested him to postpone the sale, stating at the time that the money to satisfy the liens would be sent to the bank and might be there that day. The sheriff refused to postpone the sale, when defendant told him, if he would go to Asheville with him to see about the money, he would pay his expenses. They went and saw Rankin, the bank's cashier. They inquired of him if any money was there for the defendant, and he said there was not. Defendant then said, "We will go to dinner and come back." They returned to the bank after dinner, and the cashier told them that the bank had been wired to put $1,000 to defendant's credit. The sheriff then wired his deputy to postpone the sale. The witness Teague further testified: "The next day the defendant gave me a check for the liens. I sent the check to the bank, and Rankin told me defendant had no funds to meet the check, as Stewart had wired the money out of Leatherwood's hands, or countermanded his order. Defendant said this money was to pay off the liens. After refreshing my recollection I remember that the defendant told Conley he would receipt him for the Millhiser debt if he would release the liens." There was other testimony corroborating that already stated. The defendant testified in his own behalf that he thought the $1,000 was in the bank when he gave his check to Sheriff Teague for $142. Rankin told him, not that the money was in the bank to his credit, but that the bank had received a telegram to put $1,000 to his credit, and that the order to do so was immediately countermand-

ed. He stopped shipping lumber, and was not afterwards notified that any money had been placed to his credit. Defendant then testified: "I never told Conley that I would give him a receipt for the Millhiser claim till money was placed to my credit. If there was any conversation about the receipt, I don't remember it. I owed Marr & Co. an account, and I might have agreed to credit it on the Millhiser matter and give him a receipt, but I didn't do it." He further testified that he did not tell any one that he had $1,000 in the bank. If anything was said about it by him, it was when he returned from Asheville and repeated what Rankin had told him. The other material portions of the plaintiffs' evidence were denied. The witness Rankin testified that the bank had received a telegram to pay defendant $1,000, but that in about an hour the request had been withdrawn, and that he had no time to place the amount to the credit of defendant, and that he had never notified him of it. No such amount was ever placed to his credit. He had searched for the telegrams, but could not find them, and thought they were burned. The order authorized the bank to draw for $1,000, and place that amount to defendant's credit. He also said that he did not recollect telling Teague what the latter stated he had said to him at the bank about defendant having a credit there of $1,000. At the close of the plaintiffs' testimony, the defendant moved for a judgment of nonsuit under the statute, which the court refused, and at the close of all the testimony he renewed the motion. The court sustained it, and entered judgment of nonsuit. Plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Fry & Rowe, for appellants.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts). A judgment of nonsuit requires us to assume that all the evidence which tends to establish the plaintiffs' case is true, and to view it in the aspect most favorable to the plaintiffs, drawing every reasonable and legitimate inference therefrom which the jury could have drawn, had they passed upon the case. All the facts that make for the plaintiffs must be taken as established, and considered by us, and all those that make against them must be rejected. In a few words, they are entitled in this court to the most favorable interpretation of the evidence after excluding all that is against them. Springs v. Schenck, 99 N. C. 551, 6 S. E. 405, 6 Am. St. Rep. 552; Purnell v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 832, 29 S. E. 953; Printing Co. v. Raleigh, 126 N. C. 516, 36 S. E. 33. In Brittain v. Westhall, 135 N. C. 495, 47 S. E. 616, the principle was thus formulated: "It is well settled that on a motion to nonsuit or to dismiss under the statute, which is like a demurrer to evidence, the court is not permitted to pass upon the weight of the evidence, but the evidence must be accepted as true, and construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and every fact which it tends to prove must be taken as established, as the jury, if the case had been submitted to them, might have found those facts upon the testimony." It was said in Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 430, 48 S. E. 775, 68 L. R. A. 776: "The right of the plaintiff to have [the case] submitted to the jury cannot be denied or abridged, provided there is some evidence tending to establish the plaintiff's contention." The same principle applies with equal force when a plaintiff, in deference to an adverse intimation of the court, submits to a nonsuit. Gibbs v. Lyon, 95 N. C. 146; Springs v. Schenck, supra; Abernathy v. Stowe, 92 N. C. 213. The court declares in the case last cited that the plaintiff is entitled to go to the jury if in any view of the evidence he has made out a prima facie case. The question as to what is evidence fit to be considered by the jury was discussed by us in Byrd v. Express Co., 51 S. E. 851, and Campbell v. Everhart (at this term) 52 S. E. 201.

We will now proceed to examine this case in the light of this well-settled rule. If the first ruling made by the court was right—that is, the refusal to nonsuit the plaintiff at the close of his testimony, then the second ruling was wrong, as none of the evidence afterwards introduced could be considered against the plaintiff, but only such as was in his favor. But we pass by the first ruling, as it was eliminated when the defendant introduced testimony, and we are now confined to the second ruling dismissing the action at the close of all the testimony. It appears that the plaintiffs sued Marr & Co. for the recovery of the debt due to them, and obtained judgment. Defendants appealed to this court, and it was held here that the transaction between Marr & Co., the bank, and Leatherwood constituted a payment of the plaintiffs' claim, and a new trial was awarded. Millhiser v. Marr, 128 N. C. 318, 38 S. E. 887. The case was again tried below, when the defendant got a judgment and the plaintiff appealed. Upon testimony substantially identical with that we have before us, this court held that there was evidence for the consideration of the jury upon the plea of payment, and that the only question involved was one of fact, whether the money had been placed in the bank to Leatherwood's credit, and, the jury having found with the defendant, the judgment was affirmed. Millhiser v. Marr, 130 N. C. 510, 41 S. E. 872. Leatherwood is certainly not bound by either of those decisions, under the doctrine of res judicata, for they cannot have that force and effect as to him; he not having been a party to the action. But, if we are to follow those cases as precedents, there is no way of avoiding the conclusion that his honor erred in the trial of this cause, when he withdrew the case from the jury and decided as matter of law that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, in any view of the evidence. In the first of the decisions of this court to which we have referred it is said: "In what way Ladd drew the money out of the bank does not appear, but it does not concern defendants. Under their agreement with Leatherwood, who had it in bank to his credit, it had been appropriated for the payment of plaintiffs' debt, and if, by negligence or otherwise upon the part of the attorney or the bank, Ladd got hold of the money, plaintiffs must look to them, and not to defendants. Plaintiffs were acting through their agent, having placed in him authority and trust, and are bound by his acts in dealing with defendants. In no sense was he the agent of the defendant, and they lost all control over, right to, and responsibility for the money when he agreed to and did accept it in payment of his client's debt." 128 N. C., at page 321, 38 S. E. 888. And in the second of the decisions the court says: "His honor committed no error in holding, at the close of the evidence, that all there was in the case was whether or not the $1,000 had been placed in the bank to the credit of Leatherwood to pay off the liens. There is no suggestion that Leatherwood misapplied the fund, but it is admitted that he did not do so. Under the decision of this court (Millhiser v. Marr, 128 N. C. 318, 38 S. E. 887) it is held that plaintiffs' debt against defendants was settled when W. T. Conley released his lien and agreed that his money in Leatherwood's hands should be applied to that purpose." 130 N. C., at page 512, 38 S. E. 887.

Without discussing or deciding the question as to the liability of the defendant, we simply hold that there was evidence for the jury upon the issue raised by the pleadings. We prefer not to intimate any opinion as to the present stage of the case as to the liability of the defendant, nor until we have a finding of the jury upon the facts. They may find against the plaintiffs, and it may not, therefore, become necessary ever to decide that question, and, if they find for the plaintiffs, we do not now know exactly how the matter will be presented, if there is an appeal. We fully concur in what is said by the court in Millhiser v. Marr, 130 N. C. 512, 38 S. E. 887, namely, that there is no suggestion, and, we add, no evidence, that Leatherwood ever misapplied the fund or any part of it, nor, indeed, that he ever had it in his actual possession. His liability must depend upon facts, from which it will appear that he has derived no personal benefit from the transaction.

There are other exceptions in the case, but it is not necessary to consider them, as the decision upon the matter discussed is sufficient to dispose of the appeal, and the other questions may not again be presented. We will suggest, however, that if the plaintiffs expect to recover upon any other ground than that stated in the complaint, for example, upon the ground of negligence, they must amend their pleading. They can recover, if at all, only according to the allegations of their complaint. Faulk v. Thornton, 108 N. C. 314, 12 S. E. 998.

There was error in the ruling of the court. The nonsuit will be set aside, and a new trial awarded.

Error.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). I am impelled to dissent from the opinion and conclusion in this case.

1. The allegations of the complaint are to the effect that the defendant received the money from his client, and the action is evidently brought to recover the money so had and received. There is no evidence that the defendant ever received the money or anything else in payment of the debt.

2. If the defendant is to be charged with negligently releasing the lien on the lumber, which it is claimed he held for his client's benefit, that would involve a radical amendment to the pleadings, and practically a change in the cause of action. As no amendment was asked for in the superior court or in this court, I think the judgment should be affirmed.

RUTHERFORD COUNTY COM'RS v.
ERWIN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—EXCEPTION—NECESSITY.

Under rule of practice 27 (39 S. E. vii), requiring objections to be noted by exceptions, and providing that no exception not so set out and made a part of the case or record shall be considered, a general exception to the trial court's action on the report of a referee will not be considered on appeal, where there are various exceptions to the report and several questions of law and fact passed upon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by the commissioners of Rutherford county against L. P. Erwin and others. From a judgment modifying and affirming a report of a referee and dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action to foreclose a tax certificate heard on exceptions to the report of a referee. There was judgment modifying and confirming the report, and on the report so modified there was further judgment dismissing the action. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Solomon Gallert, for appellant. McBrayer & McBrayer and B. A. Justice, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case). There is no objection properly noted in the case which requires or permits this court to disturb the judgment of the court below, and the same is affirmed. The only exception to the action of the judge on the report is in this language: "The plaintiff excepts to such rulings adverse to it and appeals." A general exception to the many rulings of the judge below on a report and judgment of the kind here presented is contrary to the course and practice of the court and will not be considered. If a party litigant considers himself aggrieved by the rulings of a judge on exceptions to the report of a referee, he should point out his objections by exceptions duly noted, and as a rule only objections so indicated will be considered. Rule of Practice No. 27 (39 S. E. vii); Clark's Code, § 422, and notes; Young v. Kennedy, 95 N. C. 266; Battle v. Mayo, 102 N. C. 413, 9 S. E. 384; McKinnon v. Morrison, 104 N. C. 354, 10 S. E. 513. In Young v. Kennedy it is held that an exception to the report of a referee will not be considered, where it is vague and indefinite and imposes on the court the necessity of an examination of the entire record to find out its meaning. And in rule 27, requiring objections to be noted by exceptions briefly stated and numbered, it is said that "no exception not thus set out or filed and made a part of the case or record shall be considered by the court other than exceptions to the jurisdiction or because the complaint does not state a cause of action, or motion in arrest for the insufficiency of an indictment."

It may be that a judgment and report thereon could be so restricted in its nature that a single or general exception would note the only point in question, but not so here; and there could be no better illustration of the wisdom of the rule and the reasonableness of its requirement than in the case now before us. Here is a complaint containing 23 allegations as necessary to state the plaintiff's grievance; on answer duly filed a reference is ordered; the referee, after taking quite an amount of testimony, makes an elaborate and carefully prepared report on the points in controversy; to this report the plaintiff files 37 exceptions as to what the report does, and a good number indicated by letters as to what it fails to do. The judge below gives the matter painstaking consideration, passes upon the questions of law and fact, confirms or modifies certain portions of the report, and sets aside others, in some instances substituting his own findings of fact for those modified or set aside. It is a full and well-considered judgment, and the only notice of any objection to it is in the language of the exception above stated. Under the law and rules of practice, such an exception will not be considered as raising any valid objection, and the judgment of the court below dismissing the action is affirmed. While we rest our decision on the form of the exception, there seems to be no error in the proceedings or judgment which gives the plaintiff any just ground of complaint.

Affirmed.

(73 S. C. 21)

ALEXANDER v. DU BOSE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. PLEADING—IRRELEVANT MATTER.

Within Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 181, providing that irrelevant or redundant matter in a pleading may be stricken out on motion of any party aggrieved, an allegation is irrelevant when it has no substantial relation to the controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 1156.]

2. EQUITY—PLEADING—FRAUD.

In a suit in equity, where fraud is alleged, it is essential that the facts and circumstances constituting the fraud should be clearly stated and it is not reversible error to refuse to strike out matters which are directly or remotely relevant to the matter sought to be established.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 326.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by M. Eliza Alexander against Charles W. Du Bose. From an order striking out certain allegations of the complaint, and refusing to strike out others, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

A. B. Stuckey and Galletly & Ragsdale, for plaintiff. J. P. McNeill and Wilcox & Wilcox, for defendant.

JONES, J. Both sides appeal in this case from an order of Judge Dantzler made on the hearing of defendant's motion to strike out certain portions of the complaint as irrelevant or redundant. The defendant moved to strike out those portions of the complaint, herein set out in full, which are italicized, and of those italicized portions, the judge struck out those enclosed within brackets and refused to strike out those not so enclosed. The defendant appeals from so much of the order as refuses to strike out, and the plaintiff appeals from so much of the order as strikes out. The complaint is as follows:

"(1) That the plaintiff is the owner in fee, and in the possession of a part, and entitled to the immediate possession of the whole, of all that tract situate in the county of Florence, state aforesaid, containing, by a recent survey, 826 acres, more or less, in the deeds of conveyance thereof, and is bounded by lands owned by persons now or formerly as follows: North by lands of W. M. Timmons, S. E. B. Hickson, and Adeline Sims; east by lands of S. E. Carter and Margaret Conyers; south by Lynches river; and west by lands of J. J. Ward.

"(2) That there is a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff to the said premises, by reason of the fact that there appears of record in the clerk's office of said county, in Book 1, on page 728, an instrument of writing, purporting to be a deed of conveyance by the plaintiff to the defendant, for the consideration, therein expressed, of $3,547.49, and which purports to have been signed by the plaintiff, as the grantor, and two subscribing witnesses, namely J. E. Du Bose and May Du Bose. That, while the plaintiff admits that she placed her signature to the original of said instrument of writing, her signature thereto was obtained by the defendant by fraud and deception practiced upon her by him, as hereinafter more fully stated. Yet at the time she signed the same there was no consideration whatever, expressed or stated in the instrument, nor was it witnessed by the subscribing witness May Du Bose, whose name appears as a witness thereto [who was then, at the time of the signing of said original instrument, not at the plaintiff's home, where she signed the same, but was many miles away, as the plaintiff is informed and believes], and that the plaintiff has never acknowledged to her that she signed or executed said instrument of writing. [That the other subscribing witness, J. E. Du Bose, was present at the plaintiff's home on or about the date of said instrument, to wit, the 16th day of September, 1897 and did witness the plaintiff's signature thereon. That if the signature of the said May Du Bose was placed upon the original instrument, of which the said record purports to show a copy, it was put there without the authority or consent of the plaintiff] and that the deed is, therefore, null and void in law, and should be canceled of record by the proper order of this court.

"(3) That the defendant is now [endeavoring to defraud the plaintiff of her right and title to said property] by claiming that he holds the absolute title thereto, and denying that the plaintiff has any title or interest in law or equity to the same; whereas, not only is the said instrument purporting to be a deed illegal, by reason of the defects and deficiencies above stated, but that the signautre of the plaintiff was wrongfully and fraudulently obtained thereon by the defendant by reason of the following facts and circumstances, to wit: That the plaintiff's former husband, Dorsey G. Du Bose, departed this life on or about the 10th day of June, 1891, leaving the plaintiff, his widow and the mother of their children, eight in number, most of whom were small and of tender years. That a few years before his death, acting under the counsel and advice of her husband, who was the manager of all her affairs, she sold a tract of land in Darlington county, and after paying the mortgage debt thereon reinvested the net proceeds in the purchase of the tract of land above described; the title deed being taken to and in the name of the plaintiff, who executed a mortgage thereon to secure the balance of the purchase money thereof, to one Mrs. Mary Byrd, about the year 1889. That the defendant is the plaintiff's next oldest son, and his father, shortly before his death, and being conscious that his death was near hand, told, the defendant, who.

by experience and superior advantages of education, was, as he thought, the best qualified to take his place in the management of the business affairs of the plaintiff after his death, and that he wanted him to take care of his mother, the plaintiff, and take charge of the affairs at home, and the defendant promised to do so. That immediately upon the death of the plaintiff's said husband the defendant took exclusive control of the said plantation, and of all the affairs of the plaintiff, employed his younger brothers, the plaintiff's other children, to work share crops upon said land year after year, hiring some for wages, and agreeing out of their shares of the proceeds of the crops to pay their board to the plaintiff, who kept them, boarded them, and cared for them at her home on said farm, with the understanding that the net proceeds of the crops were to be paid by the defendant upon the said purchase money mortgage debt. He received all of the same and has never accounted therefor to the plaintiff. Some time during the year 1897 Reddin Byrd, the son of the said Mrs. Mary Byrd, and her heir at law, as she had died, came to the plaintiff and asked for the payment of the said mortgage debt; that she referred him to her son, the defendant, and had no further business transaction with the said Reddin Byrd. The defendant then undertook to borrow the money for the plaintiff elsewhere by a mortgage of the premises, and shortly thereafter sent out to the plaintiff's home—the defendant was not, and had not been, being at home with the plaintiff for several years—the agent of the Scottish Loan Company, to inspect the land and ascertain its value, with the view of lending the money upon a mortgage therefor. The said agent stated to the plaintiff and the family that the land was valuable, and that the said company would lend the money thereon. The plaintiff and her entire family were pleased at this statement, and became satisfied that the home would be saved from foreclosure of the first-named mortgage, for the plaintiff had been informed by the defendant that the said premises were then being advertised for sale under the power of sale in the first-named mortgage, which could only be prevented by obtaining the money elsewhere to pay off the same. A few days after the agent went away, the defendant came again to the home of the plaintiff on the said tract of land, and without any previous agreement or understanding with her brought with him the said instrument of writing purporting to be a deed of conveyance, and requested the plaintiff to sign for same, stating that it was necessary for her to make the title over to him, as the said Scottish Loan Company had refused to lend the money to her on account of her age; she being, as he said, above the age, under their rules, to borrow money of them. While the defendant was her son, and she placed great confidence in him, she hesitated to do so, asking him what interest she would then have. The defendant replied that the land was about to be sold under the first mortgage, 'and you and the family will be turned out of the house and home, and be put in the public road, if you do not sign this deed.' The plaintiff began to cry, and the defendant walked away from the house, and in a few minutes came back again, and repeated the statement to her, that, if she did not sign the deed, she would be put in the public road, and, as a further inducement to the plaintiff, told her that he would see to it that she at least was saved 100 acres around the dwelling house. That the plaintiff was and had been for some time in declining health, under the constant treatment of her physician, and was not expected to live many months, her mind and body being both in a weak condition, but trusting the defendant that he would do all that was right and proper by her and her children as to the whole premises, and believing, from defendant's statement, that she and her children would be put out penniless if she did not do so, signed the said deed as aforesaid, and acknowledged her signature to the same to her other son, J. E. Du Bose, who was present when the same was signed; there being no other witness present, as above stated. [That at the time of the signing of the said deed the plaintiff noticed that there was no consideration or purchase price made therein, the space therefor being left blank, and that she has no knowledge or information by what means the consideration thereon, as now appears of record, was ascertained or placed there] nor has she received any consideration therefor from the defendant or any one else, and that her equity of redemption under the first mortgage stated has never been purchased from her by any one. That said tract of land was of the value of about $10,000 then (1897) and is now worth about $16,000. That the plaintiff is informed and believes that the defendant soon thereafter, by a mortgage executed by him, obtained the necessary money to pay off the first mortgage aforesaid, which was about the sum of $1,700, as the plaintiff is informed and believes, though it might be that the same should have been a small amount if the defendant had properly applied all of the net proceeds of the crop thereon prior thereto which he had received. That the defendant's brothers, the plaintiff's other sons, to wit, Junius, Albert, and Oquin, after the signing of the said instrument by the plaintiff, continued to work crops upon said lands, either for wages or under share crop contracts with the defendant, year after year; it being understood by all concerned that the net proceeds were to be applied to the indebtedness on said plantation. That the defendant has continued to receive all of the proceeds from said farm from year to year, being about 40 bales of cotton per annum, besides tobacco and provision crops, and has never accounted therefor to the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, now refuses to account for the same, or for any other income that he has received therefrom, and claims an absolute fee-simple title to said premises, denying that the plaintiff has any right or interest therein.

"(4) That the said Dorsey G. Du Bose left a life insurance policy of $1000 for the benefit of his wife and children, but left a chattel mortgage on his horse and some of his cattle to one John McSween. That the defendant was duly appointed the general guardian of the six minor children of the plaintiff, and obtained possession, not only of their shares of the money under the life policy, but of the plaintiff's share as well. That she signed a receipt for the same, but never received the money; the same being paid to the defendant. That, by an understanding with the plaintiff, the defendant undertook to pay, and did pay, off the said chattel mortgage, using the plaintiff's share of the money for that purpose, as far as it would go, which, as plaintiff is informed and believes, was not quite sufficient to pay off the entire amount of the chattel mortgage; but the defendant took charge of the personal property covered thereby, traded off the horse, but for many years left the cattle on the farm, to be used by the plaintiff, until the 30th of March, 1904, he came to the plaintiff's home and took away all of the cattle, being four head, covered by said chattel mortgage, and their increase, and converted the same into his own use, and should account for all of the same.

"(5). That shortly after the plaintiff made said deed the defendant wrote to his next oldest brother, Junius, who was then in a western state, and simply stated that he had the mortgage matter arranged. That soon afterwards Junius returned to plaintiff's home, and upon meeting the defendant there, he acknowledged to him that he had arranged the matter by borrowing the money from the Scottish Loan Company, but that he intended to give his mother 100 acres where the dwelling house is located, to use for her lifetime, and at her death the same to be turned over to him for his share of the plantation, but that the rest of the plantation he intended to divide up among all of her other children in equal shares. Of this the plaintiff is informed by her son Junius and believes the same to be true.]

"(6) That, in addition to all the crops since his father's death, the defendant has also received the proceeds of about 200 acres of pine timber on said tract of land, which was manufactured into lumber by the defendant by and through his contract with some person managing a sawmill, and which he had put upon said land about the year 1900. That the said pine timber was thick and of good quality, and well worth at least the sum of $10 per acre aggregating $2,000, all of which the defendant converted to his own use, and should account for the same. That the defendant also had manufactured on said plantation, since he has had control of said tract of land, 60,000 cypress shingles of the value of about $250, and sold therefrom, also, 2½ sticks of square timber, and should account for the same.

"(7) That by and through the efforts of her son, since the defendant has had control of said premises, the plaintiff has procured to be cleared upon said land 55 acres of new land, and made suitable for cultivation in crops, and has also built several houses and tobacco barns, in the confidence that she and her children would receive the benefit thereof in the improvement of the plantation, which she hoped to be able to divide among them. [That some of her younger children are now of age and need the land, which she desires to distribute among them.]

"(8) That the plaintiff is informed and believes that the defendant has paid off, or nearly paid off, the mortgage indebtedness aforesaid upon said tract of land, and, whether the same has been paid or not, she alleges that he has received more than a sufficient income therefrom to pay off the same, and should account therefor.

"Wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment that the alleged deed by the plaintiff to the defendant be adjudged illegal, fraudulent, null, and void. That the defendant be required to account for the mortgage debt, and to account for the rents and profits received by him from said plantation, and the live stock and personal property thereon, since the death of his father in 1891. That the income be applied to the payment of the debt, and that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for excess, and for such other relief as may be just and proper, and for costs."

1. Section 181 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, provides: "If irrelevant or redundant matter be inserted in a pleading, it may be stricken out on motion of any person aggrieved thereby." "An allegation is irrelevant when the issue formed by its denial can have no connection with, nor effect upon, the cause of action." Pom. Code Rem. § 551; Smith v. Smith, 50 S. C. 67, 27 S. E. 545. An allegation is irrelevant when it has no substantial relation to the controversy. Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C. 473. "Irrelevant matter is necessarily redundant, and though redundant matter—as statements of evidential facts—may pertain to the cause of action, yet they are sometimes called irrelevant as well as redundant." Bliss on Code Pl. § 214. "Matter which has no connection with the cause of action is irrelevant, while the statement of evidential facts is unnecessary. The latter may be very pertinent. They may all relate to the case, yet their statement is uncalled for, and violates as well the rule against pleading evidence, and therefore embodies redundant matter." Same author, § 423. This author gives as his seventh rule for the statement of a cause of action that "no fact should be stated which is not pertinent and whose statement is not necessary." In section 163 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, it is provided that the complaint shall contain "a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action, without unnecessary repetition." The facts thus required to be stated are the basic, ultimate facts, as distinguished from facts which are merely evidentiary. These general rules sustain the action of the circuit court in striking out.

2. On the other hand, this is a cause in equity, and in Smith v. Smith, 50 S. C. 54, 68, 27 S. E. 545, the court quotes approvingly from Pom. Code Rem. 527, showing that "in the legal action the issuable facts are few. In the equitable suit the material facts upon which the relief depends, or which influence and modify it, are generally numerous and often exceedingly so. In the former they are simple, clearly defined, and certain. In the latter they may be, and frequently are, complicated, involved, contingent, and uncertain." From this distinction there must exist somewhat more latitude in such cases in stating the facts and circumstances upon which plaintiff depends for the relief sought. The court should be liberal in indulging a statement of facts which may be material to the relief sought, in whole or in part. This is especially true when fraud is alleged, as in this case, for, both in law and in equity, it is essential that the facts and circumstances which constitute fraud should be set out clearly. 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 684; Gem Chemical Co. v. Youngblood, 58 S. C. 59, 36 S. E. 437. In such cases it is not reversible error to refuse to strike out matters which are "directly or remotely relevant to the matter sought to be established." Allen v. Cooley, 60 S. C. 370, 38 S. E. 622. Under these principles, we find no material reversible error, in so far as he refused to strike out. On the whole we do not see that either party is prejudiced in any material manner by the action of the court.

The exceptions are therefore overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not participate in this opinion, because of illness.

ROBERT BUIST CO. v. LANCASTER MERCANTILE CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina, July 11, 1905. On Rehearing, Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — AUTHORITY OF AGENT—QUESTION FOR JURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

On conflicting evidence as to the limitation of an agent's authority, it is not proper to charge that the agent was without authority in the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, § 724.]

2. EVIDENCE—SIMILAR ORDERS.

On the issue whether an order for goods was given or not, the salesman who is claimed to have taken the order may not testify that he took an order of the same kind from another company managed by the alleged purchaser and that such order was accepted.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — EVIDENCE — DECLARATIONS OF AGENCY.

The declarations of an agent, when taken in connection with the ratification of his acts by the principal, are competent to show agency.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, § 40.]

4. SAME—CONTRACTS OF AGENT—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether a salesman sold goods under an agreement that his principal should pay the freight held, under the evidence, which was conflicting, a question for the jury.

5. TRIAL — DIRECTED VERDICTS — WHEN PROPER.

It is improper to direct a verdict, where there is competent evidence in support of the issues raised in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 338.]

6. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where there is evidence in support of the issues in a case, it is not error to refuse a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 142-145.]

7. SALES—ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS—EFFECT.

The fact that a purchaser accepts a part of a bill of goods sold and pays for them, with the freight thereon, does not estop him to deny his liability to pay freight on the balance of the bill.

8. SAME—TERMS OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

On an issue as to whether the seller of goods contracted to pay the freight, evidence of a decline in the market, subject to which the order was taken, is admissible.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Watts, Judge.

Action by the Robert Buist Company against the Lancaster Mercantile Company. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. & R. B. Allison, for appellant.
Green & Hines, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action has been on appeal once before. See 68 S. C. 523, 47 S. E. 978. There were two points decided on that appeal, to wit: (1) That it was the duty of the jury to accept the charge of the circuit judge and return a verdict in accordance therewith, and upon a failure to do so that this court will order a new trial. (2) That where a contract is silent as to whether the shipper of a consignee shall pay the freight on the shipment the presumption of the law is that the consignee will pay the freight of shipment, but that this presumption of law may be rebutted by parol or other testimony that the shipper was to pay freight from the point of shipment to the destination of such shipment. 21 A. & E. Ency. of Law. 1094. Trial de novo was therefore ordered. The new trial took place before Judge Watts and a jury. The verdict was for plaintiff for the sum of $97.40. A motion for a new trial upon the minutes of the court was then made by the plaintiff. After argument the circuit judge refused the motion. Upon entry of judgment, the plaintiff alone appealed.

The following were the exceptions of the plaintiff:

"(1) It is respectfully submitted that the testimony, especially the refusal of the defendant to accept and pay for the potatoes at the price specified in the order (a) for the purchase, all show that the contract was over the freight charge; and the circuit judge having charged the jury that the said order in writing for the purchase raised the presumption that the defendant was bound to pay the freight, unless the defendant by some direct positive proof, parol or written, could show that the plaintiff had agreed to pay said freight, and no such agreement by plaintiff or any authorized agent having been shown, the circuit judge erred in refusing the motion for a new trial.

"(2) The Supreme Court having held at the former hearing in this case that the written order for the purchase raised the presumption that the defendant was liable to pay the freight, unless the defendant could show by parol testimony outside of that order that the plaintiff had positively agreed to pay the freight; and no such parol or other testimony to establish such agreement having been produced, the jury failed to follow the law as given by the circuit judge, it was error in the judge to refuse to set aside the verdict.

"(3) It being admitted that the order in writing for the purchase was sent up, both in the answer and the admissions on the trial, this was an established fact which could not be contradicted; and the presumption of law raised thereby that defendant was bound to pay the freight, and, no testimony having been adduced to rebut this presumption, the circuit judge erred in refusing a new trial.

"(4) Because the circuit judge erred in allowing L. C. Lazenby, who purchased the potatoes, to testify that John Mahan sold him the potatoes delivered in Lancaster, without showing that John Mahan was authorized by the Robert Bulst Company to do so, and to testify before the jury that the order in writing for the purchase of the goods was not the order of the defendant, against the protest of the plaintiff.

"(5) Because the circuit judge erred in allowing L. C. Lazenby to testify before the jury that John Mahan, in making the contract for the purchase, acted as the agent of the Robert Bulst Company, without showing that he was authorized by the plaintiff to make the contract contended for, and without showing that John Mahan was acting within the scope of his authority.

"(6) Because, the circuit judge having ruled on the trial and in his charge to the jury that it was incumbent on the defendant to prove, outside of the written order for the purchase, that the plaintiff, Robert Bulst

Company, had agreed to pay the freight, and that it was incumbent on the defendant not only to prove that John Mahan was the agent of the plaintiff, but also that he was acting within the scope of his authority, and the jury disregarding this instruction, having found a verdict against the plaintiff without such proof, the circuit judge, it is submitted, erred as a matter of law in refusing a new trial.

"(7) Because the circuit judge in his order refusing a new trial erred in holding that the testimony was sufficient to support the verdict, when there was no testimony at all that the plaintiff agreed to pay freight, and no competent testimony whatever to show that John Mahan had authority to bind the plaintiff to pay the freight. The whole testimony in the case shows that John Mahan was merely a soliciting agent for the plaintiff, without authority to make a binding contract, and such was his own testimony.

"(8) Because the written order for the purchase of the potatoes was sent up by the defendant through the mail to plaintiff at Philadelphia for acceptance or rejection, wherein was made no mention of freight charges for transportation; and the defendant having failed to offer, on the trial below, any legal or competent testimony, oral or written, to show that plaintiff or any authorized agent had ever agreed to pay freight charges on the shipment from Philadelphia to Lancaster, S. C.; and these facts having been brought to the notice of the circuit judge when the motion for a new trial was made before him, he, it is respectfully submitted, erred as a matter of law in refusing the motion for a new trial.

"(9) Because the written order of the defendant for the purchase of the potatoes raised the presumption of law that the defendant was to take them at the invoice price and pay for their shipment to Lancaster, unless there was some oral or further agreement between plaintiff or some authorized agent and the defendant to the effect that plaintiff would pay the freight charges; and no legal or competent testimony, parol or written, of any such agreement having been offered in evidence on the trial, the circuit judge erred in not considering this point and in refusing a new trial.

"(10) Because the circuit judge erred in not following the ruling made by the Supreme Court in this case. Robert Bulst Co. v. Lancaster Mercantile Co., 68 S. C. 523, 47 S. E. 978. The Supreme Court held 'that it was competent for the defendant as purchaser to rebut the presumption that he was to pay the freight, and to show by parol testimony that the plaintiff agreed to do so'; and, the circuit judge reviewing the minutes of the trial after the verdict and seeing that no competent parol testimony had been offered at the trial to show that plaintiff had agreed to pay the freight, it is submitted that he erred in refusing the motion for a new trial.

"(11) Because, the circuit judge having ruled and instructed the jury that the onus of rebutting the presumption raised by the written order or contract for the purchase rested on the defendant to show by positive testimony that the plaintiff had agreed to pay the freight on the shipment, and it having been made to appear when the motion for a new trial was made that no such testimony had been offered, the circuit judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

"(12) Because there was no testimony offered to show that plaintiff had authorized John Mahan to make an agreement to deliver the potatoes in Lancaster free of charge, and it was not competent for defendant to prove by the declarations of Mahan that he had such authority. The relation between John Mahan and plaintiff was that Mahan was only a soliciting agent of plaintiff, without authority to make a binding contract, as the provisions of the written order for the purchase of the goods and plaintiff's acceptance of the same and the testimony of John Mahan clearly show. And it is submitted that the circuit judge erred in allowing the defendant to attempt to prove by the witnesses Lazenby, Brown, and Carnes such alleged agency by the declarations of John Mahan, and the plaintiff should have a new trial.

"(14) Because the circuit judge erred in allowing L. C. Lazenby, the general manager of the defendant, and other witnesses in their testimony to disown the very order for the purchase of the goods which the defendant had admitted to have made and sent up, as this was an established fact, not to be contradicted.

"(15) Because there was not a particle of legal or competent testimony to show that Robert Buist Company, plaintiff, ever agreed to pay the freight charges on the potatoes, and the circuit judge would have been justified in directing a verdict at least for the price of the 50 barrels of potatoes and the direct freight on the whole shipment, and he erred in refusing a new trial.

"(16) Because the consolidated order (a) in writing being admitted, and being silent as to who shall pay the freight, and there being no testimony whatever that plaintiff promised or agreed to pay the freight, and the defendant having refused to accept the 75 barrels of potatoes on the sole ground that plaintiff would not deduct the freight charges on the same from the invoice price thereof, the circuit judge could have legally directed a verdict for plaintiffs for the invoice price of 50 barrels of potatoes, with the direct freight on the 75 barrels shipment added; and, this being so, the circuit judge erred in refusing a new trial.

"(17) Because the contract in writing for the purchase being silent as to freight charges raised the presumption that the purchaser was bound to pay the freight, and, the defendant having signally failed on the trial to show by parol or otherwise that plaintiff had agreed to pay the freight, the verdict of the jury was clearly erroneous and not responsive to the instructions of the presiding judge.

"(18) Because, the defendant having accepted and used the 8 barrels of onion sets and beans, being a part of the 50-barrel shipment, and having paid the freight thereon without making any objection, it was a ratification of the contract contended for by plaintiff, and defendant should be made to pay the freight on the entire shipment.

"(19) Because, the defendant having refused to pay the contract price of the potatoes on the sole and only ground that it was not bound for the freight, and the purchaser having testified that the market for Eastern-grown potatoes was higher at the time of the shipment than it was at the time the purchase was made, the defendant should be confined to the issue made as to who should pay the freight, and not be allowed to contradict itself by making a pretense that it could buy potatoes cheaper, especially as all the testimony showed that the market price had risen.

"(20) Because the circuit judge erred in permitting L. C. Lazenby, the purchaser, to testify that John Mahan claimed to be an agent of plaintiff and that he purchased the potatoes from him, without first proving by some competent testimony that Mahan was an agent and acted within the scope of his authority.

"(21) Because John Mahan was a soliciting agent for plaintiff to take orders to be sent up to plaintiff for acceptance or rejection, and he acted in this instance as the agent of the defendant in sending up the consolidated order; and the circuit judge could very well have instructed the jury that there was no competent evidence offered to prove that John Mahan was authorized to bind plaintiff to pay the freight on the potatoes.

"(22) Because the circuit judge erred in excluding the following testimony of John Mahan, offered in reply, as a part of his deposition, to wit: 'About the time I sent an order from the Kershaw Merchantile & Banking Company, Kershaw, S. C., to [his] house for 25 barrels of same kind of potatoes and at the same price, and the order was accepted, the goods were shipped and were paid for, freight and all, and no question was made about freight; and he was surprised to hear of the objection made by the defendant after their goods were shipped in this case, and they are understood to be run by the same man, only in a different town.'

"(23) Because the circuit judge erred in excluding a part of the depositions of H. C. Stabler, offered in reply, on the same point as that of Mahan's excluded."

It now becomes our duty to pass upon these exceptions. We will do so by grouping them as hereinafter indicated. We might premise our remarks by stating that the sole questions which are presented here relate to the $36 for freight on 50 barrels of potatoes and $108 for freight on 75 barrels of potatoes from Philadelphia to Lancaster and the return thereof from Lancaster to Philadelphia; it being conceded that the plaintiff is entitled to its judgment for $97.40, which sum the defendant has several times tendered to the plaintiff.

1. As to the twenty-first exception: There was a question raised by the testimony, not that John Mahan was a soliciting agent for the plaintiff, but that his authority as such agent was limited. Both parties addressed themselves in their testimony to this question. It was therefore not proper for the circuit judge to say to the jury that John Mahan was not authorized to bind plaintiff to pay the freight on the potatoes. This exception must be overruled.

2. As to the twenty-second exception: When the circuit judge excluded the testimony of John Mahan relating to the order he had sent from the Kershaw Mercantile Banking Company, and the order was accepted, and the goods shipped, he did not err. It was no part of the case then before the court, and should have been excluded. This exception is overruled.

As to the twenty-third exception: We might decline to pass on this exception, as it is not complete in itself; but, apart from that, the witness H. C. Stabler resided in the city of Philadelphia, and his testimony related to transactions with other parties who had no possible connection with the defendant here. It was entirely extraneous. There would be no end if, in an endeavor to unravel one transaction with the defendant, the plaintiff, through his witnesses, should endeavor to put in testimony every other transaction of the plaintiff with all its customers wholly disconnected with the defendant. This exception is overruled.

3. We will next notice exceptions 4, 5, 12, 14, and 20, referring as they do to the alleged errors of the circuit judge during the taking of the testimony. When we held, in disposing of the first appeal in this case, that it was competent for the defendant, as purchaser, to rebut the presumption that he was to pay the freight, and to show by parol testimony that the plaintiff agreed to do so, such decision by this court bound both parties to the suit, and therefore, when the second trial came on, it was competent for the defendant to introduce such parol testimony. This he attempted to do by Lazenby, Brown, and Carnes. Each of those witnesses testified that the plaintiff, through his agent, John Mahan, agreed to place the potatoes at Lancaster, S. C., for the prices set up in the order. It is true that the plaintiff was acting through its agent, John Mahan, and it is necessary, when such agency is set up, that the extent of such agency should appear, as is well said by Mr. Justice Jones, in McGhee v. Wells, 57 S. C. 280, 287, 35 S. E. 529,

532 (76 Am. St. Rep. 567): "The power of the agent may be general or it may be special. It is general when the agent is empowered to do a particular thing, or many things, in any way necessary or proper to accomplish the end. It is special when the agent is empowered to do a particular thing, or many things, in a limited way. The jury must determine the character of the agency from the testimony. If general, the principal is bound if the agent exceed his authority, and the other party did not know it. If special, the agent must follow his instruction, else the principal will not be bound." It is useless to multiply quotations of the law on the subject of agency. Now, here is John Mahan, as a stranger to the defendant, solicited orders from such defendant. He disclosed his principal to be Robert Buist Company. He undertook to sell for his principal. He made a contract for the sale by his principal, of the barrels of potatoes in question, at a particular price for each variety sold. He wrote out the order himself, though signing the name of the defendant, and on the order the name of John Mahan appears. The order was dated October 24, 1900. A reply in the following words was received by the defendant: "Philadelphia, Nov. 2, 1900. Lancaster Mercantile Co., Lancaster, S. C.—Gentlemen: We are in receipt of your valued order, through our Mr. Mahan, which we accept, and will forward at the proper time as agreed. Yours very truly, Robert Buist Co." Here we have the agency of Mr. Mahan asserted by himself for the defendant, and validated by the plaintiff itself. The agency of Mr. Mahan, therefore, is established. He was authorized by the plaintiff to sell its potatoes. The sale of the article was for a particular price. Whether the articles so sold were to be free of freight to the defendant was a legitimate part of the agency of sale. Here the testimony diverges. The plaintiff and its witnesses insisting that freight was to be paid by the defendant, but the defendant and its witnesses testify that the plaintiff was to pay the freight. It is therefore a question squarely presented to the jury. These exceptions are overruled.

4. We will next consider the fifteenth and sixteenth exceptions; these two exceptions, complaining as they do of the circuit judge's failure to direct a verdict for the plaintiff. Whenever there is any competent testimony, it is the duty of the judge to submit the issue to the jury. An examination of the testimony shows that there was testimony in this case. Therefore it was not error for the circuit judge to submit the whole issue to the jury. These exceptions are overruled.

5. We will next consider exceptions 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 17, referring as they do to the alleged error of the court in refusing plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The record here discloses that the motion for a new trial was made on the minutes of the court. It is established by repeated decisions in this court that the circuit judge is clothed by law with a wise discretion in disposing of motions for a new trial. This court only grants a reversal of the circuit judge when there is no testimony on an issue holding that in such an event that an error of law arises. A careful perusal shows that there was testimony on all the issues. It was not error for him to refuse the new trial. These exceptions are therefore overruled.

6, 7. We will next pass upon exceptions 18 and 19. We see no error charged against the circuit judge in the eighteenth exception; but, even if there had been, we would feel obliged to overrule the exception. And as for the nineteenth, we will remark that when the plaintiff shipped the 75 barrels of potatoes he made no offer to reduce the price because said potatoes had fallen in the Eastern market. No doubt the jury considered this matter in making up their verdict. These two exceptions are overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be, and is, hereby affirmed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration of the petition for a rehearing, the court is satisfied that no material question, either of law or fact, has been disregarded or overlooked. Hence there is no ground for a rehearing.

It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed, and that the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur be revoked.

(73 S. C. 60)

STATE v. WALDROP.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina, Oct. 23, 1905. On Rehearing, Nov. 9, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS—PROOF OF EXECUTION—NECESSITY.

The execution of a written instrument, introduced merely to prove a collateral fact, need not be formally proven.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1028.]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RATIFICATION OF AGENT'S ACT.

It is not necessary for a principal to be present at the time of the commission of his agent's act in order for him to ratify that act.

3. WITNESSES—RIGHT TO IMPEACH—SURPRISE.

In homicide, the state may be permitted to interrogate its witness as to his evidence at the coroner's inquest, in order to show that the state was taken by surprise by the witness' evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 1096.]

4. HOMICIDE — SELF-DEFENSE — THREATS AGAINST HABITATION.

A threat by deceased to attack defendant's habitation is not a threat against defendant's person, within the law of self-defense.

5. SAME—DEFENSE AGAINST ASSAULT.

A person upon whom a simple assault is made may not stand his ground and take the life of his assailant in order to prevent the simple assault from being carried into effect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 169.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Instructions inapplicable to the evidence in a criminal case are properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1979.]

7. SAME—APPEAL—RESERVATION OF ERROR BELOW.

Where the presiding judge errs in stating the issues raised by the pleadings in a criminal case, it is the duty of accused to call his attention to that fact, if he intends to rely upon the error as a ground of appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2646.]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenville County; Gary, Judge.

John Waldrop was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Indictment against John Waldrop. From sentence on verdict, the defendant appeals on the following exceptions:

"(1) Error in allowing the state to introduce in evidence the contract between D. L. Donald and S. L. Maddox; the said contract not having been proved in the manner required by law.

"(2) In allowing the witness D. L. Donald to testify that he rented the premises in dispute to Mr. Maddox, the deceased, through Mr. Ellison, acting as his agent; the agency not having been proved, and the witness admitting that he was not present at the said time, and there being no proof that the owner of said premises authorized the said Ellison to make the said contract or ratified the same.

"(3) Error in allowing the state to interrogate its witness Seawright as to his testimony at the coroner's inquest, to the effect that, 'just before Mr. Maddox began to undo his overcoat, he said, "I have a written contract for rent of this place in my pocket," and started to put his hand to his pocket to get his contract, and at this time Mr. Waldrop shot him'—it being respectfully submitted that it was not shown that the said witness was hostile, and the state therefore had no right to contradict him or lay the foundation therefor. Again, it was error to allow this testimony taken by the coroner to go to the jury, inasmuch as the defendant was not there at the time, and any statement made therefor, under such circumstances, would not be competent in the trial of this case.

"(4) Error in refusing defendant's sixth request to charge, which was as follows:

"(6) That where a person is assaulted by one who has threatened to kill him, in such a manner as to give him reasonable cause to believe that such threat will be carried out, he is not bound to run and escape in that particular instance, if he would thus increase his danger by encouraging his assailant to repeat the attempt when he will perhaps be less prepared to resist"—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the case, in that the defendant testified that before he fired the first shot the deceased ran his hand into his right overcoat pocket, from which he had seen the deceased just before that time draw his pistol, and at the time the defendant fired the deceased was apparently trying to draw the pistol from the said pocket.

"(5) Error in refusing to charge defendant's eleventh request to charge, which was as follows: '(11) An assault is an attempt unlawfully to apply any, the least, actual force to the person of another, directly or indirectly; the act of using a gesture towards another, giving him reasonable ground to believe that the person using such gesture meant to apply the actual force to his person. A person assaulted under such circumstances is not bound to retreat and thereby escape the assault, leaving the danger still impending and perhaps increased by the very act of retreating'—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the case, in that the defendant claimed that he was assaulted by the deceased at the time he fired the first shot, and his testimony in that regard should have been submitted to the jury under the charge of the court as to what constituted an assault.

"(6) Error in refusing to charge defendant's twelfth request to charge, which was as follows: '(12) That if the deceased had threatened the life of the defendant, and the defendant honestly believed that the deceased intended to carry out the threat by taking his life or doing him some serious bodily harm, and the jury, viewing the circumstances from the standpoint of the defendant at the time of the fatal encounter, conclude as a reasonable man of ordinary reason and firmness he was justified in the belief, then the defendant was entitled to be more watchful and to interpret the acts of the deceased more harshly than he otherwise would have been justified in doing'—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the case, in that the defendant offered testimony to the effect that the deceased had said just previous to the fatal encounter that on the 1st day of January he was going into the house if he had to break the door down with an axe, and whether or not this testimony partook of a threat should have been submitted to the jury.

"(7) Error in refusing to charge defendant's thirteenth request to charge, which was as follows: 'If a person be in the bare possession of a house claiming it as his home, he has a right to protect it against all forcible intrusion offered by any person, except an officer of the law authorized by the order of some court to dispossess him. Ejectment proceedings in some form or other before a civil court is the legal method to test the right of possession to land'—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the case, in that the defendant offered testimony tending to show that he had rented the house in question for the year 1905, and had gone into possession, and that, when ordered to leave the said premises at the time of the fatal encounter, the deceased refused to do so, and made an effort to draw his pistol. In this connection, error in refusing the request because 'the defendant in his narrative of the homicide did not seek to excuse the act in defense of his habitation, but in self-defense'—it being respectfully submitted that the defendant testified as to the facts in connection with the entire transaction, and was entitled to whatever benefits such facts would entitle him to under the law.

"(8) Error in refusing to charge defendant's fourteenth request to charge, which was as follows: 'If a person in the possession of a house order another person to leave the house, then it is the duty of such person so ordered to leave to do so, and to resort to a court of law for the enforcement of any right claimed by such person in the house'—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the facts of the case, in that the defendant offered testimony tending to show that he was in the legal possession of the house in question, and just before the fatal encounter ordered the deceased to quit the premises, which the deceased not only refused to do, but made an effort to draw his pistol in a threatening manner.

"(9) Error in refusing to charge defendant's fifteenth request to charge, which request was as follows: 'If the jury believe that D. L. Donald, as the agent for his wife, the owner of the land mentioned in the testimony, made a verbal contract with the defendant, Waldrop, for the possession of the land for the year 1905, and if the jury believe that said Waldrop went into possession of said land in pursuance of said contract, then such possession would be valid as against the world for the space of one year'—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the facts of the case, in that the defendant offered testimony tending to show that he rented the premises in dispute for the year 1905 from D. L. Donald, the husband and agent of the owner of the said premises, and had gone into possession thereof, and, being in possession, his right to defend his person and his habitation would be much higher and more sacred in the eyes of the law than if he were there as a trespasser.

"(10) Error in refusing defendant's sixteenth request to charge, which request was as follows: 'Delegated power cannot be delegated. If the jury believe that D. L. Donald, as the agent of his wife, the owner of the land, asked J. A. Ellison to assist him in securing a tenant for the year 1905, then J. A. Ellison had no legal authority to make a contract for the lease of the land, and no person could derive any right in said land by any attempted exercise of any such power on the part of J. A. Ellison—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the facts of the case, in that there was testimony tending to prove the facts upon which the said request was predicated.

“(11) Error in refusing defendant’s seventeenth request to charge, which was as follows: ‘While a verbal contract for the future possession of land, so long as it remains executory, cannot be enforced to give the right of possession, yet if the lessee, under such verbal contract, actually go into possession of the land, it is valid to give the lessee a lease in the land for the space of one year as against the world’—the said request containing a sound proposition of law and applicable to the facts of the case, in that it showed defendant’s right, if the jury believed the facts upon which it was predicated, to the occupancy of the said premises and his right to defend his person and the said occupancy as against any person not possessing an equal right.

“(12) Error in charging ‘the defense the defendant has set up is self-defense; it being respectfully submitted that the defendant’s plea was ‘not guilty’ of the charge alleged in the indictment.

“(13) After having charged that the defendant’s plea was self-defense, error in charging that upon the occasion in question the defendant would have to show, among other things, that there was ‘no other probable means of escaping but to shoot,’ and that, if he had failed to prove this, his defense would fall to the ground; it being respectfully submitted that if the defendant was in the lawful occupancy of said house he was not bound to retreat, but had the right to stand his ground and defend his person or his property against any threatened danger.”

McCullough & McSwain, for appellant.
The Attorney General, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The appellant was indicted for the murder of S. L. Maddox, and the jury rendered a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. The homicide took place on the 31st of December, 1904. The defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be set out in the report of the case; and in considering the questions presented by them reference will be made to the exceptions by numbers.

1. First exception: The appellant’s attorneys conceded that the writing was admissible in evidence, for the purpose of showing the contents found in the pockets of the deceased, but contend that it was inadmissible as a contract unless “proved legally.” There was no subscribing witness to the writing, and the objection to the testimony did not specify in what manner it was to be proved. If, however, the defendant intended to object to the introduction of the writing in evidence, unless there was testimony as to the signatures of the parties, still the ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, was not erroneous. It was not the object of the state to prove the contents of the writing further than to show that a contract was entered into between the parties by which the deceased became the lessee of the land for the year 1905. This was a mere collateral fact that did not render necessary formal proof of the execution of the instrument. Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bailey, 324, 23 Am. Dec. 140; Sims v. Jones, 43 S. C. 91, 20 S. E. 905.

2. Second exception: The record discloses the following during the examination of D. L. Donald: “Who owns the Seawright place where Maddox was said to have been killed? My wife. Who manages the place? I do. To whom was it rented for the year 1905? To Mr. S. L. Maddox. By Mr. McCullough: When did you rent it to Mr. Maddox? I rented it through my agent, Mr. Ellison, acting as my agent. Were you there? No, sir. By Mr. McCullough: I ask, then, that your honor strike that testimony out.” The presiding judge ruled that he could ratify the act of the agent, whether he was present or not, and in this we see no error.

3. Third exception: The testimony was intended merely to show that the state was taken by surprise. The conduct of a case must, necessarily, be left in a large measure to the discretion of the presiding judge, and there was no abuse of discretion in this instance.

4. Fourth exception: In refusing the sixth request set out in this exception, his honor, the presiding judge, said: “This request is refused for the reason that, while admitting it to be a correct abstract proposition of law, there is no evidence in the case that would make such a charge applicable.” One witness testified as follows: “Q. Did Mr. Maddox ever tell you his intention about moving any negroes into that house? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he tell you? A. He told me that when New Year’s day came, regardless of who was in there, that he was going to take his axe down there and break the door down, and move in on them.” Another witness testified as follows: “Q. Did you ever hear Mr. Maddox say anything with reference to the place in dispute? A. Yes, sir. Q. When was it? A. It was some time before Christmas. Q. What did he say? A. Well, we were just laughing and talking, me and Mr. Maddox, and I said: ‘It seems that you are going to get in trouble about that place?’ and he said: ‘I think not, but it don’t matter a damn who is in that house when the new year comes, I am going to put Andrew Madison in there.’ Q. Did you state that to Mr. Waldrop before the killing? A. Yes, sir." While this testimony unquestionably tends to prove that the deceased threatened to attack the habitation, there is not a particle of testimony tending to establish threats to take the life of the defendant or to do him any bodily harm. In 1 Arch. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 693, it is said: "If a person, by violence or surprise, attempt to commit a felony upon the person, habitation, or property of another, the latter may repel force by force, and if, in the conflict, he happens to kill the offender, the homicide is justifiable"—thus recognizing the distinction between felonies committed upon the person and upon the habitation. This exception does not involve the question whether a person has the right to defend his habitation, but the question under consideration is whether a threat against a habitation is a threat against the person. In our opinion it is not.

5. Fifth exception: The request set out in the exception was inapplicable to the facts of this case, and its tendency was to mislead and confuse the jury, by seemingly recognizing the doctrine that a person upon whom a simple assault is made is not bound to retreat, but may take the life of the assailant to prevent the simple assault from being carried into effect.

Sixth exception: In refusing the request mentioned in this exception, the presiding judge said: "Refused for the reason that there is no testimony even tending to show that the deceased ever threatened the life of the defendant." This exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the other exceptions.

6. Seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh exceptions: In refusing the requests mentioned in these exceptions, the presiding judge assigned the following reasons: "Refused for the reason that the defendant, in his narrative of the homicide, did not seek to excuse the act in defense of his habitation, but in self-defense. While it may be true that the quarrel or difficulty grew out of a discussion of the right of possession, still there is nothing in the case that would tend to show that the deceased was making any effort to dispossess defendant. On the contrary, the defendant in his testimony states that he invited the deceased to come in." In considering whether the requests were properly refused, it will be necessary to refer to the testimony showing the relation in which the parties stood to each other. D. L. Donald, a witness for the state, testified as follows: "Who owns the Seawright place, where Mr. Maddox was said to have been killed? My wife. Who manages it? I do. To whom was it rented for the year 1905? To Mr. S. L. Maddox. So you did rent it to Mr. Maddox? Yes, sir; when the contract was drawn I was present. When was the contract drawn? I don't remember the date, you have it there.

Do you know Mr. Waldrop? Yes, sir. Did you ever have any conversation with him about renting the place? Yes, sir. At what time? The same day it was rented. The same day Mr. Ellison rented it? Yes, sir. You were not there? I was not there when the trade was made between Mr. Ellison and Mr. Maddox. What day was it you had a conversation with Mr. Waldrop about renting it? I don't remember the date. At that time had you heard that Mr. Ellison had rented the place to Mr. Maddox? No, sir. So you had a conversation with Mr. Waldrop before you knew what Mr. Ellison had done? Yes, sir. So you rented it to Mr. Waldrop? We agreed on the price. What was the contract? We agreed on a contract and he was to come over to my place the next day and sign a written contract. What other things were to go in to that contract? Similar as to what is in that one. What other things did you and Mr. Waldrop discuss? I told him that I would have to have a written contract. What else was to go in that contract, except what was discussed between you and Mr. Waldrop? I don't remember that anything was. And was that to be reduced to writing? Yes, sir. When was it to be reduced to writing? The next day or the day after he was to come to Williston, and we were to reduce the contract to writing. At that time had you heard nothing from Mr. Ellison? No, sir. When did you hear from Mr. Ellison? About a half an hour after that. When did you see Mr. Waldrop after that? This is the first time. Were you ready to execute the contract if he had come? No, sir; I was not. I had learned that Mr. Ellison had rented it to Mr. Maddox, and I wrote him a note to that effect. When? As soon as I could drive to Mr. Moon's. So, if he had come the next day, you would not have entered into the written contract with him? I could not have; Mr. Maddox had a prior claim. The fact is, on that day, as the agent for your wife, you made the contract verbally with Mr. Waldrop, and the contract was to be subsequently reduced to writing? We specified what was to be in the contract." On the evening of the day when said negotiations took place the defendant did some plowing on the land. On the day preceding the homicide the defendant, about dark, moved certain articles of furniture into the house and spent the night there. Wiley Seawright was then in possession and agreed with Waldrop to move away the next day, but there was testimony tending to prove that he had not surrendered the premises to Waldrop when the difficulty occurred. The defendant stated in his testimony that he extended an invitation to the deceased to come into the house. Wiley Seawright testified: "I heard Mr. Maddox say, 'As soon as Wiley gets out, I am going to move Anderson Madison in, and Mr. Waldrop said 'If you have the law to move a damn negro in on me, put me out' and Mr. Maddox said, 'I have the law in my pocket,' and Mr. Waldrop said 'Get out of my house,' and about that time I looked and Mr. Waldrop had his pistol out to shoot, and did shoot, and Mr. Maddox staggered and made for the front door."

It will thus be seen that the testimony tended to show (1) that the deceased had the superior right to the possession of the premises; (2) that, while both the defendant and the deceased were in the actual and peaceable possession, Wiley Seawright had not formally surrendered his right of possession to either; (3) that the deceased did not enter the house as a trespasser, but upon the invitation of the defendant; (4) that, although the deceased was notified to get out of the house, he was immediately shot. Under these circumstances the requests were inapplicable to the facts of this case. State v. McIntosh, 40 S. C. 349, 18 S. E. 1033.

7. Twelfth exception: If the presiding judge erred in stating the issues raised by the pleadings, it was the duty of the defendant to call his attention to such fact, if he intended to rely upon it as a ground of appeal.

Thirteenth exception: This exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the other exceptions.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not participate in this opinion because of illness.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. 8. After careful consideration of the petition herein, the court is satisfied that no question of law or of fact has been either overlooked or disregarded. It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed, and that the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur be revoked.

SEEGERS BROS. v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CLAIMS AGAINST CARRIERS—UNIFORMITY.

24 St. at Large, p. 81, § 2, providing that every claim for loss or damage to property in possession of a common carrier shall be adjusted and paid within a specified time, and if not then paid the carrier should be liable to a penalty, is not unconstitutional as in violation of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution, and a similar clause of Const. S. C. art. 1, § 5.

2. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS.

A finding of a magistrate as to amount of damages, affirmed by the circuit court, cannot be reviewed on appeal, if there is any evidence to support it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chesterfield County; Watts, Judge.

Action by Seegers Bros. against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment reversing the judgment of a magistrate, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

W. P. Pollock, for appellants. Stevenson & Mathison and Edward McIver, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was commenced in a magistrate court for the county of Chesterfield to recover $1.75 for loss or damage to freight, a bunch of bananas, shipped August 31, 1903, to plaintiffs at McBee, S. C., from Columbia, S. C., over defendant's line, and for $50 penalty for failure to adjust and pay the said loss or damage within 40 days, as required by the statute. The magistrate rendered judgment for the whole amount claimed, including the penalty. On appeal to the circuit court, Judge Watts modified the judgment of the magistrate by reducing the amount to $1.75 and costs, holding that the statute imposing the penalty is unconstitutional, under the rule stated in Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666. From this judgment, plaintiffs appeal, and the main question presented is the constitutionality of said statute.

1. The statute in question is entitled "An act to regulate the manner in which common carriers doing business in this state shall adjust freight charges and claims for loss or damages to freight," and was approved February 23, 1903. 24 St. at Large, p. 81. Section 2 of said act, which more particularly concerns the present controversy, is as follows:

"Sec. 2. That every claim for loss of or damage to property while in the possession of such common carrier shall be adjusted and paid within forty days, in case of shipments wholly within this state, and within ninety days, in case of shipments from without this state, after the filing of such claim with the agent of such carrier at the point of destination of the shipment: Provided, that no such claim shall be filed until after the arrival of the shipment or of some part thereof at the point of destination, or until after the lapse of a reasonable time for the arrival thereof. In every case such common carrier shall be liable for the amount of such loss or damage, together with interest thereon from the date of the filing of the claim therefor until the payment thereof. Failure to adjust and pay such claim within the periods respectively herein prescribed shall subject each common carrier so failing to a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every such failure, to be recovered by any consignee or consignees aggrieved in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, that unless such consignee or consignees recover in such action the full amount claimed, no penalty shall be recovered, but only the actual amount of the loss or damage, with interest as aforesaid: Provided, further, that no common carrier shall be liable under this act for property which never came into its possession, if it complies with the provisions of section 1710, vol. 1, of the Code of Laws of South Carolina, 1902."

This section was under consideration in the case of Best v. Seaboard Air Line Railway, 72 S. C. 479, 52 S. E. 223, filed October 20, 1905, in which the question presented was whether an action could be maintained for the penalty alone, when there had been voluntary payment and receipt of the loss or damage before suit, but after the expiration of the time named in the statute. This court held that such action could not be maintained. The court used this language: "The object of the statute was not to penalize the carrier for merely refusing to pay a claim within the time required, whether just or unjust, but the design was to bring about a reasonably prompt settlement of all proper claims; the penalty, in case of a recovery in court, operating as a deterrent of the carrier in refusing to settle just claims, and as compensation of the claimant for the trouble and expense of the suit which the carrier's unreasonable delay and refusal made necessary." Under this view the common carrier is made liable for a penalty only in the event of a refusal to pay a claim for loss or damage to goods while in his possession; the bona fides and justice of the claim being established by a court of competent jurisdiction. The present controversy requires the court to go more fully into the consideration of the purpose of the legislation in question, with a view to ascertain the reasonableness of the classification of common carriers as objects of this particular legislation. Common carriers receive from the state the right to carry on business in the state as such. They are by the state endowed with special powers and privileges—which call for special duties and obligations to the public. It is a duty which a common carrier owes, not only under his contract, but under general law, to promptly and safely deliver goods consigned to him for transportation, and he is liable for all loss or damage to such goods while in his possession, not occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy. The duty to make prompt settlement for loss or damage to goods is but an incident of the duty to transport and deliver safely and with reasonable diligence. The statute in question was designed to effectuate an important public purpose, viz., to compel the common carrier to perform with reasonable diligence the duty which peculiarly appertains to his business as a carrier of freight. The penalty is but a means to that end. Whether the adoption of such means is wise, politic, or adequate, is exclusively a legislative question, for the courts have nothing to do with the policy, wisdom, or expediency of legislation. A statute cannot be declared void unless it manifestly violates some constitutional principle.

This statute is assailed as violative of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and a similar provision in article 1, § 5, of the Constitution of this state. The respondents in argument here, and the circuit judge, relied on the Ellis Case, supra, to sustain the position that the statute is unconstitutional. The Texas statute which was declared void in that case was as follows:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the Legislature of the state of Texas, that after the time that this act shall take effect, any person in this state having a valid bona fide claim for personal services rendered or labor done, or for damages, or for overcharges on freight, or claims for stock killed or injured by the train of any railway company, provided that such claim for stock killed or injured shall be presented to the agent of the company nearest to the point where such stock was killed or injured, against any railway corporation operating a railroad in this state, and the amount of such claim does not exceed $50, may present the same, verified by his affidavit, for payment to such corporation by filing it with any station agent of such corporation in any county where suit may be instituted for the same, and if, at the expiration of thirty days after such presentation, such claim has not been paid or satisfied, he may immediately institute suit thereon in the proper court; and if he shall finally establish his claim, and obtain judgment for the full amount thereof, as presented for payment to such corporation in such court, or any court to which the suit may have been appealed, he shall be entitled to recover the amount of such claim and all costs of suit, and in addition thereto all reasonable attorney's fees: Provided, he has an attorney employed in his case, not to exceed $10, to be assessed and awarded by the court or jury trying the issue." Laws 1889, p. 131, c. 107.

The difference between the Texas statute and our statute is manifest. The Texas statute subjects railway companies to a penalty, when successfully sued "on a claim for personal services rendered or labor done, or for damages, or for overcharges on freight, or claims for stock killed or injured by the train of any railway company," etc. The relation of the railroad company to those who render it services or labor is the ordinary relation of employer and employe, and it may with some reason be said that there is no sufficient ground for making a distinction, such as would compel a railroad company to pay such ordinary claims for services within a given time under penalty, when no such obligation is imposed upon other employers to whom similar services are rendered. So the claims for damages may include claims not substantially different from claims for damages against individuals and corporations generally. So, also, when there was no statute in Texas requiring railroad companies to fence their track against stock, it may be that it would be unreasonable to impose a liability for such acts different from, or greater than, the liability which should attach to the injury of stock by any other person or class. But we venture to say if the Texas statute had been confined to the regulation of some duty which particularly appertains to common carriers as such, and imposed a penalty as a means of securing the performance of that duty, the decision of the court would have been different. The Supreme Court of Texas had considered the statute as a whole, and had declared it was intended to compel the payment of debts. So, considering it as a whole, the court treated it simply as a statute singling out railroad corporations alone, and imposing upon them a penalty for failure to pay certain debts.

In the case of Atchison, etc., Railway Co. v. Matthews, 19 Sup. Ct. 609, 610, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. Ed. 909, the court held that a Kansas statute requiring reasonable attorney's fee for the plaintiff, in a recovery against the railroad company for damages from fire caused by operating its train, did not violate the fourteenth amendment. In the Matthews Case the court reviewed the Ellis Case, and called attention to the fact that the Texas statute was treated as a whole by the Texas court, and was so treated by the Supreme Court of the United States. The court said: "It is true, that the Ellis Case was one to recover damages for the killing of a colt by a passing train. And so it might be argued that the protection of the track from straying stock, and the protection of stock from moving trains, would, within the foregoing principles, uphold legislation imposing an attorney's fee in actions against railroad corporations. We were not insensible to this argument when that case was considered, but we accepted the interpretation of the statute and its purpose given by the Supreme Court of Texas, as appears from this extract from our opinion: 'The Supreme Court of the state considered this statute as a whole, and held it valid, and as such it is presented to us for consideration. Considered as such, it is simply a statute imposing a penalty upon railroad corporations for a failure to pay certain debts.'" The court further said: "So that, according to the interpretation placed upon the Texas statute by its Supreme Court, its purpose was generally to compel the payment of small debts, and the fact that among the debts so provided for was the liability for stock killed was not sufficient to justify us in separating the statute into fragments, and upholding one part on the theory inconsistent with the policy of the state, while, on the other hand, the purpose of this statute is, as declared by the Supreme Court of Kansas, protesting against fire—a matter in the nature of a police regulation." The court further said: "It is the essence of a classification that upon the class are cast duties and burdens different from those resting upon the general public. Thus, when the Legislature imposes on railroad corporations a double liability for stock killed by passing trains, it says, in effect, that, if suit be brought against a railroad company for stock killed by one of its trains, it must enter into the courts under conditions different from those resting on ordinary suitors. If it is beaten in the suit, it must pay, not only the damage which it has done, but twice that amount. If it succeeds, it recovers nothing. On the other hand, if it should sue an individual for destruction of its live stock, it could, under no circumstances, recover any more than the value of that stock. So that it may be said that in matter of liability, in case of litigation, it is not placed on an equality with other corporations and individuals; yet this court has unanimously said that this differentiation of liability, this inequality of right in the courts, is of no significance upon the question of constitutionality. Indeed, the very idea of classification is that of inequality, so that it goes without saying that the fact of inequality in no manner determines the matter of constitutionality. Our conclusion in respect to this statute is that for the reasons above stated, giving full force to its purpose, as declared by the Supreme Court of Kansas, to the presumption which attaches to the action of a Legislature that it has full knowledge of the conditions within the state, and intends no arbitrary selection or punishment, but simply seeks to subserve the general interest of the public, it must be sustained, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas is affirmed.

In the case of Erb, Receiver, v. Morasch, 20 Sup. Ct. 819, 820, 177 U. S. 584, 44 L. Ed. 897, it was held that an exception of a dummy railroad operated by steam, or of an electric railroad, from an ordinance limiting the speed of railroad trains within the city, does not make an unreasonable classification in denial of the equal protection of the laws. Responding to the suggestion that there was testimony that the operation of the street railway was in fact more dangerous than the operation of the railroad in the hands of plaintiff, receiver, the court said: "It is not a question to be settled by the opinion of witnesses and the verdict of a jury upon the question whether one railroad in its operation is more dangerous than another. All that is necessary to uphold the ordinance is that there is a difference, and, that existing, it is for the city council to determine whether separate regulations shall be applied to the two. * * * Given the fact of a difference, it is a part of the legislative power to determine what difference there shall be in the prescribed regulations."

In the case of Fidelity Mut. L. Ass'n v. Mettler, 22 Sup. Ct. 662, 185 U. S. 308, 46 L. Ed. 922, over a strong dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan, in which Mr. Justice Brown concurred, pointing out that the decision was in conflict with the Ellis Case, the court, nevertheless, held that a Texas statute imposing upon life and health insurance companies, upon failing to pay a loss within the time specified in the policy, after demand therefor, a liability to the holder of the policy, in addition to the amount of loss, of 12 per cent. damages and reasonable attorney's fees, did not deny the equal protection of the law to such life and health insurance companies, although such an obligation was not imposed upon other classes of insurance companies or associations. This decision was reviewed in Iowa Life Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 23 Sup. Ct. 133, 187 U. S. 335, 47 L. Ed. 204, and the court expressed satisfaction with the case and its reasoning. In the Mettler Case the court said: "The ground for placing life and health insurance companies in a different class from fire, marine, and inland insurance companies is obvious, and we think that putting them in a different class from mutual benefit and relief associations doing business through lodges, and benevolent associations of the character mentioned in the Texas statute, is not an arbitrary classification, but rests on sufficient reason. The Legislature evidently intended to distinguish between life and health insurance companies engaged in business for profit (and we are not called on to define as to the distribution of such profits), and lodges and associations of a mutual benefit or benevolent character, having in mind, also, the necessity of the prompt payment of the insurance money in very many cases, in order to provide the means of living of which the beneficiaries had been deprived by the death of the insured."

It appears to us that there is even stronger reason for sustaining a classification of all common carriers of freight for legislation with respect to their quasi public duties as such, having also in mind the necessity of the prompt payment of losses sustained by failure to perform said duty, as in many cases such losses represent food, raiment, and other necessities of life. In the case of Farmers' and Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Dabney, 23 Sup. Ct. 585, 189 U. S. 301, 47 L. Ed. 821, the court held valid a Nebraska statute allowing a reasonable attorney's fee to a plaintiff in case of an unsuccessful defense by an insurance company of a suit on a policy of insurance covering real property wholly destroyed by fire. We quote the following from that case as a complete answer to the suggestion of inequality in the case at bar in the classification of common carriers for special legislation of the kind in question, and the suggestion of inequality because the penalty falls upon the common carrier when unsuccessful in the suit, but not upon the claimant when he is unsuccessful in the suit. The court said: "All the grounds relied upon to demonstrate that the statute allowing a reasonable attorney's fee in case of the unsuccessful defense of a suit to enforce certain insurance policies is repugnant to the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment are embraced in the following propositions. First, because it arbitrarily subjects insurance companies to a liability for attorney's fees, when other defendants in other classes of cases are not subjected to such burden; second, because, whilst the obligation to pay attorney's fees is imposed on insurance companies in the cases embraced by the statute, no such burden rests on the plaintiff in favor of the insurance companies, where the suit on a policy is successfully defended; and, third, because the statute arbitrarily distinguishes between insurance policies by allowing an attorney's fee in case of a suit on a policy covering real estate, where the property has been totally destroyed, and excluding the right to such fees in suits to enforce policies on other classes of property, or where there has not been a total destruction of the property covered by the insurance. Each and all of these propositions must rest on the assumption that contracts of insurance, generally considered, do not possess such distinctive attributes as to justify their classification separate from other contracts, and that contracts of insurance, as between themselves, may not be classified separately, depending upon the nature of the insurance, the character of the property covered, and the extent of the loss which may have supervened. But the unsoundness of these propositions is settled by the previous adjudications of this court"—citing cases.

The case of Missouri, Kansas & Texas R. Co. v. May, 24 Sup. Ct. 638, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. Ed. 971, is an interesting and striking case. In that case the court held that a Texas statute imposing a penalty in favor of contiguous landowners against railway companies for permitting Johnson grass or Russian thistle to mature and go to seed upon their road does not deny such railway companies the equal protection of the law. It might be suggested that Johnson grass is a curse or a blessing, according to the view point—a curse as to crops requiring clean cultivation, a blessing when hay is the thing wanted; or it might be suggested that Johnson grass could easily be communicated to the railway company's land or right of way by streams from bottom lands above, or that it might be propagated from seed dropped upon the ordinary highways from wagons hauling such hay, thence to lands adjoining, thence to the railway company's lands, thence to contiguous lands, but no such penalty applies against other carriers, against those in charge of ordinary highways, against a contiguous landowner, in favor of the railway company, or as between contiguous landowners. It will be further observed that the legislation affected the railway company in its capacity as owner or occupant of the land or right of way. But the court was guided in the decision of the case by these sound principles. "When a state Legislature has declared that, in its opinion, policy requires a certain measure, its action should not be disturbed by the courts under the fourteenth amendment, unless they can see clearly that there is no fair reason for the law that would not require with equal force its extension to others whom it leaves untouched. * * * Great constitutional provisions must be administered with caution. Some play must be allowed for the joints of the machine, and it must be remembered that Legislatures are the ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts."

This court, in Simmons v. Telegraph Co., 63 S. C. 425, 41 S. E. 521, 57 L. R. A. 607, held that the statute making telegraph companies liable for mental anguish is not violative of the fourteenth amendment, or article 1, § 5, of the state Constitution, and in Johnson v. Spartan Mills, 68 S. C. 355, 47 S. E. 695, this court held that section 2719, Civ. Code 1902, making it lawful for any corporation, person, or firm to issue, pay out, or circulate for payment for the wages of labor any order, check, memorandum, token, or evidence of indebtedness, payable in whole or in part otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, except upon conditions specified in the act, did not violate the fourteenth amendment, and was upon a reasonable classification, even though it contained a proviso that said section shall not apply to agricultural contracts or advances made for agricultural purposes. In the case of Porter v. Railway Co., 63 S. C. 169, 41 S. E. 108, 90 Am. St. Rep. 670, this court held that the act (22 St. at Large, p. 443) imposing a penalty on common carriers for failure to pay or refuse to pay damages, etc., to freight within 60 days, does not violate those sections of the state and federal Constitutions providing for equal protection to all. This court distinguished that case from the Ellis Case in two particulars, viz.: (1) that the South Carolina statute of 1897 applied to all common carriers, while the Texas statute, condemned in the Ellis Case, was limited to one class of common carriers, railway corporations; (2) that the South Carolina statute was limited to such claims as were peculiarly incident to the business of a common carrier, but the Texas statute was not so limited. The statute considered in the Porter Case was, in Johnson v. Southern Ry., 69 S. C. 322, 48 S. E. 260, held to be repealed by the act of 1903, which is now under consideration. But the principle decided in the Porter Case is just as applicable in the present case. A valid distinction cannot be based upon the difference between a requirement "to pay or refuse to pay" within a given time, as provided in the act of 1897, and a requirement "to pay" within a given time, as required in the act of 1903, for if it be unlawful to require the latter, under penalty, it must also be unlawful to require the former, since no other person or class is required "to pay or refuse to pay" under penalty. The decision rests upon the reasonableness of the classification of common carriers for particular legislation with respect to the performance of their duty as such, thereby subserving an important public purpose within the police power of the state.

From this review of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of this court, we think it is clear that the statute is not unconstitutional.

2. The respondent, in the event of the above conclusions being reached, has, upon notice and exceptions taken, asked that this court consider whether the judgment of the circuit court should not be affirmed upon the ground that the magistrate erred in finding judgment for the penalty, when the testimony showed that the claim filed by plaintiff for $1.75 was made up of two items, to wit, $1.50, the value of the property alleged to have been lost or damaged while in possession of defendant, and 25 cents, freight paid by plaintiffs for same. The magistrate having found as a fact that the amount of the loss or damage was $1.75, as claimed, and this conclusion having been affirmed by the circuit court by sustaining the magistrate's judgment to that extent, we have no power to review or reverse such conclusion of fact, unless there was absolutely no evidence tending to sustain it. It was shown that the cost of the bunch of bananas in Columbia, S. C., was $1.50, and the freight thereon to McBee, S. C., was 25 cents. This was certainly some evidence that the value of the bananas to plaintiffs at McBee was at least $1.75, and that such was the amount of their loss. The magistrate having adjudged the loss to be as claimed by plaintiffs, judgment for the penalty was proper.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the judgment of the magistrate's court is affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not participate in this opinion because of illness.

THOMAS v. GAINESVILLE & D. ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1906.)

STREET RAILROADS—COLLISION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action of a traveler upon a highway against a railway company for damages resulting from a collision between a car of the company and the vehicle in which the traveler was riding, it is error to charge the jury that "the plaintiff's contributory negligence in such a case defeats recovery, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, §§ 219, 220.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Hall County; W. B. Hollingsworth, Judge.

Action by J. A. Thomas against the Gainesville & Dahlonega Electric Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. A. Thomas brought suit against the Gainesville & Dahlonega Electric Railway Company, and alleged that while riding in his buggy in the city of Gainesville the buggy was struck by a car of the defendant, running at a high rate of speed through a crowded portion of the city, no bell having been rung, nor warning of any kind having been given, and petitioner was thrown from his buggy and injured and damaged in the sum of $10,000. The defendant denied the negligence alleged against it, and pleaded a settlement with the plaintiff, alleging that it had paid Thomas and the owner of the buggy $3.75 as a full accord and satisfaction for the injuries to Thomas and to the buggy. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

W. B. Sloan and H. H. Perry, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Dean, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the foregoing facts). One of the grounds in the motion for a new trial complained of the following extract from the charge of the court: "If the plaintiff was guilty of any act of negligence which directly contributed to his injury, or was guilty of any failure of ordinary care on his part, whether the act be a question of only omission to do what he ought to have done under the circumstances or an act of commission in doing something he should not have done and without which the accident would not have happened, then you should go further and apportion the injury; but the plaintiff's contributory negligence in such case defeats recovery, and your verdict must be for the defendant." This charge was erroneous, inasmuch as it instructed the jury that the plaintiff's contributory negligence would defeat recovery, and the verdict, if such contributory negligence were found, must be for the defendant. The instruction should have been qualified by the principles of law as laid down in Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3830, 2322. The charge was in other respects inaccurate, but it is needless to discuss at length these inaccuracies, as they will doubtless be corrected on another trial.

The evidence was of such a character as to authorize the submission to the jury of the question whether the plaintiff had received any amount in settlement of his claim for damages, and whether the receipt, purporting to have been signed by him by his mark, he being an illiterate, was binding upon him. The charge on this subject, which was complained of, correctly set forth the law as laid down in East Tenn., Va. & Ga. Ry. Co.

v. Hayes, 83 Ga. 553, 10 S. E. 350, and was appropriate, for the reason that this was the defendant's theory of the case. But, under the plaintiff's theory, the rule as laid down in Butler v. Richmond & Danville Ry. Co., 88 Ga. 594, 15 S. E. 668, was applicable, and the judge should have instructed the jury on both theories of the case.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

MERCHANTS' & MINERS' TRANSP. CO. v. MOORE & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. TROVER AND CONVERSION—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Any distinct dominion wrongfully asserted over another's property in denial of his right, or inconsistent with it, is a conversion. It is unnecessary to show that the defendant applied it to his own use, if he exercised dominion over it in defiance of the owner's right, or in a manner inconsistent with it. It is in law a conversion, whether it be for his own or any other's use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trover and Conversion, §§ 1, 84.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—DEMAND.

In an action for the recovery of damages on account of a conversion, proof of a demand and a refusal is only required as evidence of the conversion; and, where the conversion is shown by other evidence, such proof is not essential.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trover and Conversion, §§ 58, 60.]

3. CARRIERS—CONVERSION OF GOODS—WRONG DELIVERY.

A carrier is chargeable with a conversion at the instance of the consignee or his assigns if he deliver the goods to any other person; and this is true, notwithstanding the carrier acts in entire good faith, and the wrong delivery is the result of an innocent mistake on the part of another carrier, from whom he received the goods.

4. SAME—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

When a carrier is guilty of a conversion resulting from a wrong delivery, he cannot take advantage of a stipulation in a bill of lading which provides that "claims for loss or damage must be made in writing to the agent at the point of delivery promptly after the arrival of the property, and if delayed more than 30 days after delivery of the property, or after due time for the delivery thereof, no carrier hereunder shall be liable in any event."

5. SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In an action of tort against a carrier for the conversion of goods consigned to the plaintiff, the carrier cannot take advantage of his own wrong in lessening the measure of his liability by invoking a stipulation in a bill of lading that, in the event of loss, the measure of damages shall be the value of the property at the time and place of shipment.

Error from City Court of Savannah; T. M. Norwood, Judge.

Action by Moore & Co. against the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Moore & Co. brought suit in trover against the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company for 301 sacks of oats. An agreed statement of facts was submitted to the court, which, in brief, is as follows: On October 21, 1903, Joseph Gregg shipped from Chicago to Savannah, over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, 301 sacks of oats, consigned to the order of Joseph Gregg, with direction to notify Moore & Co. The bill of lading was issued to Joseph Gregg, who indorsed it and attached it to a draft on Moore & Co. for $579.50, which draft was paid by Moore & Co., who thus obtained the bill of lading. The oats were billed to Moore & Co. for $699.83; the freight being $112.80, and brokerage $7.53. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company transported the oats to Baltimore, and there delivered them to the defendant, but by an error delivered them upon a waybill directing delivery to Ganahl & Saussey, at Jacksonville, Fla. The defendant brought the oats to Savannah, where they were recognized by a clerk of Moore & Co. as the shipment for which Moore & Co. had received the bill of lading. Moore & Co. so notified the defendant, but, pending an investigation, the defendant delivered the oats to the Seaboard Air Line Railway, to be carried to Jacksonville, as per waybill.

Garrard & Meldrim, for plaintiff in error.
Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. The foregoing statement of facts makes out a clear case of conversion upon the part of the Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company. That it acted in good faith in delivering the oats in accordance with the direction of its principal, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, is no defense against the true owner of the property. "An agent who, for and in behalf of his principal, takes the property of another without the latter's consent, is, as to him, guilty of a conversion, although, being ignorant of the true owner's title, the agent may have acted in perfect good faith; and such agent may be sued in trover for the property, even after his delivery of it to his principal." Miller v. Wilson, 98 Ga. 567, 25 S. E. 578, 58 Am. St. Rep. 319, approved in Flannery v. Harley, 117 Ga. 485, 43 S. E. 765. Nor do we think in such a case a demand is necessary before the institution of suit. In Miller v. Wilson, supra, Chief Justice Simmons says: "When an actual conversion is shown, no demand is necessary; evidence of demand and refusal being required only as evidence of a conversion." See, also, Rushin v. Tharpe, 88 Ga. 782, 15 S. E. 830.

But it is claimed that a demand is necessary in the case at bar by reason of a stipulation in the bill of lading that "claims for loss or damage must be made in writing to the agent at the point of delivery promptly after the arrival of the property, and if delayed for more than 30 days after delivery of the property, or after due time for the delivery thereof, no carrier hereunder shall be liable in any event." A suit in trover is not an action for loss or damage to property, but an action for conversion of property. The conversion on the part of the carrier is an abandonment by it of its contract of shipment. It cannot repudiate this contract and then hold the shipper to its terms. Further, we do not think the terms of the contract cover such eventuality. It was never contemplated by either party that a claim for damages should be presented to the carrier for the result of its voluntary act. It was the purpose of the contract to provide a procedure for the adjustment of damage suffered by reason of some occurrence for which the carrier was liable, but which it did not willfully bring about. There would be no reason in demanding that a claim be presented for damages flowing from an act which by its very commission denies any right in the claimant.

For the same reasons, a stipulation in the bill of lading that the amount of any loss or damage shall be computed at the value of the property at the time and place of shipment is not binding upon the plaintiffs in this action. See Savannah Ry. Co. v. Sloat, 93 Ga. 803, 20 S. E. 219; G. S. & F. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 121 Ga. 233, 48 S. E. 807; Central Ry. Co. v. Chicago Portrait Co., 122 Ga. 11, 49 S. E. 727.

The plaintiffs elected to demand a verdict for damages alone, and were entitled to the highest proved value of the property converted, between the date of conversion and the date of the trial. Civ. Code 1895, § 3917. See Holmes v. Langston, 110 Ga. 866, 36 S. E. 251, and citations. The verdict rendered gives this amount to the plaintiffs after deducting what would have been the freight charges.

No sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment, and it is accordingly affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO. v. PEYTON.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—ERECTION OF TELEGRAPH LINE—DAMAGES.

In a proceeding to assess damages flowing to a landowner by reason of the construction across his premises of a telegraph line under the power of eminent domain, compensation may be awarded both for the land actually taken by the telegraph company and for all consequential damages arising from the erection and maintenance of its poles, wires, or other fixtures; but, before a recovery can be had for consequential damages, proof must be adduced which discloses the nature and extent thereof and furnishes data from which a reasonable and proper estimate of the amount of compensation to which the landowner is entitled may be made.

2. SAME—AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.

The verdict returned by the jury in the present case was excessive; there being no evidence authorizing a recovery of consequential damages, and the amount awarded being far above the highest proved value of the land actually appropriated by the telegraph company.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by John T. Peyton against the Postal Telegraph Cable Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Postal Telegraph Cable Company instituted condemnation proceedings against John T. Peyton for the purpose of acquiring the right to construct one of its lines over a tract of land in Habersham county, of which he was the owner. In the notice served upon him the statement was made that "the said Postal Telegraph Cable Company desires to construct a single line of poles along, upon, and across" the above-mentioned tract of land, by "the erection of poles about 25 feet long, 1 foot in diameter at the base, and planted 5 feet in the ground, with such anchors and guy wires as may be necessary to hold the same firmly in position, with one or more cross-arms, 8 feet in length, fastened near the top of said poles, with insulators thereon, along and upon which will be strung wires sufficient in number to quickly and accurately transmit all messages that may be intrusted to it by the government of the United States to the state of Georgia and their officers and agents and the public. Said poles will be erected about 167 feet apart," and only one square foot of land "will be taken or occupied by each post. Said company will cut and trim out trees, timber, and undergrowth as may be necessary for the construction, maintenance, and operation of said telegraph line, and none other. The land between the poles and under the wires will not be taken by the telegraph company, but can be used hereafter for all purposes" for which the owner may "have heretofore used it, and it will be used by the telegraph company for the purpose only of its agents and employes going thereon in order to construct and keep the same in repair; and only an easement for such right and privilege is desired or will be taken by said telegraph company." An award of $150 in favor of Peyton was returned by the assessor selected to fix the compensation to be made to him by the company. Being dissatisfied with the amount of this award, the company entered an appeal to a jury in the superior court. The jury, upon the hearing in that court, fixed the amount of compensation to be paid at $250. Thereupon the company filed a motion for a new trial, upon the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, etc. The presiding judge declined to grant a new trial, and the case comes to this court upon a writ of error sued out in behalf of the telegraph company.

Felder & Rountree and Howard Thompson, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Jones and J. C. Edwards, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). A jury cannot be left to roam without any evidence in the ascertainment and assessment of damages. The damages which the law allows to be assessed in favor of a landowner whose property has been taken under the right of eminent domain are purely compensatory. The land actually appropriated by the telegraph company amounted to only a fraction of an acre; and, while it appeared that the construction and maintenance of the telegraph line would cause consequential damages to the plaintiff, no proof was offered from which any fair and reasonable estimate of the amount of damages thereby sustained could be made. The jury should have been supplied with the data necessary in arriving at such an estimate. Swift v. Broyles, 115 Ga. 887, 42 S. E. 277, 58 L. R. A. 390. In the absence of this essential proof, a verdict many times in excess of the highest proved value of the land actually taken must necessarily be deemed excessive.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

BREWER, Sheriff, et al. v. AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)
TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS—CHARITIES.

A corporation, organized and conducted purely for charitable purposes, owned real estate and buildings which were used solely in conducting a school. Nominal fees were charged for tuition and board, but the income thus derived fell far short of the expenses of the institution, and the deficit was supplied by donations collected by the corporation. The school yielded no profit, and the corporation declared no dividends, nor were profits or dividends in contemplation in the conduct of either. Held, that the property was exempt from taxation under the provisions of section 762 of the Political Code of 1895.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by the American Missionary Association against A. B. Brewer, sheriff, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

This case comes up on exceptions to the overruling of the defendant's demurrer to the petition. The petition was, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff is a New York corporation, whose sole business, occupation, and purpose is receiving money by donations from charitably inclined persons and distributing the amounts thus received among various charities in which it is engaged in different parts of the United States; its chief charity being that of education. Plaintiff owns certain real estate in Liberty county, Ga., known as the "Dorchester Academy," which is delivered over to one Fred W. Foster for the purpose of operating and conducting a school for the education of negro youths. No profit or income is derived by plaintiff from said school; but, on the other hand, a very large deficit is incurred each year by the person operating it, and this deficit is paid each year by plaintiff. The average attendance of the school during the year preceding the filing of the petition was 415 pupils, and a tuition fee of $1 per student per month was charged. No other sums are derived from or paid on account of the institution, except a small amount for board, which is fixed at $7 per student per month, not more than three-fifths of which is paid in money, the remainder being paid in labor, which is not needed by plaintiff, but which is accepted out of charity and as a part of plaintiff's scheme of teaching, in which self-sustenance and self-reliance are in this manner taught. At the end of each scholastic year, or from time to time as there may be need, the person in charge of the school notifies plaintiff of the difference between the expenditures necessary for the operation of the school and the amounts received from board and tuition, and this deficiency is paid by plaintiff without further recourse upon any one. The deficiency thus incurred will average from $4,000 to $4,500 per year. During no scholastic year has there failed to be a deficiency, and plaintiff has never derived any profit or benefit from the school, save the work accomplished in carrying out its scheme of education. The tax collector of Liberty county has assessed this property for taxation at a designated valuation, and is about to turn over to the sheriff an execution to be levied thereon for the amount of the taxes assessed. The assessment and execution are illegal, in that the property taxed is an institution of purely public charity, "and, further, because all of its buildings were erected for, and are used as, a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning, and none of said property is used either for private or corporate profit or income." The execution is a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and plaintiff is likely to be harassed by many such executions in future, unless the tax collector and sheriff are enjoined from proceeding in this case. Therefore plaintiff prayed for an injunction.

The grounds of the demurrer were: (1) General; (2) that sufficient parties have not been made to entitle plaintiff to the relief sought; (3) that plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law; and (4) that the declaration shows that one Fred W. Foster is conducting a school for profit and income, which school is sought to be released from taxation. By an amendment to the demurrer it was contended that the property claimed to be exempt was not sufficiently described in the petition, and that certain allegations in the petition relative to the ownership and use by the plaintiff of properties in other parts of the United States were superfluous, impertinent, and irrelevant. In the order overruling the demurrer it was stated that the first and third grounds of the original demurrer were abandoned.

Beckett, Norman & Beckett and A. S. Way, for plaintiff in error. Du Bignon & Alston and Adams & Adams, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. (after stating the facts). It is clear that if the decision of this court in the case of Linton v. Lucy Cobb Institute, 117 Ga. 678, 45 S. E. 53, is followed, the judgment in the present case must be affirmed. On the allegations of the petition the case at bar is even stronger than the Lucy Cobb Institute Case, for it is inferable that in the latter case the fees from tuition and board exceeded the actual operating expenses of the school, the excess being applied to repairs and improvements on the school and its buildings; while here it appears that the fees charged are merely nominal and quite inadequate to meet the running expenses of the institution, the deficit being supplied by purely charitable donations. The facts alleged clearly differentiate the case from the cases of Mundy v. Van Hoose, 104 Ga. 292, 30 S. E. 783, and Brenau Association v. Harbison, 120 Ga. 929, 48 S. E. 363. The contention of counsel that it appears that the school is being conducted by Foster for his private gain is not supported by the allegations of the petition; for it is, in effect, definitely alleged that Foster is merely the plaintiff's agent, and that whatever he does in the premises is done for it. It was argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error that the plaintiff below is not entitled to the exemption claimed, because it is a nonresident corporation, whereas, the exemption is allowed only to individuals and corporations domiciled in Georgia; but this contention, even if meritorious, cannot be considered, because it nowhere appears to have been urged in the court below.

The grounds of demurrer which have not been considered in the foregoing discussion were not insisted upon in this court, and therefore will be treated as having been abandoned.

Following the ruling in the Lucy Cobb Institute Case, supra, the judgment of the court below is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

LEE et al. v. GILES et al.

1. TRUSTS — POWERS OF TRUSTEES — PRIVATE SALE — DEED — CONSENT OF BENEFICIARY.

A deed of bargain and sale made by a trustee as such, who has no interest in the premises conveyed otherwise than as trustee, will serve to execute a general power of private sale conferred upon him by the trust deed over the specific property described in his deed, though no reference to the power is therein made. Where the consent of one of the beneficiaries of the trust to an exercise of the power by the trustee is required, it is not necessary that such person should join with the trustee in making the deed, or indorse thereon a written approval of the sale and conveyance; but such consent may be evidenced by a written assent to the sale entered upon an application for leave to sell, presented by a trustee to a judge of the superior court, who, though without jurisdiction to decree a sale of the property independently of the power of sale conferred upon the trustee by the deed of trust, gives his sanction to the proposed sale of the property for the purpose of reinvestment, agreeably to the power of sale conferred upon the trustee.

2. APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — TENDER OF EVIDENCE — WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS.

Although several writings so correlate that all are necessary for the effective consummation of the act sought to be established, each instrument should be separately tendered in evidence, in order that opportunity for inspection and objection may be afforded the opposite party; but their collective tender and allowance in evidence over timely protest is not such an irregularity as will require a new trial, where it appears that all of the papers were admissible, and that the opposite party was given full opportunity to urge his objections to each instrument.

3. BOUNDARIES — EVIDENCE — DEEDS.

Deeds originating from the same grantor, though covering a different tract of land from that in dispute, may be introduced in evidence for the purpose of showing what particular parcel of an entire tract formerly held by him was intended to be conveyed by a deed made to one of the parties litigant, when relevant for this purpose.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by Thomas Lee and Sarah Sheffield against Mrs. John Giles and Andrew Giles. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

A complaint for land was brought in Bibb superior court by Thomas Lee and Sarah Sheffield against Mrs. John Giles and Andrew Giles; the property which was the subject-matter of the suit being described in the plaintiffs' petition as "one and one-half acres of land lying in South Macon, on the new Houston Road; in said county, and bounded as follows: East by the new Houston Road; south by lot recently owned by Thomas Bunkley, now by Avery; west by lot of Mrs. John Giles; north by a street running into the new Houston Road, called — street." Plaintiff alleged that they and the defendants claimed the land under a common grantor, John A. Sloan. The abstract of title set forth was a deed from Sloan to William Lee, as trustee for his wife, Nancy R. Lee, for her life, with a remainder to her children at her death, under which deed William Lee and Nancy Lee went into possession. She died in November, 1900, and plaintiffs were her only children living at the time. The defendants set up title by prescription, growing out of the exclusive and adverse possession for a period of 40 years under deeds duly recorded, and alleged that they had made valuable improvements on the premises, in good faith believing they had the legal title thereto. They also set forth the following facts as matter of defense: The deed from John A. Sloan to William Lee, as trustee for his wife, conferred upon him power to sell the land with her consent, and invest the proceeds in other property. On February 17, 1863, he, as trustee, presented a petition to Hon. Osborne A. Lochrane, judge of the superior courts of the Macon district, praying that an order be passed authorizing him to sell the land and invest the proceeds in other property, subject to the same trust. To this petition was annexed the consent of Nancy R. Lee, and on March 26, 1863, his honor passed an order granting the prayer of the petition, and decreeing a sale of the land to the party therein named as the person to whom the trustee desired to sell at a stipulated price. On the same day William Lee, as trustee for his wife and children, made a deed to the property to Mathew S. Anderson, the proposed purchaser just referred to, which deed was properly recorded on May 1, 1863. The defendants averred that the sale and conveyance to him was an execution of the power of sale conferred upon the trustee by the deed from John A. Sloan, and passed title out of the trustee and Nancy R. Lee and her children, and into Mathew S. Anderson, whose grantees are entitled to hold the property as against the plaintiffs, the children of Nancy R. Lee. On the trial of the case the petition by William W. Lee, as trustee for Nancy R. Lee and children, for leave to sell the trust property, together with the accompanying written consent of Nancy R. Lee to the proposed sale and reinvestment, and the order passed by the judge of the superior court granting the prayer of the petition, were introduced in evidence. This order contained the recitation that leave was granted to the trustee to sell the land described in his petition, "it appearing by the deed hereto attached that said William Lee has power to sell with the consent of the said Nancy." His conveyance, executed on the same day, which was also offered in evidence, recited that it was an indenture made "between William Lee, trustee, of the county of Bibb, of the one part, and Mathew S. Anderson, of the same county, of the other part, and that 'William Lee, trustee for his wife and children,' had granted and did thereby convey unto Anderson, his heirs and assigns, "all that tract or parcel of land bounded as follows: Joining lands of Bryce on the north, lands of Miller on the south, lands of Daly on the east, and Houston Road on the west; also adjoining lands of Monroe Sheffield, and formerly part of same lot, containing one and one-quarter acre, more or less." The deed was signed: "W. W. Lee, Trustee for Wife and Children." The defendants introduced other deeds, made by Anderson and his grantees, for the purpose of tracing title to the land in dispute into John Giles, in whose will they were named as sole beneficiaries. The plaintiffs relied on the trust deed from John A. Sloan to William Lee. The case was submitted to the jury, and a verdict in favor of the defendants was returned. A motion for a new trial, presented to the court, in behalf of the plaintiffs, was overruled, and exception is taken to the judgment rendered on this motion. It contains, aside from the general grounds directed against the verdict, various assignments of error upon rulings made during the progress of the trial, as well as specific complaints of certain instructions given in charge to the jury.

M. G. Bayne, for plaintiffs in error. M. Felton Hatcher and R. Curd, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The deed of trust from John A. Sloan to William Lee was made on January 7, 1863, and was in all essential particulars identical, as to language and legal effect, with the trust deed which was constructed by this court in Luqure v. Lee, 121 Ga. 624, 49 S. E. 834. The trust covered only the life estate, and the trustee was not clothed with the title to the legal estate in remainder. As to this proposition, counsel for the respective parties entirely agree. The case hinges upon a determination of the question whether or not there was a valid execution of the power of sale conditionally conferred upon William Lee by the deed in which he was named as trustee. It recited that the land therein described was thereby conveyed "with full power to said William Lee, with the consent of the said Nancy R. Lee, to sell said property and invest the proceeds in other property." It did not provide in what manner or by what means the consent of Nancy R. Lee, if procured by the trustee, should be evidenced. It did not even stipulate that her consent had to be in writing. Assent by her, rather than the mode in which she expressed her approval of a sale by the trustee, was the essential thing needed by him to put the power in execution. Her assent was the substance, the form of its expression the mere shadow, of any authority which he could derive from her to exercise the conditional power conferred upon him by the grantor. It was by no means necessary that she should join with him in the execution of any conveyance to the land which he should undertake to make under the power of sale. She might properly, by writing her approval of his act upon his deed, signify her assent to a sale. Dykes v. McVay, 67 Ga. 502. Or she could evidence her consent in other ways equally effective. Writing her assent to a sale for reinvestment upon a petition presented by the trustee to the judge of the superior court with a view to procuring judicial approval of a contemplated sale by the trustee would be altogether a proper mode of expressing her willingness to an exercise by him of the power with which he was clothed. Trammell v. Inman, 115 Ga. 878, 42 S. E. 246. That judicial approval was nonessential would not affect the question whether, in point of fact, the trustee had procured her consent before attempting to sell, though, in the interest of certainty and with a view to establishing a clear title of record, the plan adopted in Headen Case, 92 Ga. 223, 18 S. E. 543, of joining with the trustee in making the conveyance and indorsing upon it assent to and approval of the sale, is much to be commended. While William Lee did not, under the terms of the trust deed, acquire title to the legal estate in remainder, yet it cannot seriously be doubted that the grantor contemplated, in the event of a sale for reinvestment, that the land itself should be sold, and not merely the life estate therein or any estate less than the fee. Headen v. Quillian, 92 Ga. 222, 18 S. E. 543.

We now reach the question whether the deed from Lee, trustee, to Anderson was, under the facts in the record, a good execution of the power conferred on the trustee by the Sloan deed. It will be borne in mind that Lee had no individual interest in the realty. As trustee he was merely the repository of the naked legal title to the life estate, with power to sell the whole property—both the life estate and the estate in remainder—conditional on the assent of his wife. As we have shown, the wife's written consent was indorsed on the application for leave to sell, which not only disclosed the intent and purpose of the trustee, as such, to sell the property, but also that the sale was to be made to the particular individual to whom the sale was actually made. The deed from Lee, trustee, to Anderson made no reference to the power of sale given to the former by the trust deed; but as Lee, the grantor, had no private interest in the land, his deed is to be construed as an execution of the power to sell the land over which the power extended. As was said by Bleckley, C. J., in Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 289, 5 S. E. 43, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420: "Every purchaser of realty for value takes the risk of his vendor being clothed with power to sell at the time of the sale, and by the mode of sale adopted; but he is not bound to know from whence the power is derived, or whether it springs from ownership or by delegation in trust. It is enough that there be authority to sell and convey when and how the sale is made and the conveyance executed. If the vendor actually sell and convey, his intention to do so is manifested, and whether, in his own mind, he means to do it in one character or another, the purchaser need not know nor inquire, provided only that the sale and conveyance be such as the vendor has a legal right to make." No efficacy was imparted to the deed by the order of the chancellor, but that very order expressly recognized the power of the trustee under the trust deed to make the proposed sale. That he was without jurisdiction to decree a sale independently of this power residing in the trustee cannot affect the question whether or not the trustee, acting under the express approval of the chancellor or irrespective of the order passed by him, executed the power agreeably to the terms of the trust deed. To be a good execution of such a power, it is not essential that reference to the power be made in the conveyance, where the grantor has no interest in the land conveyed, save that derived from the instrument creating the power. "If the grantor has no interest in the land, his deed will be insensible and a mere absurdity, if not intended as an execution of the power. Therefore it will be held to be an execution of the power, if it refers to the subject-matter of the power, or describes the land over which his power extends. It will be seen that this last conclusion is a presumption of law. This presumption may be more or less strong, according to all the circumstances of the case and the condition of the property. If all the words of a deed or will can have an effect given to them, and an operation upon property or rights, without being taken as the execution of a power, they will not be an execution of such power. If a man has several powers, and refers to some and not to others, the execution will exclude those not referred to. From these propositions it may be seen why a conveyance of specific property, or a specific devise of property, will generally operate as the execution of a power, if the grantor or testator has no other interest in the property but the power, although he makes no reference to the power in his deed or will." 2 Perry on Trusts, § 511c, quoted in Terry v. Rodahan, supra. The various charges complained of were adjusted to the foregoing propositions, and were not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned.

2. On the trial, counsel for the defendants tendered in evidence, collectively, the application of William W. Lee, as trustee, for leave to sell the land, upon which was indorsed Mrs. Nancy R. Lee's consent, the order of the judge of the superior court, and the deed from Lee, trustee, to Anderson. Objection was made to this collective tender of several documents, and counsel for the plaintiffs invoked a ruling of the court that each document be severally offered. Whereupon the court remarked: "I will not treat them as separate instruments. I cannot do that." Error is assigned upon this remark, which was made in the presence of the jury, and on the refusal of the court to require a separate tender of each document. Objection was further urged to the admissibility of the petition and order because the land was not described and the order did not affect the estate in remainder, and objection was made to the deed being received in evidence, on the ground that no consent of Mrs. Lee to the sale of the land appeared from the deed, nor any authority on the part of the trustee to sell. These objections were overruled, and the various documents admitted in evidence. It appeared from the evidence that these papers were found among other papers of J. B. Giles, under whose will the defendants claim as legatees, and that they had the appearance of being glued together at one time. It would have been more regular for the judge to require the separate tender of each of the writings, in order that opportunity for inspecting them and urging objection to each might be afforded the opposite party. But the different instruments so correlated that all were necessary to establish the execution of the power of sale by Lee, as trustee, and it seems that counsel for the defendants did make this objection to their introduction in evidence, and had each of these various objections passed on by the court. Each of the papers was admissible in evidence if offered singly, and their simultaneous tender being only an irregularity, the ruling of the court was not such an error as will require a new trial of the case. The application for leave to sell did, in point of fact, set forth a description of the land therein referred to; and there was no merit in any of the other objections, as has been made to appear from the discussion of the legal questions dealt with in the preceding division of this opinion.

3. Complaint is made that the court erred in allowing in evidence two deeds (one from Sarah M. Sheffield to Reuben C. Wilder, and the other from the heirs of Reuben C. Wilder to Sarah G. Goodyear) purporting to convey an acre of land, and giving as the northern boundary the lands of J. B. Giles, under whom defendants claim title. The objection urged against the admission of these deeds was that they were irrelevant. The land conveyed by the Sloan deed was therein described as containing $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and having certain named boundaries. Prior to the execution of the conveyance to Anderson, under whom the defendants claim that their testator held, W. W. Lee, as trustee, had conveyed to Monroe L. Sheffield one acre of the land described in the Sloan deed. This deed was admitted in evidence without objection. It appeared that Sarah M. Sheffield was the widow of Monroe Sheffield, and that the land described in her conveyance was assigned to her as a year's support, and was the same land conveyed by W. W. Lee, trustee, to her husband. The deeds objected to were relevant. In that from Lee, trustee, to Anderson, the eastern and western boundaries were confused, and the two deeds objected to (one of which was executed by one of the plaintiffs), by the description of the land thereby conveyed, tended to identify the lot of land in dispute as the land described in the deed from Lee, the trustee, to Anderson.

The evidence supports the verdict, and we see no error of law requiring the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

WARNER et al. v. MAXWELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES—ERECTION OF DAM—INJUNCTION.

A riparian owner filed an application for injunction against named individuals, alleging that they were engaged in constructing a dam in a stream below his property which would have the effect of injuring his land by overflow, seepage, and possibly by both. The defendant answered that they were the officers and employees of a corporation in whose behalf the work of construction was being done, and that it was not the intention of the corporation to construct a dam of such a height as that the plaintiff's property would be at all injured. At the hearing there was evidence from which the judge could find that the dam sought to be constructed would have the effect of injuring the plaintiff's property, and an order was passed enjoining the defendants from obstructing the stream. The defendants excepted, and assigned as error that the injunction should have been in such a modified form as to authorize the construction of a dam of such a height as would not injuriously affect the plaintiff's property. Held: (1) As the corporation constructing the dam was not a party to the case and would not be bound by the judgment, the discretion of the judge below in granting the injunction will not be controlled. (2) If hereafter the corporation should see fit to make itself a party to the case, the judge would be authorized, upon a hearing had at its instance, to determine at what height a dam could be erected without injury to the plaintiff's property, and authorize the work of construction of such a dam to proceed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by E. D. Maxwell against A. J. Warner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

E. D. Maxwell brought a petition for injunction against A. J. Warner, John Sargent, and John Yonce, and alleged: Petitioner is the owner of about 50 acres of land on the Chattahoochee river. The defendants are preparing to obstruct said river below petitioner's property at Wilson's Shoals, and the dam proposed to be erected will cause an overflow of said river upon the most valuable portion of petitioner's property, and by seepage and percolation render the bottom land not actually covered by water too wet for cultivation, and unless defendants be enjoined from erecting said dam petitioner will be irreparably damaged, will be forced to bring a multiplicity of suits, and will be greatly harassed and annoyed. It is further alleged that defendants are insolvent. Defendants answered, and set up that they were only the agents and employees of the North Georgia Electric Company, which owned the Wilson Shoals in fee simple, and which proposed to erect the dam sought to be enjoined, and that the height of the proposed dam had not then been determined, but it was denied that any dam would be erected which would cause an overflow to the damage of the plaintiff. Plaintiff introduced in evidence, over objection of defendants, certified copies of a mortgage from the North Georgia Electric Company to the Knickerbocker Trust Company of New York to secure bonds up to $250,000 for erecting a dam upon Wilson's Shoals, pledging the property known as the "Wilson's Shoals Water Power," and a second mortgage between the same parties to secure bonds amounting to $200,000, pledging the Dunlap Shoals. After the introduction of evidence from both sides, the injunction was granted as prayed, and to this judgment, and the ruling of the court admitting in evidence the mortgages above referred to, the defendant excepted.

H. H. Dean, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Perry, G. H. Prior, Saml. C. Dunlop, Howard Thompson, and Fletcher M. Johnson, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the foregoing facts). One acting as the agent or servant of another may plead in justification of a completed act alleged to be trespass that he acted in such a capacity and that the principal or master was authorized to do the act. In a similar way he may justify an act about to be performed or which is to be performed in the future. He cannot, however, bind his principal or master as to the manner of the performance of a future act, or as to its performance at all. He may plead the authority of his principal or master as to any act which the latter would have the right to do in his own behalf, but if the master or principal is not a party to the case he would not generally be bound by a judgment in favor or against the agent or servant. In the present case the defendants are mere officers or employees of a corporation. The corporation is not a party to the case. There was evidence from which the judge could find that a trespass upon the property of the plaintiff was threatened. But it is said that there was evidence that the corporation that owned the property and was constructing the dam did not intend to construct a dam of such a height as that injury would result therefrom to the plaintiff's property, and that the injunction should have been limited so as to prevent those acts which would have resulted in injury to the plaintiff, and permit work of such a character to be done as would have resulted in no injury. If the corporation had been a party to the case and had been before the court, so as to have been bound by its judgment, this would have been a proper judgment to have been rendered. But with the corporation absent, and only officers and employes parties who would be bound to respect the judgment, such defendants were not in a position to complain that the judgment affected the rights of the corporation. Their connection with the corporation might be severed at any time. Other officers, agents, servants, and employes might take charge of the work, and in behalf of the corporation commit the wrongs which the plaintiff alleges were threatened, and might claim immunity from punishment. With the parties before the court at the time the injunction was granted, and under the evidence as it appears in the record, we do not feel justified in interfering with the discretion of the judge in granting the injunction. If the corporation in whose behalf the defendants were acting hereafter sees proper to make itself a party to the case, so that it might be bound by any judgment that might be rendered, the judge would have authority to reopen the case, and at their instance frame an order enjoining the erection of such a dam as would injure the plaintiff's property; that is, if it appear from the evidence to the satisfaction of the judge that a dam of a given height could be erected which would not result in any injury to the plaintiff's property, then an injunction could be granted simply enjoining the corporation from erecting a dam of a greater height than that which the evidence discloses would affect the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the property in the condition in which it now exists. Under the view which we have taken of the case, the rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, even if erroneous, were not of such a material nature as to require a reversal of the judgment.

WOODWARD et al. v. WESTMORELAND et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

HEALTH—STATE BOARD OF HEALTH—POWER TO SUE.

The act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 72), creating the state board of health, not declaring that board to be a corporation, and not conferring upon the board as such, nor its members, the right to sue, no suit can be brought, in the names of the members of the board in alleged representative capacity, relating to matters within the jurisdiction of the board.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Health, § 17.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by W. F. Westmoreland and others against J. G. Woodward and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

W. F. Westmoreland and others, suing in their representative capacity as the state board of health for the state of Georgia, brought a petition for injunction against J.

G. Woodward and others, composing the local board of health of the city of Atlanta, and alleged that on September 2, 1905, the petitioners were informed that yellow fever was prevalent in the state of Louisiana and other states of the United States, and it became the duty of the petitioners, under the act creating the state board of health, to adopt such rules and regulations quarantining the state of Georgia against infected districts as would effectually prevent the spread of yellow fever into this state. The rules and regulations so adopted are set out as an exhibit. It was further alleged that the local board of health of Atlanta "sought to impede, prevent, and destroy" the efficiency of the quarantine declared by the petitioners, and did various acts in defiance of the rules and regulations adopted by the petitioners. They prayed that the defendants be individually, and in their representative capacity as the local board of health of Atlanta, enjoined from interfering with the enforcement of the rules and regulations of the state board of health. A demurrer to the petition was interposed by the defendants upon the grounds that no reasons were shown for granting the relief prayed, that the state board of health is not a corporation, but only an agency, of the state, and, if any right to maintain this petition exists, it must be brought in the name of the state, and by authority of the state; and that the defendants cannot be sued in their representative capacity, but, if any action lies by reason of any acts done by them, it should be brought against the city of Atlanta. An answer was also filed by the defendants, and upon a hearing the injunction was granted as prayed. To this judgment the defendants excepted.

J. L. Mayson and W. P. Hill, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., and J. S. Kilpatrick, for defendants in error.

COBB, P. J. The state board of health was created by an act approved August 17, 1903. See Acts 1903, p. 72. The act declares that a board, to be known as the "State Board of Health," is established "and made one of the public institutions of the state." The number of members constituting this board, the manner of appointment, and their powers and duties are set forth in the act. The board is given supervision of all matters relating to the preservation of the life and health of the people of the state. The act does not in terms declare the state board of health to be a corporation, nor does it provide that the board, as such, or its members, may bring suit. The board is created simply as an agency of the state government, to have supervision and control over all matters relating to the public health. There are always a number of these agencies for the control of certain matters relating to public affairs, and the authority of such agencies, or of the individuals composing the same, to bring suit in behalf of the public, depends upon the terms of the act creating the agencies and defining their limits and powers. If the act creating the board in express terms authorizes suits to be brought by it for the purpose of enforcing the rights of the public which will be subserved by the action of the board, then, of course, the board would have authority to bring suit in its own name, if a name were given to it in the act creating it, or in the name of its members, if there was no name provided in the act in the nature of a corporate name. If the board were declared by the act to be a corporation, and the act was silent as to its right to sue and be sued, the right to sue in behalf of the public in reference to matter within the jurisdiction of the board would seem to be implied. But if the act creating the board does not declare it to be a corporation, and does not in terms authorize a suit to be brought by it or its members, then suits cannot be brought by the members in their individual capacity. Gardner v. Board of Health, 10 N. Y. 409; People v. Supervisor, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 587; Buckstaff v. Oshkosh (Wis.) 66 N. W. 707. As individuals they have no more interest in the matter than other citizens of the state, and their right to sue as individuals would be dependant upon the rules governing the right of other individuals to file suits in behalf of the public. It follows that the members of the state board of health had no right to bring the suit in their individual names, and under the act there was nothing authorizing them to bring the suit in a representative capacity. The demurrer which was filed, raising the objection that the suit was not brought in the names of parties authorized to bring the same, was sufficient cause for a refusal to grant the injunction, and the judgment must therefore be reversed, without reference to the merits of the case, upon the ground that the petition was defective for want of proper parties plaintiff.

The demurrer, so far as it raises the question of parties as to the defendants, was not well taken. The theory of the plaintiffs' case was that the defendants, although members of the local board of health, were doing things in excess of their jurisdiction, and it was not an attempt to enjoin a local board of health, but an attempt to enjoin individuals claiming to act in a public capacity, but not authorized to do the acts complained of, and who were therefore ordinary wrongdoers and trespassers. This was the theory of the plaintiff's case, and on the demurrer this must be taken as the truth of the case; the demurrer having been the cause shown against the grant of the injunction. We do not mean to hold that the public would be without a remedy if either individuals or local boards of health should fail to obey the lawful regulations of the state board of health, or interfere with the state board of health in the lawful exercise of its powers. Our holding goes simply to the extent that the state board of health cannot, as such, nor can its individual members, bring suit for the purpose of enforcing its rules and regulations or preventing persons from interfering with them in the discharge of their duties. The Constitution declares that the Governor shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and, although there be no express statutory provision which in terms authorizes the Governor to cause suits to be instituted in the name of the state in matters relating to the public health, under the general powers conferred by the Constitution upon the Governor, and on account of its peculiar relation to the affairs of the state, he has the power to authorize the Attorney General to bring a suit in behalf of the state, either at law or in equity, whenever the interests of the public or of the state would be subserved by an appeal to the courts. It may be that the Attorney General himself, without express authority from the Governor, could bring a suit of this character in the name of the state. In Trust Co. of Georgia v. State, 109 Ga. 746, 35 S. E. 326, 48 L. R. A. 520, Mr. Justice Lewis said: "We are inclined to the opinion that the Attorney General has the power to institute suits necessary to the protection of the interests of the state—in case, for instance, where the state's property is involved, or where public rights are jeopardized, without direction from the Governor." If the Attorney General has this power in reference to mere property rights of the public, how much more should he have it where the public health and safety are involved.

There are numerous boards with varied interests which are creatures of the General Assembly, each of which deals with matters relating to the public interests. Some of them have been declared to be corporations; some have been given the express power to sue; and others, like the state board of health, have not had the power to sue conferred upon them. This silence of the Legislature in reference to the state board of health, as well as a similar silence in reference to other boards that have been created, indicates that there was a legislative intention that, so far as these boards were concerned, the question whether the time had arrived that the public required that an appeal should be made to the courts has to be determined by the Governor or Attorney General, and not by the members of the board itself, and, as there was nothing in the act with reference to the name in which the suit should be brought, that it should be brought by the Attorney General in the name of the state, or possibly by the Attorney General in his representative capacity, as is the practice in some jurisdictions.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

CHAPMAN v. BATTLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. SLANDER—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

Upon grounds of public policy, communications which would otherwise be slanderous are protected as privileged, if made in good faith in the prosecution of an inquiry regarding a crime which has been committed, and for the purpose of detecting and bringing to punishment the criminal. Statements likewise made in the prosecution of efforts to recover property which has been stolen are also protected as privileged communications.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, §§ 118, 130.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

There was evidence to sustain the verdict, and no sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by Sterling Chapman against Amelia Battle. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Sterling Chapman brought suit against Amelia Battle for falsely saying of him the following: "These men (meaning petitioner as one of them) were the robbers who got their money" (meaning the money of Amelia and Mary C. Battle), or other words to that effect. Defendant denied the allegations of the petition, but admitted that she and her sister were robbed, and that during the investigation following she thought she recognized the voice, apparel, and face of the parties committing the robbery, and told officers of the law and parties seeking information concerning them of her suspicions against the plaintiff. She pleaded that this was a privileged communication, made in the performance of a public duty, and made from a bona fide intent to protect her own interests, and was free from malice. The case was tried, and a verdict returned for the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial upon the general grounds, and upon the ground that the court erred in charging as follows: "I charge you, if defendant did make the statement or statements alleged and set out in this petition, and if they were made in connection with a prosecution or contemplated prosecution of the alleged theft, and if she made the statement with a bona fide intent to protect her own property or to prosecute the party for the alleged theft, and in good faith, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything, and a verdict for the defendant should be rendered." The motion for the new trial was overruled, and to this judgment the plaintiff excepted.

L. D. McGregor and S. H. Sibley, for plaintiff in error. E. P. Davis, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. The charge of the court excepted to sets out a correct statement of the law. "Statements made with the bona fide intent on the part of the speaker to protect his own interest in a matter where it is concerned" are deemed privileged communications. Civ. Code 1895, § 3840, subd. 3. The other principle contained in the charge, that statements made in good faith in the prosecution of an inquiry regarding a crime which has been committed, are privileged communications, is in accordance with the ruling of this court. In the case of Ventress v. Rosser, 78 Ga. 539, where the defendant was sued for slander, the slander being his accusation that the plaintiff had committed larceny, this court said: "The declaration sufficiently shows, as does the evidence had on the trial, that the alleged slanderous charge was made in the performance of a public as well as a private duty, both legal and moral; and the jury by their verdicts have found that it was made bona fide. It was therefore a privileged communication." See, also, Newell on Slander and Libel (2d Ed.) 500 et seq.; Townsend on Slander and Libel (4th Ed.) 421 et seq. To hold otherwise would be to raise a barrier between a criminal and detection, and impose a silence upon those whose knowledge might, and often does, lead to the arrest and conviction of the wrongdoer. Where a charge of the character involved in the present case is made against a person, and injury results therefrom, his right of action does not depend solely upon his innocence, but depends upon the motive of the person uttering the charge and the circumstances under which it was made. The law gives an ample protection to a person maliciously or recklessly slandered in such a manner, but does not demand that the charge be sustained to save the accuser from liability for damages.

2. There was evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. RUMSEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1906.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL.

There were no errors of law complained of. The questions as to the negligence of the defendant and the diligence of the plaintiff were peculiarly for the jury. The evidence made a case which was at best close and doubtful. The amount of the verdict indicates that the jury treated the case as one in which an apportionment of damages was proper. As the finding of the jury has been approved by the trial judge, this court will not control his discretion in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Action by P. F. Tye against L. Gaisert. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. H. Lewis, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Burwell, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. In an action brought by P. F. Tye against L. Gaisert the substance of the petition was: H. T. Allen purchased from the Scottish-American Mortgage Company a described parcel of land, giving his notes for the purchase price and going into possession. After the maturity of his notes Allen paid them with money loaned to him by Tye for that purpose, and to secure the loan executed to Tye a transfer of such notes, together with all the interest and title which Allen had in the land. Subsequently Gaisert, with notice of Allen's purchase and without his knowledge, bought the land from the Scottish-American Mortgage Company, entered into possession, and, on demand, refused to pay Tye the amount of money he had loaned to Allen. The prayers were for a judgment for the amount of money so loaned by Tye to Allen and paid by him as the purchase price for the land, and for a special lien on the land for the amount of the money judgment. Copies of the notes and of the transfer referred to were attached to the petition. Each note states that it "is given for rent as per lease contract." A general demurrer was filed to the petition. Plaintiff offered an amendment to the petition, alleging: "Said sums of money so paid by petitioner being a part of the purchase money of said tract of land, the benefit of which was received by said Gaisert in the purchase of said land [by him], and the said Gaisert took title to said land with full knowledge of the terms and circumstances under which petitioner paid said sums of money, and of the contract of H. T. Allen with petitioner." The court refused to allow the amendment, sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the petition. To these rulings plaintiff excepted.

The court did not err in either ruling. It does not appear from the petition that Gaisert was in any way connected with the transaction between Allen and the mortgage company, or with the transactions between Allen and Tye, and therefore we cannot understand how there could be any legal obligation or duty devolving on Gaisert to pay Tye the money which he loaned to Allen for the purpose of taking up the notes which he had given to the mortgage company for the purchase price of the land, although Gaisert subsequently bought the land from the mortgage company with notice of Allen's purchase and without his knowledge. There was not enough in the petition to amend by, and, even if the amendment had been allowed, the petition as so amended would not have set out a cause of action. In view of the allegations of the petition, the general allegation of the amendment, that the sums "paid" by Tye to Allen were part of the purchase money of the land and that Gaisert received the benefit of the same in his purchase, was the mere conclusion of the pleader, and, as we think, an erroneous one. Nor did the fact, set out in the amendment, that Gaisert, at the time he purchased the land, knew of the terms and circumstances under which Tye let Allen have the money, help the case made by the petition.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

C. S. HIRSCH & CO. v. MELDRIM.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1906.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—RELEASE OF SURETY.

An undertaking in writing, whereby one binds himself, as surety, to repay an "advance" to be made to his principal, cannot be regarded as authorizing the latter, and the party invited to make the advance, to enter into an arrangement whereby such party releases his lien on property belonging to the other, thus enabling him to sell it for a sum in excess of the amount of a pre-existing debt he owes to the lienor, to discharge a portion of that debt, and to retain part of the proceeds of the sale in lieu of the advance which the surety authorized to be made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Geo. T. Cann, Judge.

Action by C. S. Hirsch & Co. against P. W. Meldrim. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On May 25, 1903, William Fawcett was indebted to the firm of Charles S. Hirsch & Co. in the sum of $4,000. To secure the payment of this debt, he had previously delivered to that firm an unrecorded deed or lease held by him, covering the timber on what was known as the "Woodstock Plantation," in the county of Chatham. Across the back of this instrument Fawcett had written his name, and had authorized Hirsch & Co. to write above it any transfer or conveyance of the timber that might be necessary. On or about the date above mentioned he negotiated a sale of the timber to the Denton Bok & Lumber Company for the sum of $6,000, but could not convey the title to that company without securing a surrender of the instrument delivered to Hirsch & Co. and getting that firm to release its lien on the timber. Hirsch & Co. declined to surrender this security unless its demand against him was first satisfied. He was not prepared to pay the debt in full, and desired to secure a surrender of the deed or lease upon payment of $1,500 out of the proceeds of the proposed sale of the timber; himself retaining $2,500 of the amount necessary to discharge the indebtedness. Hirsch & Co. would not agree to this arrangement, unless Fawcett furnished other adequate security, and he thereupon procured and delivered to that firm a writing, of which the following is a copy: "Savannah, May 25th, 1903. Messrs. Chas. S. Hirsch & Co., Savannah, Ga.—Dear Sirs: In consideration of your advancing to Mr. William Fawcett twenty-five hundred dollars, to be paid by him out of the proceeds of such lumber as he may ship to you, said payments to be made by the retention by you of twenty-five per cent. of the net sales of such lumber to be applied to the advance of twenty-five hundred dollars, I hereby guaranty the payment by William Fawcett to you of such advance. This guaranty to be limited to November 1, 1903. Respy. P. W. Meldrim." On the faith of this guaranty Hirsch & Co. surrendered to Fawcett the deed or lease held as security for its demand against him, upon the understanding with him that he should sell the timber on the Woodstock plantation, pay the firm $1,500, and retain the balance of $2,500 due to it, out of the proceeds of the sale as an advance of the $2,500 contemplated by the written guaranty signed by Meldrim. Fawcett subsequently sold the timber in accordance with this understanding, received the purchase price, paid Hirsch & Co. $1,500 thereof, and retained $2,500 of the amount so received as an advance from Hirsch & Co. under the terms of their agreement. The timber so sold was located 15 miles from Fawcett's mill, was not being cut by him at the time, and could not have been used by him as long as his mill remained at the place where it was then located. At that time he had the right to cut other timber, which was sufficient to last him till after November 1, 1903, without using the Woodstock timber. At various times subsequent to the sale of that timber Fawcett shipped lumber to Hirsch & Co., and 25 per cent. of the net proceeds thereof was applied to the demand against him, which was in this way reduced to $1,605.81 principal. The payment of this balance of the $2,500 indebtedness was afterwards demanded of both Fawcett and Meldrim, but payment thereof was refused. Fawcett is unable to pay his indebtedness, and has no property out of which the debt can be collected. On October 27, 1904, Hirsch & Co. instituted suit against Meldrim with a view to holding him liable for the payment of the balance of the principal and accrued interest owing by Fawcett; the plaintiff alleging that Meldrim had guarantied payment of an advance to him of $2,500 made by that firm. The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's petition upon both general and special grounds. By way of amendment the plaintiff recited the foregoing facts concerning the circumstances under which the alleged advance to Fawcett was made; and, to meet the defendant's special objection that the petition contained no allegation that the plaintiff had informed him that the guaranty would be accepted and acted on, the following additional allegations were made: Fawcett was a relative of Meldrim, and one of the considerations moving the latter to sign the guaranty was the natural love and affection he bore for his kinsman. He was himself the draftsman of the contract of guaranty, which was in his handwriting, and since its delivery to plaintiff he has never undertaken to secure its return from either the plaintiff or Fawcett. The plaintiff did not request Meldrim to give this guaranty, but he signed it as a volunteer, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, at the request of Fawcett, and the plaintiff neither concealed nor misrepresented anything to Meldrim, had no communication with him with reference to the guaranty, and was under no duty to hold any communication with him. That Meldrim, prior to the sale of the Woodstock timber, had knowledge of the understanding between the plaintiff and Fawcett that $2,500 of the proceeds of the sale should be treated as an "advance" to him, was not claimed by the plaintiff. The court below sustained the general demurrer to the petition as amended, and overruled the special demurrer thereto. Exception is taken by the plaintiff to the judgment in so far as it was in the defendant's favor.

Osborn & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error.
Adams & Adams, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). Inasmuch as no consideration flowed to Meldrim, his liability, if any, would be that of a surety, and not that of a guarantor. Fields v. Willis, 123 Ga. 272, 51 S. E. 230. The contract of suretyship is always one for strict construction. Ordinarily an agreement to become responsible for an "advance" to be made to a third person is to be construed as presupposing that such third person shall receive in money or property the amount to be advanced. The mere release of a lien of property, so as to enable the principal to sell it for cash, is not such an "advance" as is contemplated by such a contract of suretyship. Upon its face the writing declared on in this case indicates that the surety was to become responsible for a new liability of Fawcett to Hirsch & Co., and not for the payment of an existing debt, in whole or in part. Clearly, by this written undertaking, Meldrim expressed a willingness to become bound for an actual advance of money or property, to be collected out of the proceeds of lumber to be shipped to Hirsch & Co., by Fawcett, and therefore did not thereby authorize Fawcett to enter into an arrangement with Hirsch & Co. whereby he would be enabled to deprive himself of property to which he then had the legal or equitable title, and to which Meldrim, as surety, would have the right to look for reimbursement in the event he was required to pay an advance made to his principal. The statement of facts shows that there was no advance in money or property, but only that a lien was canceled, so as to enable Fawcett to sell certain property belonging to him for a sum in excess of the lien, and to pay over to Hirsch & Co. a portion of the proceeds in part satisfaction of an existing debt he owed to that firm.

HOLLINSHED v. WOODWARD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1906.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALE OF REALTY—LIEN OF JUDGMENT.

A private sale by an executor, acting under the authority of the provisions of a will authorizing such a sale, will not divest the lien of a judgment against the executor. This is true, though the debt upon which the judgment was founded was a liability of the estate created after the death of the testator.

2. JUDGMENT—LIEN—TRANSFERS OF PROPERTY SUBJECT TO—EFFECT.

The general rule laid down in Civ. Code 1895, § 5424, that, when property subject to a lien is sold in different parcels by the debtor, the part remaining should be first applied to the payment of the lien, and the parcels should be charged in the inverse order of their alienation, is a rule of contribution among the purchasers, and does not affect the right of the creditor to levy upon any of the parcels subject to his execution.

3. EXECUTION—REFUSAL TO LEVY ON PROPERTY DESIGNATED—EFFECT.

If a levying officer refuses to levy on property pointed out by the defendant in execution, when the same is sufficient to satisfy the execution and is subject to the same, the officer is liable to the defendant in execution for any actual damages he may sustain as a result of a levy upon other property, but the levy upon the other property is not rendered illegal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by one Gano against W. H. Harris. Judgment for plaintiff and execution was levied on certain land, to which W. H. Hollinshed filed a claim. I. T. Woodward, administrator, was made a party in place of plaintiff, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and claimant brings error. Affirmed.

An execution in which Gano was plaintiff and W. H. Harris, executor of H. C. Harris, was defendant, was levied on a described lot of land in Ft. Valley, Ga. W. H. Hollinshed filed a claim to the property so levied on. At the trial I. T. Woodward, administrator, was made a party in place of Gano, deceased. The will of H. C. Harris was introduced by the claimant, which gave authority to the executor to sell and transfer the realty of the estate at his discretion, without order of court. A deed from the executor was then introduced, conveying the property levied on to the claimant, and it was shown that this deed was executed prior to the levy of the execution, but after the record of the execution against the executor. The claimant offered evidence to show that there was in the estate of the testator other property besides that levied upon sufficient to satisfy the execution, and that the executor endeavored to have the sheriff levy upon this other property, but upon direction of counsel for plaintiff in execution the sheriff refused to levy as requested, and the property levied on was sold to claimant for the purpose of discharging a debt due by the estate, and the money received from the sale was so applied by the executor. The court, upon objection, ruled out this testimony. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff in execution, and to this judgment and the judgment ruling out the evidence above set out the claimant excepted.

A. L. Miller and L. L. Brown, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Mathews, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the foregoing facts). When an administrator sells land under a proper order of the court of ordinary, liens thereon are divested and transferred to the fund. Civ. Code 1895, § 3453; Herrington v. Tolbert, 110 Ga. 528, 35 S. E. 687. An administrator cannot sell land without an order of the court of ordinary. Civ. Code 1895, § 3450. A sale by an executor under an order of the court of ordinary will divest the lien of an existing judgment, unless the property is under levy at the time the sale is made. Reed v. Aubrey, 91 Ga. 436, 17 S. E. 1022, 44 Am. St. Rep. 49. In Wright v. Zeigler, 1 Ga. 324, 44 Am. Dec. 656, it was held that, when an executor was authorized by will to sell the property of the testator at private sale for the purpose of paying debts, such a sale would pass a good title to the purchaser, as against the creditors of the estate, provided the purchase was bona fide and without fraud on the part of the purchaser. In this case the question as to whether liens would be divested by such a sale was not involved. In Harwell v. Foster, 102 Ga. 38, 28 S. E. 967, it was held that a sale of land by an administrator or executor under an order of the court of ordinary is in the nature of a judicial sale, but that a sale under authority of a power contained in a will, while legal within the limits prescribed, was in no sense judicial in its character; there being none of the qualities of judicial sanction in a sale by an executor independently of the action of the court adjudicating the necessity therefor. The question involved in that case was whether a claim could be interposed to property which an executor was proceeding to sell under the authority of the will without an order of the court of ordinary. It was held that the statute in reference to claims at judicial sales did not apply to sales of this character. The general rule is that only judicial sales will have the effect of divesting existing liens. In Mutual Loan & Banking Co. v. Haas, 100 Ga. 111, 27 S. E. 980, 62 Am. St. Rep. 317, it was held that a sale under a power in a mortgage would divest the lien of a judgment against the mortgagee rendered after the mortgage had been duly registered. It was said that a sale under such circumstances was the equivalent of a sale under foreclosure by a court of competent jurisdiction. Mr. Chief Justice Simmons in the opinion said: "A creditor of a mortgagor who obtains his judgment subsequently to the execution of a mortgage which has been duly registered takes it subject to the rights of the mortgagee; and, the power of sale being part of the security, he takes it subject to the exercise of that power. His judgment attaches merely to the equity of redemption. He stands in the shoes of the mortgagor, and cannot defeat the exercise of the power any more than the mortgagor himself could." It may be stated as a general rule that neither a living person nor the legal representative of a dead person can by the sale of property divest the lien of creditors of the owner, unless the sale was judicial in its nature, or the circumstances were such that the lien creditor would be concluded by the instrument in which the power of sale was created.

2. The general rule laid down in Civ. Code 1895, § 5424, that, when property subject to a lien is sold in different parcels by the debtor, the part remaining should be first applied to the payment of the lien, and the parcels should be charged in the inverse order of their alienation, is a rule of contribution among the purchasers, and does not affect the right of the creditor to levy upon any of the parcels subject to his execution. The section is merely a codification of Craigmiles v. Gamble, 85 Ga. 439, 11 S. E. 838, which recognizes the rule above referred to as laid down in Barden v. Grady, 37 Ga. 660.

3. A levy is not rendered illegal because the property may be in the hands of one other than the defendant in execution. Benson v. Dyer, 69 Ga. 190. The defendant in execution may point out to the officer the property to be levied upon. Civ. Code 1895, § 5429. But, if the officer violates his duty by refusing to levy on the property pointed out by the defendant, he is liable to him for such actual damages as he may sustain as a result of the officer's conduct. But this will not invalidate the levy. Barfield v. Barfield, 77 Ga. 83. See, also, Thompson v. Mitchell, 73 Ga. 127.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. CITY OF FREDERICKSBURG.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 1, 1906.)

1. LICENSES—POWER TO TAX—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. § 117 [Va. Code 1904, p. cccxxviii], amending existing charters of cities so as to conform to the Constitution; section 168 [p. cclxii], providing that taxes shall be levied and collected under general laws; and section 170, providing that the general assembly may levy license and franchise taxes—do not repeal previously existing special charters of cities which authorize them to levy license taxes, nor require such taxes to be levied solely under a general law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Licenses, §§ 5, 6.]

2. COMMERCE—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A corporation engaged in the sale of oil, which brings its oil from a foreign state into this state, and mingles it with the general mass of property in the state, is not in selling oil in the state, either in original barrels or from wagons, engaged in interstate commerce in such sense as to preclude a city of the state from exacting a license tax from it.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXING POWERS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Neither Code 1887, § 1042 [Va. Code 1904, p. 504], authorizing cities and towns to impose a license tax in addition to the state tax, nor Acts March 23, 1871 (Acts 1870-71 p. 267, c. 187, § 7), authorizing the town of Fredericksburg to require a town license for anything for which a state license may be required, repeals Act March 5, 1821 (Acts 1820-21, p. 133, c. 114, § 7), authorizing the town of Fredericksburg to assess a tax on the inhabitants and on property within the actual limits of a town for the improvement, convenience, and well being of the town.

4. LICENSES — PERSONS TAXABLE — MERCHANTS.

An oil company engaged in the business of refining and distributing oil and selling it to local dealers from tank wagons, and not from a fixed place of business, is not a merchant as that term is generally understood, and cannot, by voluntarily paying a state license as a merchant, prevent the assessment of a specific tax against its business.

5. LICENSES — CONSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS—UNIFORMITY.

In order to sustain a tax under the test of uniformity, it must not lay greater burdens upon one person than are laid upon other persons in the same calling or condition, the tax imposed must be the same on all those in the same business, any difference therein must bear a just and proper relation to an attempted classification, and, in case of a municipal ordinance imposing license or business taxes, it must not discriminate against any business or class of business or against nonresidents or persons engaged in the sale of property produced or manufactured outside the municipality.

6. SAME.

A municipal ordinance which imposes one license tax on corporations transporting oil to the state in bulk, in tank cars, or through pipes for the purpose of distributing the same in the city, and imposes a much smaller tax on persons who sell oil which has been transported to the city for distribution in barrels only, is discriminatory, and violates the constitutional requirement of uniformity.

7. SAME.

A municipal ordinance which imposes a license tax on any person selling oil to merchants in the city, but provides that it shall only apply to a person or corporation producing or manufacturing the oil which it sells, or to a person or corporation who stores oil in stationary tanks and transports the same by tank wagons or in barrels through the streets of the city for the purpose of distribution or delivery to purchasers, is reasonable in its classification of the persons and corporations taxable thereunder, and does not violate the constitutional requirements of uniformity and against discrimination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Licenses, §§ 8, 9.]

Error to Corporation Court of City of Fredericksburg.

Action by the Standard Oil Company against the city of Fredericksburg. There was a judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wm. D. Carter, for plaintiff in error.
St. Geo. R. Fitzhugh, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This is a writ of error to so much of a judgment of the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg as upholds the validity of a license tax of $150, imposed by ordinance of the city upon plaintiff in error, for the year beginning May 1, 1904, and ending April 30, 1905.

The learned judge of the corporation court has in a written opinion, made a part of the record, stated the case fully, and discussed in a very satisfactory manner the principles of law applicable thereto, and we therefore adopt it as a part of this opinion:

"The defendant, the city of Fredericksburg, for the year 1903 levied a license tax of $150 on the plaintiff, under section 54 of its tax ordinance, which is as follows:

"Any person, firm or corporation who shall engage in the business of selling to wholesale or retail merchants in this city kerosene oil or other illuminating oil, shall pay a license tax of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150.00), but this shall apply only to any person, firm or corporation who shall transport such oils in bulk, tank cars or through pipes for the purpose of distributing the same in this city. Any person, firm or corporation who shall engage in the business of selling to wholesale or retail merchants in this city kerosene oil or other illuminating oil, the same having been transported for distribution in barrels only, shall pay a license tax of seventy-five dollars ($75.00.)"

"The defendant for the year 1904 levied a license of $150 against the plaintiff, under section 73 of its license tax for that year, which is as follows:

"Any person, firm or corporation who shall engage in the business of selling or offering for sale to wholesale, or to both wholesale and retail merchants in this city, kerosene oil or other illuminating oil, shall pay a license tax of $150.00. Any person, firm or corporation, who shall engage in the business of selling or offering to sell only to retail merchants in this city kerosene oil or other illuminating oil, shall pay a license tax of $150.00. Any person, firm or corporation, who shall engage in the business of selling or offering to sell to consumers in this city kerosene or other illuminating oil, shall pay a license tax of $150.00.

"But this section shall apply only to any person, firm or corporation producing, refining or manufacturing the oil which it sells or offers to sell, or to any person, firm or corporation who stores its oil in stationary tanks within or outside of the corporate limits of the city, and transports the same by means of tank wagons or in barrels through the streets of the city for the purpose of the distribution or delivery of the oil to purchasers thereof at the place of business of such purchaser."

"For the 1903 license the collector of the city of Fredericksburg levied on a team of the plaintiff in the city of Fredericksburg, and by agreement between city and the plaintiff the plaintiff deposited in the National Bank of Fredericksburg, subject to the joint order of counsel for plaintiff and defendant, the money to pay the license, and the levy was released. Just before this deposit of money the plaintiff filed its motion after due notice in this court for relief from the said 1903 assessment, and its motion was duly docketed on the 20th day of January, 1904. The motion for relief from the 1904 license was similarly served, returned, and docketed on June 25, 1904, and the two motions were continued from time to time at the convenience of the counsel, and were argued and heard together by agreement of counsel on the ——— day of ———, 1904.

"The evidence in each case was the same, and, briefly stated, was that the Standard Oil Company, the plaintiff, buys some crude oil and produces large quantities of crude oil; that it refines crude oil so bought and produced; that this refined oil is shipped by the company in barrels or tank cars to its plant in Fredericksburg, Va., where the same is received; that its plant in Fredericksburg is provided with storage tanks or vats of a large capacity, which vats or tanks are used to receive the oil upon its arrival in Fredericksburg; that its local agent has a line of customers and seeks new customers among the merchants of the city of Fredericksburg; that the oil from these storage tanks is run or pumped into a tank wagon of several hundred gallons capacity, which wagon is drawn by a team; that this wagon is driven by the local agent of the company along its regular route in the city of Fredericksburg; that it will be stopped before the store of a merchant who is denominated a 'regular customer'; that the merchant is asked if he wishes any oil, and if he wants as much as 20 gallons that the agent will draw the same from the tank wagon in cans while the wagon is standing in front of, or near, the merchant's door in the public street, and that the oil in the cans will then be taken by the agent into the merchant's store and emptied into the merchant's can; and that the agent, with his wagon, will proceed from store to store in the like sale or sales of oil; that should any 'regular customer,' when asked if he wished oil, not desire as much as 20 gallons, none will be delivered to him at that time; that payments by the merchants for oil so received are made to the local agent from time to time as demanded; and that the local agent will supply 'new customers' after first receiving their request for oil, and the company or the agent satisfying itself or himself that the 'new customer' is a desirable addition to the number of 'regular customers'; that the company is engaged in the sale of other articles not manufactured by it, but bought or manufactured for it and inducive to a larger sale and consumption of its oils, such as oil stoves and gasoline stoves, etc., and that the company sells the by-products derived from the refining of its crude petroleum.

"Under this state of the facts the company had itself assessed by the commissioner of the revenue of Fredericksburg, acting on behalf of the state, with a merchant's license from the state, and declined to pay the specific tax on a dealer in kerosene and other illuminating oils required by the ordinances set out above.

"The company contended:

"First. That the city has no power under its charter, or under the statute law of Virginia, to levy any such license tax.

"Second. That the ordinance under which the said license tax is demanded is unconstitutional, invalid, and void, because of sections 117, 168, and 170 of the Constitution of Virginia. [Va. Code 1904, pp. ccxxxviii, cclxii].

"Third. That the said license 'is a direct discrimination and contrary to law.'

"Fourth. That the Standard Oil Company cannot be taxed in this state for selling its own product, illuminating oil.

"These contentions are directed against the validity of each license tax, and each and every contention is denied by the city.

"It will be examined in the order set out above.

"The power of the city to levy the licenses in these two cases is denied, because, since the state exacts no such license, and since section 168 of the Constitution provides that the license tax 'shall be levied and collected under general law,' if the city ever had the power under its charter, that power is taken away by section 117 of the Constitution, which amends the charter of the city to conform to section 168 of the Constitution and that such a license could be required only under general law thereto specially authorizing all the cities of the commonwealth to levy such a license tax.

"This contention has been decided against the plaintiff company by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia in Hicks v. Bristol, 47 S. E. 1001, and in Arey v. Lindsey (Va., Nov. 1904) 48 S. E. 889. In this latter case, the court, speaking by Judge Buchanan, says: 'There is no indication of a purpose to repeal existing laws, valid when passed, whether special enactment or otherwise.'

"The manifest purpose of the authors of the Constitution 'was to meet and obviate the evils attending the passage of special acts,' and that 'the Constitution did not intend to abrogate a charter, or any part of it, because it had been passed as a "special act," but only such features of the charter as were in conflict with the Constitution and to forbid special acts in the future.'

"The power of the city to levy this license against the plaintiff is denied because 'the Standard Oil Company cannot be taxed in this state for selling its own property, illuminating oil'; or, according to contention of the plaintiff, because it is engaged in interstate commerce.

"The contention is without merit. No sales are made of property without this state at the time of sale. On the contrary, the property for the sale of which the license is required is, at the time of sale, within the state of Virginia and the city of Fredericksburg, and is in the barrels or tanks of the company, or in its wagons on the streets of Fredericksburg, at the time of the sale. It has become included with the general mass of property of the state, and whether sold in the original barrels or from the plaintiff's wagons may be taxed, so far as interstate commerce is concerned. This question is disposed of by the case of Amer. Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed, 192 U. S. 500, 24 Sup. Ct. 365, 48 L. Ed. 538. See, also, Welton v. State, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. Ed. 347; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 5 Sup. Ct. 1091, 29 L. Ed. 257.

"There being, therefore, no constitutional inhibition against the exercise by the city of any legitimate taxing power it may have in its charter, notwithstanding this charter be a special act, the question is, has the city of Fredericksburg, in its charter, the power to levy the license in question? Is this license discriminatory, and denying the plaintiff the equal protection of the law?

"By its charter, approved March 5, 1821 (Acts 1820-21, p. 133, c. 114), it is provided (section 7) that the mayor, recorder, and common council shall have full power, and they are hereby authorized, to assess a tax on the inhabitants and property within the actual limits of said town for the purpose of repairing streets and such other expenses and charges as to them may seem necessary and proper, and for the improvement, convenience, and well being of the town.

"This section stands unrepealed, unless, as plaintiff contends, it was repealed by act of March 23, 1871 (Acts 1870-71, p. 265, c. 187), which act provides 'that for the better government and well ordering of the town of Fredericksburg. * * *

"Sec. 7. Whenever anything for which a state license is required is to be done in said town, the council may require a town license therefor, and may impose a tax thereon for the use of the town. The council may require, from the person so licensed, a bond with sureties, payable to said town in such penalties and with such conditions as it may think proper and reasonable, and may revoke such license at any time if the condition of said bond be broken.'

"The act of March 5, 1821, confers on the defendant city a general power to tax, similar in its provisions to a like general power conferred upon many cities of the commonwealth by their charters; and it is the opinion of this court that this general power is not repealed or abridged by section 7 of the act of March 23, 1871, as above set forth. This section 7 is but an expression of the general law of the state, similar in its provisions to section 1042 of the Code of Virginia of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 504], which has been the law of the state since 1849.

"As section 1042 has never been held to be a limitation upon the general taxing power of the cities of the commonwealth granted to them in their several charters, so this court will hold that the act of March 23, 1871, similar in its terms to section 1042 of the Code, is not a limitation upon, and to that extent a repeal of, the general power of taxing granted to the defendant city by its charter act of March 5, 1821. Newport News, etc., Railway & Electric Company v. Newport News, 100 Va. 157, 40 S. E. 645; Norfolk v. Griffith Powell Company (Va.) 45 S. E. 889. These recent cases, cited above, hold that a general power of taxation confers upon the municipality all the powers possessed by the state in respect to the imposition of taxes, and the municipality may then impose taxes in its discretion upon all subjects within its jurisdiction and not withheld from taxation by the Legislature, whether they be taxed by the state or not. Frommer v. City of Richmond, 31 Grat. 646, 630, 31 Am. Rep. 746.

"The plaintiff is not a merchant as that term is generally understood, and cannot, by voluntarily paying a state license as a merchant, prevent the assessment of a specific tax against its business. The greater portion of what it sells it does not buy. It has a storage tank and warehouse, it is true, but it has no fixed place of business within the city, a store or shop at which, or from which, it sells its oil. Its sales are made from its tank wagons, and the oil sold is delivered from its tank wagons when, and as, the sales are made. This does not constitute it a merchant within the state law or city ordinance. Brown's Case, 98 Va. 369, 36 S. E. 485; 2 Bouv. L. D. 155; Hirsh Case, 21 Grat. 785; Acts 1899-1900, p. 857, c. 796.

"In Brown's Case, supra, the court says:

'A merchant's license contemplates that the merchant is to have a fixed place of business within a county or city, a store or shop for the sale of goods. This is the common acceptance of the term as given in 2 Bouvier, L. D. 155. The same author defines the word "merchant" in its legal acceptance to mean one whose business it is to buy and sell merchandise, and says that it applies to all persons who habitually trade in merchandise.'

"This court, therefore, holds that the plaintiff is liable for the said license taxes, unless they, or either of them, be invalid because discriminatory, or because they deny to the plaintiff the equal protection of the law.

"If the purpose is within the legal powers of the Legislature and the classification made has reference to that purpose (excludes no persons or objects that are affected by the purpose; includes all persons that are), logically speaking, it will be appropriate, legally speaking, a law based upon it will have equality of operation. Billings v. Illinois, 188 U. S. 97, 23 Sup. Ct. 272, 47 L. Ed. 403.

"The differences must bear a just and proper relation to the attempted classification. Gulf, C. & S. F. Co. v. Ellis, 185 U. S. 150, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666.

"An ordinance requiring dealers in oils to pay a license of $250 per year, and providing that this license shall not apply to dealers handling oils on which the license has been paid, is unconstitutional because there is no reasonable ground for classification. (S. C. 1903) Standard Oil Company v. City of Spartanburg (S. C.) 44 S. E. 377.

"No greater burdens shall be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 924.

"Uniformity must be such as is compatible with the subject-matter, and as to licenses the only uniformity required is that the tax shall be the same on those in the same business. Commonwealth v. Moore & Goodsons, 25 Grat. 958.

"If inequality and want of uniformity in the burthen it imposes are stamped upon the face of the law, the law must be pronounced invalid. Helfrick's Case, 29 Grat. 849.

"Uniformity must be such as is compatible with the subject-matter; and as to the licenses the only uniformity required is that the tax shall be the same on all those in the same business. Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. Newport News, 100 Va. 161, 40 S. E. 645.

"It is not necessary that a statute regulating the sale of goods shall embrace all kinds of property, either personal or real, but it is sufficient if the selection of the articles and property is based on reasonable and just grounds of difference, * * * and applies equally to every citizen and all classes of citizens, and denies to no one a privilege which another is permitted under like circumstances to exercise and employ. 8 Cyc. 1069.

"A municipal ordinance imposing licenses or business taxes must not discriminate against any business or class of business, or against nonresidents, or persons engaged in the sale of property produced or manufactured outside the municipality. 21 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law, 784.

"When tested by these rules, * * * that section 54 of the ordinance of 1903 is either invalid or does not apply to the facts of this case. This section applies by its terms 'only to any person, firm or corporation who shall transport such oils in bulk, tank cars, or through pipes, for the purpose of distributing the same in this city.' If the word 'transport,' in this section, applies to the distribution of oil through the city after the same shall have reached the company's storage tanks, then the section does not apply, because, under the facts of the case, the company did not 'transport,' or carry, the oil about the streets of the city for sale 'in bulk, tank cars or through pipes.' If the words 'transport such oils in bulk, tank cars or through pipes,' refers to the method by which the oil is brought from other places into the city for storage in the company's tanks, then the ordinance must be held to be invalid, because it seems such a classification, or attempted classification, is unequal, not uniform, and the $150 license tax imposed on the sale of it discriminates against the company's business when such a tax, under the language of the section, would not be imposed upon the sale of the oil produced, or manufactured inside the city, or upon the sale of the oil brought into the city in any manner other than in bulk, tank cars, or through pipes. The business sought to be reached by this ordinance is the 'selling to wholesale or retail merchants in this city kerosene or other illuminating oil,' and is not the business of buying and selling oil. The method or manner by which the oil is introduced into the city before a sale can hardly be said to bear a just and proper relation, or, in fact, any relation at all, to the actual sale of the oil after the same shall have been brought into the city and before an actual sale, or offer of the sale, for the same. The business is the selling of oil to wholesale or retail merchants, and the tax of $150 sought to be levied under this section is not placed upon all who sell to retail or wholesale merchants in the city, but is placed only on those who sell to wholesale or retail merchants in the city, and whose oil, which is the subject of the sale, shall have been transported into the city in tank cars or through pipes. Commonwealth v. Moore & Goodsons, 25 Grat. 958.

"This classification rests on no reason of public policy, and there is no substantial difference of situation or circumstances between the oil merchant who sells by wholesale or retail oil not transported into the city in tank cars or through pipes, and the merchant who does sell by wholesale or retail oil that is transported into the city in tank cars or through pipes.

"There is nothing of difference in the two businesses of selling oil, arising from the method by which the oil was transported into the city, that would naturally suggest the justice or expediency of diverse legislation with respect to the classification attempted in this section. Rosenbloom v. State (Neb.) 89 N. W. 1053, 57 L. R. A. 922, and cases cited.

"The ordinance of 1904, when tested by the same rules, is valid and binding. It requires a license of $150 on those engaged 'in the business of selling or offering for sale to wholesale, or to both wholesale and retail merchants in the city, kerosene or other illuminating oil,' and applies 'to any person, firm or corporation who stores its oil in stationary tanks within or outside said corporate limits of the city and transports the same by means of tank wagons or in barrels through the streets of the city for the purpose of distribution or delivery of the oil to purchasers thereof at the place of business of such purchasers.'

"The manner of distribution of oil through the city and the sale of the same through the city 'by means of tank wagons or in barrels,' it appears, is a reasonable classification.

"Certainly this manner and method of the sale and of the distribution imposes greater burdens on the streets of the city than if the distribution were not made by tank wagons or in barrels; and, again, the distribution of oil through the city in the sales thereof from door to door and the running of oil from the tank wagon to the cans for delivery to the stores in itself renders the sale and delivery of oil in this manner more hazardous than otherwise, and the ordinance of 1904 applies alike to all engaged in the same business. Newport News, etc., Railway Company v. City of Newport News, 100 Va. 157, 40 S. E. 645.

"For these reasons, an order will be entered relieving the plaintiff from the license tax assessed against it under the ordinance of 1903, and denying its motion for relief from the license assessed against it under the ordinance of 1904."

As to the power of defendant in error, under its charter, to impose the license tax that plaintiff in error complains of, see, also, Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, 23 Gratt. 464, 14 Am. Rep. 189, where the authority in the city's charter to impose the tax on the license of Ould & Carrington to practice law complained of was, "for the execution of its powers and duties the city council may raise annually, by taxes and assessments in said city, such sums of money as they shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of the same, and in such manner as they shall deem expedient, in accordance with the laws of this state and of the United States."

That the act of March 28, 1871, supra, similar in its terms to section 1042 of the Code, is not a limitation upon, and to that extent a repeal of the general power to tax granted to defendant in error by section 7 of its charter (Act March 5, 1821), or section 1042 of the Code, a limitation upon the general taxing power of the cities of the commonwealth, granted to them in their several charters, see Norfolk v. Norfolk Landmark Co., 95 Va. 564, 28 S. E. 959, and Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, supra.

The fact that only one person, firm, or corporation falls within a class upon which a license tax is imposed does not of itself make the tax amenable to the charge of discrimination.

The judgment of the corporation court is affirmed.

(105 Va. 106)

SWIFT & CO. v. CITY OF NEWPORT NEWS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—ALTERATION OF GRADE OF HIGHWAY.

At common law municipal corporations were not liable to one whose land was not taken for consequential damages arising from the change of grade of a street, although improvements had been made on his lot in conformity to a former grade.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 269, 270.]

2. COMMON LAW—CONTINUANCE IN FORCE.

The common law remains in force in this state, except when changed by statute or the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Common Law, §§ 9-12.]

3. STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — PROSPECTIVE OPERATION.

The Constitution and statutes operate prospectively only, unless the words therein employed show clearly and expressly an intention that they should operate otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 20; vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, § 344.]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — CONSTRUCTION OF CONSTITUTION.

Constitutional provisions in pari materia are, like statutes, to be construed together, and effect is to be given to the policy established by the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, §§ 9, 11.]

5. SAME.

A fair interpretation is to be given to the language used in the Constitution, and the words thereof are to be construed in their common and ordinary acceptation, unless it clearly appears that they were intended to be used in some other sense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 11.]

6. SAME—CARRYING OUT OF CONSTITUTION—SELF-EXECUTING PROVISIONS.

A constitutional provision should never be construed as dependent for its efficacy and operation upon the legislative will, and consequently statutes existing when the Constitution was adopted, inconsistent with its provisions, are nullified by the Constitution, even though legislation may be desirable and valuable for the purpose of defining the right conferred by the Constitution and aiding in its enforcement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, §§ 21-30.]

7. SAME — INFRACTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS—REMEDY.

Under Const. art. 1, § 6, and article 4, § 58 [Va. Code 1904, pp. ccix, ccxxii], which provide in effect that property shall not be "taken" or "damaged" for public use without just compensation, whereas the corresponding provisions of the previous Constitution (article 1, § 8, and article 5, § 14) only provided that property should not be "taken" for a public use, one whose property is damaged for a public use may, in the absence of an existing constitutional or statutory remedy, maintain an appropriate action at common law for the redress of the wrong done him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 233, 694.]

8. EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—DAMAGE OF PROPERTY—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

The old Constitution (article 1, § 8, and article 5, § 14) provided merely that property should not be "taken" for a public use without just compensation. A city was, by Acts 1895-96, p. 80, c. 64, § 29, empowered to grade streets without the payment of consequential damages. It accordingly passed a grade ordinance without making provision for the payment of such damages, but did not proceed to carry out the ordinance until the Constitution of 1902 became effective. The latter Constitution provides (article 1, § 6, and article 4, § 58 [Va. Code 1904, pp. ccix, ccxxii]), that property shall not be taken "or damaged" for a public use without just compensation, and also provides (article 8, § 117 [page ccxxxviii]), that municipal charters are amended so as to conform to all the provisions and restrictions of the Constitution. Held, that the city could not, after the adoption of the Constitution of 1902, carry out its grading ordinance previously passed without compensating property owners whose property was damaged by the change of grade.

9. APPEAL — REVERSAL — FAILURE TO GIVE NOMINAL DAMAGES.

The failure to award nominal damages, unless it be upon a matter which involves the settlement of a right other than the right to recover damages, is not ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 4553.]

10. EMINENT DOMAIN — RIGHT TO NOMINAL DAMAGES—NATURE OF ACTION.

Under Const. art. 1, § 6, and article 4, § 58 [Va. Code 1904, pp. ccix, ccxxii], providing that property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without "just compensation," the gist of an action for damaging property for a public use is a recovery of substantial damages, and not an invasion of a legal right, and consequently nominal damages, as such, are not recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 327-331.]

11. SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Under Const. art. 1, § 6, and article 4, § 58 [Va. Code 1904, pp. ccix, ccxxii], providing that property shall not be taken or damaged for a public use without just compensation, the measure of damages for damaging property for a public use is the depreciation of the property in value when considered in connection with the benefits conferred, and all the items of damage are consequently to be taken together in determining whether the property has been substantially damaged, and there can be no recovery for specific items of damage as such, as for the cost of the improvement in the construction of which the property is claimed to have been damaged, disassociated from other elements of damage and of benefit.

12. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERTS.

In an action for damaging property for a public use, expert opinion evidence is admissible on the issue of whether the property has been enhanced or depreciated in value by the improvement which is claimed to have caused the damage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2341.]

Error to Corporation Court of Newport News.

Action by Swift & Co. against the city of Newport News. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The instructions given by the court were as follows:

"(1) If the jury believe, from the evidence, that at some time after 12 o'clock m. of July 10, 1902, and prior to the institution of this action, the defendant city of Newport News changed, or caused to be changed, the grade of Twenty-Third street in front of the premises of the plaintiff, Swift & Co., and raised the surface and grade of said street about seven inches above the surface and grade as it had theretofore existed, thereby leaving the lot of the plaintiff, and the building thereon, which had been built with reference to the original grade, below grade, and so damaged the property of the plaintiff, they must find for the plaintiff.

"(A) The court instructs the jury that in determining, from the evidence, whether or not the plaintiff has been damaged by the change of grade occasioned by the public improvement made in Twenty-Third street in front of the property, they will take into consideration the benefits, if any, derived therefrom as a whole, and likewise the damages, if any, to the said property, as a whole, and not to any specific part thereof; and if they believe, from all of the evidence, that the market value of the said property was as much immediately after the grade in the street had been so changed as it was immediately before, not knowing it was to be so changed, then they will find for the defendant.

"(B) The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence, that the raising of the grade of Twenty-Third street was occasioned by the city's paving at its own expense the said street in front of the plaintiff's property, and that such improvement of the street did not reduce the market value of said property, you will find for the defendant. By street is meant 'driveway,' not 'sidewalk.'"

Wm. C. Stuart, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Massie, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This action was brought in the corporation court of the city of Newport News by Swift & Co., a private corporation, to recover of the said city damages alleged to have been sustained in consequence of a change in the grade of a street.

The plaintiff is the owner of two lots, with a frontage of 50 feet, on Twenty-Third street, between Washington and Huntington avenues, in said city, upon which is a costly building, used by the plaintiff in the conduct of a wholesale beef and cold storage business, with a branch depot for the distribution of its beef to purchasers. In this building there is a basement, with windows, around which are light shafts which extend into the sidewalk, which basement is used for the operation of an electric motor and other machinery. The building was erected with reference to the then existing grade of Twenty-Third street, and in front of same was laid a granolithic sidewalk. The defendant city determined to pave this street entirely at its own expense, and in order to do so found it necessary to make a slight change in the grade in front of plaintiff's property, and to raise the surface of the street between four and seven inches. This change of the grade of the street was made, and a contract for paving the street in accordance with the new grade was let, prior to the taking effect of the new Constitution of the state, at 12 m., July 10, 1902, and work was begun under the contract on other parts of the street; but the contractors did not reach the point in front of plaintiff's property until shortly after the new Constitution took effect. In front of plaintiff's premises the city put in what is known as a low or "drive-over" curb, which does not extend above the pavement; but the street, when completed, was several inches higher than the sidewalk theretofore constructed by the plaintiff, and thereupon it proceeded to construct another sidewalk, which is 15 feet in width, bringing it up to the surface of the pavement, at a cost of $128.

The declaration filed sets out the foregoing acts on the part of the defendant city as wrongful and unlawful, and alleges injury and damage to the plaintiff's property, and depreciation of its market and rental value to the amount of $400.

Its demurrer to the declaration having been overruled, the city filed its plea of not guilty, and upon the issue joined on this plea the verdict and judgment were for the defendant.

We are asked to review and reverse this judgment because of misdirection of the jury in the giving and refusal of instructions, and because the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence.

At common law, as has been repeatedly held by this court, municipal corporations were not liable for consequential damages, arising from the change of grade of a street, to one whose land is not taken, although his improvements had been made on his lot in conformity to a former grade. Harrisonburg v. Roller, 97 Va. 582, 34 S. E. 523; Home Building, etc., Co. v. Roanoke, 91 Va. 52, 20 S. E. 895, 27 L. R. A. 551, and authorities cited.

It is also well settled that the common law remains in force in this state, except when changed by statute or the Constitution, which operate prospectively only, unless the words employed show clearly and expressly the intention that it should be otherwise. Arey v. Lindsey, 103 Va. 250, 48 S. E. 889; Kesterson's Adm'r v. Hill, 101 Va. 739, 45 S. E. 238; Cooley's Const. Lim. 97.

This action, therefore, can be maintained, if at all, only by reason of some right secured to plaintiff in error by a change of some provision or provisions of the old Constitution of the state found in the present Constitution, as it is not alleged that there has been any legislation, and in fact there has been none, on the subject of damages to private property by public improvements since the present Constitution went into effect. There was no taking of property, and the defendant in error had the power, both at common law and by section 29 of its charter (Acts 1895-96, p. 80, c. 64), to grade and improve streets without the payment of consequential damages.

The provision in the Bill of Rights in the old Constitution (section 8, art. 1) that "all men, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community, have the right of suffrage and cannot be taxed, or deprived of their property for public uses, without their consent, or that of their representatives duly elected," has been changed by adding in the corresponding section of the new Constitution (section 6 [Va. Code 1904, p. ccix]), after the words "or deprived of," the words "or damaged in," so that the provision of the Bill of Rights contained in the present Constitution is that citizens of the state cannot be deprived of or damaged in their property for public uses, without their own consent or that of their representatives, duly elected, etc.

By the change made in section 14, art. 5, of the old Constitution, which contained the provision that the General Assembly should not enact any law whereby private property might be taken for public uses without just compensation, it is now provided (section 58, art. 4, new Constitution [Va. Code 1904, p. ccxxii]), that the General Assembly "shall not enact any law whereby private property shall be taken or damaged for public uses, without just compensation."

Constitutional provisions in pari materia, like statutes, are to be construed together, and effect is to be given to the policy established by the Constitution. To that end, a fair interpretation is to be given to the language used, construing words in their common and ordinary acceptation, unless it clearly appears that they were intended to be used in some other sense. Railway Co. v. Clower's

It clearly appears, we think, that it was the policy of the framers of the present Constitution, in adopting section 6 of article 1, and section 58 of article 4 [Va. Code 1904, pp. ccix, ccxxii], worded in a similar way that the corresponding provisions in the old Constitution were worded, that it should be unlawful thereafter to damage private property for public use without just compensation, just as it was unlawful theretofore to take private property for public use without just compensation.

This change follows similar provisions in the Constitution of West Virginia, adopted in 1872, which were taken from the Constitution of the state of Illinois of 1870, except that the provision in the two last-named Constitutions is a positive statement that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

It was the design of the amendment to our Constitution under consideration to remove an existing mischief, viz., the damaging of private property for public use without just compensation, and a constitutional provision should never be construed as dependent for its efficacy and operation upon legislative will. 6 A. & E. Ency. L. 913, and authorities cited. So that when the provision of a Constitution, as does ours, no less than the provision in the Constitutions of the states of West Virginia and Illinois, forbids damage to private property, and points out no remedy, and no statute affords one, for the invasion of the right of property thus secured, the provision is self-executing, and the common law, which provides a remedy for every wrong, will furnish the appropriate action for the redress of such grievance. 6 A. & E. Ency. L. 913, and authorities cited in note. And all statutes existing when such a Constitution is adopted, or which might thereafter be passed, inconsistent with its provisions, are nullified by such constitutional prohibition, though legislation may nevertheless be desirable and valuable for the purpose of defining the right and aiding in its enforcement. Same authority just cited, and Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 479, 11 Pac. 3.

In People v. McRoberts, 62 Ill. 41, the contention was made that the provision of the Illinois Bill of Rights inhibiting the taking of private property for public use was only prospective, and inoperative without legislative action; but the contrary view was taken, the opinion of the court saying: "The right of property thus intended to be secured cannot depend upon the mere will of the Legislature. The prime object of the Bill of Rights is to place the life, liberty, and property of the citizen beyond the control of legislation, and to prevent either Legislatures or courts from any interference with or deprivation of the rights therein declared and guaranteed, except upon certain conditions. It would be the merest delusion to declare a subsisting right as essential to the acquisition and protection of property, and make its employment depend upon legislative will or judicial interpretation."

It is contended, however, by counsel for defendant in error here, that notwithstanding our Bill of Rights and Constitution provide that an individual cannot be damaged in his property for public use without either his consent or that of his representatives duly elected, and that where the necessary consent is obtained by means of the passage of an ordinance the Legislature (city council) shall not enact any law whereby private property shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, the passage of such an ordinance, pursuant to authority given in the city's charter, without making provision for just compensation, before the time when the Constitution became effective, is a sufficient and legal justification for doing the work on the street upon which plaintiff in error's property abuts, and causing damage thereto without compensation after the Constitution began to operate, and the constitutional provisions relied on do not apply. In other words, that although the ordinance under which the work is done, if enacted at this time, would be unconstitutional, or at least could not be put into operation by doing the work without providing for just compensation, such an ordinance passed before the present Constitution became operative, which was carried into effect after by bringing the street to the grade established by it and inflicting damage upon plaintiff in error's property, is valid authority for doing the work, because when it was passed it would have been lawful to have performed the work without rendering compensation.

To give a city ordinance passed prior to July 10, 1902, the effect here contended for, would, as it appears clear to us, make the constitutional provisions we have under consideration meaningless.

"A law cannot be enforced in a state, no matter when passed, which contravenes the provisions of the Constitution of the state." People v. Maynard, 14 Ill. 419.

The question as to the effect of a new constitutional provision incorporating the word "damage" in the Constitution of Illinois was passed upon by the United States Supreme Court in Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 166, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 31 L. Ed. 638, and the opinion says:

"Touching the provision in the Constitution of 1870, the court [state court] said that the framers of that instrument evidently had in view the giving of greater security to private rights by giving relief in cases of hardship not covered by the preceding Constitution, and for that purpose extended the right to compensation to those whose property had been 'damaged' for public use; that the introduction of that word, so far from being superfluous or accidental, indicated a deliberate purpose to make a change in the organized law of the state, and abolish the old test of direct physical injury to the corpus or subject of the property affected. The new rule of civil conduct, introduced by the present Constitution, the court adjudged, required compensation in all cases where it appeared 'there has been some physical disturbance of a right, either public or private, which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives to it additional value, and that by reason of such disturbance he has sustained a special damage with respect to his property, in excess of that sustained by the public generally.' * * *

"The conclusion there reached was that under this constitutional provision a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained a substantial damage by the making and using of an improvement that is public in its character; that it does not require that the damage shall be caused by a trespass, or an actual physical invasion of the owners of real estate, but if the construction and operation of a railroad or other improvement is the cause of the damage, though consequential, the party may recover. * * *

"Our attention has not been called to, nor are we aware of, any subsequent decision of the state court giving the Constitution of 1870 an interpretation differing from that indicated in Rigney v. Chicago (102 Ill. 64), and Chicago, etc., Rd. Co. v. Ayres (103 Ill. 511). We concur in that interpretation. The use of the word 'damaged,' in the clause providing compensation to owners of private property appropriated to public use, could have been with no other intention than that expressed by the state court. Such a change in the organic law of the state was not meaningless. But it would be meaningless if it should be adjudged that the Constitution of 1870 gave no additional or greater security to private property sought to be appropriated to public use than was guaranteed by the former Constitution."

We have been unable to find a case where it is held that where an ordinance establishing a grade is passed prior to the adoption of a Constitution affording protection against damage in such cases, and no work of grading was done under the ordinance until after the adoption of the Constitution, the plaintiff cannot recover because the grade ordinance was passed before the Constitution became effective. There are, however, a number of cases to be found taking the opposite view, and among them the following: Ogden v. Philadelphia, 143 Pa. 430, 22 Atl. 694; O'Brien v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 589, 24 Atl. 1047, 30 Am. St. Rep. 832; Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, 27 Am. Rep. 779.

In the first-named case, the grade was established on the city plan in 1871, the Constitution of Pennsylvania giving the right of compensation for property damaged for public use was adopted in 1874, and the opinion of the court, after stating these facts and that when the grade of the street was established there was no right of action for consequential damages to property owners says: "But the Constitution of 1874 (article 16, § 8) gave a right to owners to have compensation for property injured, as well as for property taken, by municipal or other corporations in the construction or enlargement of their works. The right of action which this section gives is clearly for the actual establishment of the grade on the lands. The general rule is that the cause or action arises when the injury is complete and this has been uniformly applied to the taking of property for public use, from the case of Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Thoburn, 7 Serg. & R. 411, down to the present day. * * * There is nothing in the constitutional provision which indicates an intent to depart from the general rule under which in the present case, the cause of action could not arise until the actual cutting down or the ground in 1887."

In Johnson v. Parkersburg, supra, a case similar in all essential particulars to this, the grade of the street was adopted before the Constitution of West Virginia of 1872, and the work of grading was done after the adoption of the Constitution. Held, where a city in changing the grade of streets permanently injures private property, and thus infringes the explicit provision of the Bill of Rights that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation, an action lies for the injury, although no statute has ever been enacted for the enforcement of this constitutional provision." The opinion in that case says: "The private right of the individual was secure under the Constitution. That part did execute itself. It contained a positive inhibition on the part of the Legislature to pass any law by which private property could be taken or damaged for public use without compensation."

In the later case of Blair v. Charleston, 43 W. Va. 68, 26 S. E. 341, 342, 35 L. R. A. 856, 64 Am. St. Rep. 837, it is held that "if a street be opened and used upon the natural surface as a grade line, and it is recognized and treated by the city or town as a public street, and owners of lots upon it build with reference to said natural grade line, and it is changed, the city or town is liable to lot owners for damages consequential upon the change of grade, though no grade of the street was ever adopted by the municipality, under section 9, art. 3, of the Constitution. Such natural grade thus became the established grade."

"It is not the making of the paper grade that inflicts the injury, but its application to the ground. It is the direct disturbance of a right which the owner had enjoyed in connection with his property that gives the right of action." See, also, Jones v. Bangor, 144 Pa. 638, 23 Atl. 252.

Upon this branch of the case at bar we are of opinion that under the present Constitution proper acts of the Legislature (or ordinances of the city council) for the purpose of both obtaining the necessary consent and providing just compensation are essential to the act of taking or damaging private property for public use, unless in fact the owner of the property taken or damaged himself consents that it be done and waives compensation. In other words, that the provisions of the present Constitution against the taking or damaging of private property for public use, without just compensation, were self-executing, and repealed and displaced all existing laws inconsistent therewith; and that plainly the charter of defendant in error and the city ordinances, in so far as they authorized the change of the grade of streets, resulting in injury to the property of abutting lot owners, without providing just compensation for such injury, are inconsistent with said provisions of the new Constitution, and are to that extent repealed. Section 117, article 8, new Constitution [Va. Code 1904, p. cxxxviii]; 6 A. & E. Ency. L. 919.

The next question for consideration is, what is the true rule for the measure of damages in a case like this?

It is earnestly insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that, as defendant in error has violated the provisions of the new Constitution which gave plaintiff in error a right of action, it follows that it has suffered damage. In other words, as the action is brought to protect a right secured to the plaintiff in error by the new Constitution, it is at least entitled to recover nominal damages.

If this contention could be maintained, there could never be a verdict for the defendant in such a case, and the great weight of authority is therefore against the contention. "The failure to give nominal damages, unless it be upon a matter which involves the settlement of a right other than the right to recover damages, is not a ground for reversal." Briggs v. Cook, 99 Va. 273, 38 S. E. 148.

The new Constitution has not taken from the cities of the state the right to raise or lower the surface of a street when necessity requires, nor made it dependent upon the will of the parties affected thereby, but only provides that just compensation shall be made for the damage done. Therefore, if no damage has been done, no right has been violated, even though the established grade of the street may have been changed.

It is only in cases where damages are not the gist—that is, in cases of forbidden conduct—that nominal damages can be recovered. Hale on Damages, p. 25; 8 A. & E. Ency. L. 551.

The action here is for just compensation; the gist of the action is for substantial damages, and not an invasion of a legal right; therefore, under the pleadings, nominal damages, as such, are not recoverable.

In Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 438, 13 S. E. 604, the declaration filed was similar to the one in this case, and the opinion says: "Under our view of the pleadings as already discussed, nominal damages, as such, were not recoverable; for the plaintiff did not sue for an invasion or infringement of a legal right, as for a trespass or a nuisance, but for just compensation for damages done to his property."

"Where the suit is for the 'just compensation' guaranteed by the Constitution, the measure of the damages is the depreciation in the value of the property by the causes sued for." 2 Lewis, Em. Domain, § 625. The same author, discussing the rule for measuring the damages of a plaintiff who has suffered loss by reason of a public improvement, in section 494, citing numerous cases, says "The correct measure of damages in all such cases is undoubtedly the diminution in the value of the property by reason of the change. The owner should receive such an amount as will make him whole."

In Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co., supra, the opinion of the court in Springer v. Chicago, 135 Ill. 552, 26 N. E. 514, 12 L. R. A. 600, construing the Illinois Constitution, is quoted with approval as follows: "Where the action is brought to recover damages, where no part of the property is taken, but merely damaged, by a public improvement, the law is well settled that a recovery cannot be had unless the property claimed to be damaged has been depreciated in value by the construction of the public improvement. In other words, if the fair cash value of the property is as much immediately after the construction of the improvement as it was before the improvement was made, no damage has been sustained and no recovery can be had." To the same effect is Blair v. Charleston, supra; Chicago v. Taylor, supra.

In City Council v. Schrameck, 96 Ga. 426, 23 S. E. 400, 51 Am. St. Rep. 146, the same contention was made that is by plaintiff in error here, viz.: that benefits deducted in measuring damages where no part of the property is taken, but merely damaged by a public improvement, must be, as in a case where a part of the property is taken and the action is to recover for damage to the residue, special and peculiar, and cannot include general benefits shared in common with other property in the neighborhood, and that the plaintiff was in any event entitled to recover the costs of adjusting his property to the new conditions brought about by the public improvement; but the court held otherwise and in accordance with the rule sanctioned in the authorities just adverted to; the opinion saying that evidence as to the necessity of filling in the lot and raising the buildings on the lot, with the probable costs of such work was admissible, not as furnishing a reason for the allowance of such costs as an independent item of special damage, but as a circumstance throwing light upon the general question of the diminution of market value.

It is insisted that the rule established for assessing the damages to the residue, where a part of a tract of land is taken, by the decisions of this court before our Constitution was changed by inserting the word "damaged," should be adhered to, and Hickman v. Kansas City, 120 Mo. 110, 25 S. W. 225, 23 L. R. A. 658, 41 Am. St. Rep. 684, is greatly relied on as supporting that view; but while the opinion in that case reaches the conclusion that the change in the Missouri Constitution, made in 1875, by inserting the word "damaged" and coupling it with the word "taken," secured to the property owner the right to compensation when his property is damaged, in the same terms as when it is actually invaded and taken, the later Missouri cases do not follow that view, but approve the rule for the measure of damages, where no part of the property of the plaintiff is taken, that was sanctioned in Stewart v. Ohio R. R. Co., and other cases cited above, viz.: "If the fair market value of the property is as much immediately after the construction of the improvement as it was before the improvement was made, no damage has been sustained, and no recovery can be had."

The opinion by Gantt, P. J., in Grover v. Cornet, 135 Mo. 21, 35 S. W. 1143, citing, among other cases, Markowitz v. Kansas City, 125 Mo. 485, 28 S. W. 642, 46 Am. St. Rep. 498, says: "The measure of damages in such cases has been laid down time and again by this court. It is the difference in the market value of the property before and after the grading, and caused solely by the grading."

The same view is taken in Wolters v. St. Louis, 132 Mo. 1, 33 S. W. 441, citing a number of cases decided by that court after the change made in the Missouri Constitution by inserting the word "damaged" and coupling it with the word "taken," requiring that thereafter "just compensation" should be made for property "damaged" as theretofore had been made for property "taken."

It is, however, further insisted here that the jury should have been instructed as follows: "If the jury find for the plaintiff, in estimating its damages they should take into consideration the diminution in value, if any, of the said plaintiff's property caused by the change of the grade of the street, the peculiar benefits, if any, derived in respect to this particular property, not in common with the property of other persons along said street, and the actual damage, if any, incurred by the plaintiff in laying a new pavement in front of its premises; and if they find from the evidence that such diminution in value exceeds in value such peculiar benefits, such excess is to be added to the damage incurred in laying the new pavement; but if the damage by diminution in value of the premises falls short of such peculiar benefits, then the deficiency is not to be charged to the plaintiff, nor deducted from the amount to which the said plaintiff is entitled on account of damage incurred in laying the new pavement, provided that the damages shall not exceed the amount of $400 claimed in the declaration." In other words, that the jury should have been instructed that in estimating plaintiff in error's damages they should disregard benefits, if any, to its property derived from the improvement "in common with the property of others along said street," and that they should in any event find for the plaintiff in error the sum of $128, the cost incurred in laying the new pavement, regardless of any benefits.

This independent item of cost incurred in laying the new pavement tended to show damage, and was proper to be considered as such by the jury, yet they could not take separate items, and award damages for them, and add them together, and say that is the damage suffered, nor could there be a recovery for any specific item of damage as such, but all of them were to be taken together as elements tending to show whether the property had been depreciated in value when considered in connection with the benefits. 2 Lewis, Em. Domain, § 494; City Council v. Schrameck, supra; Chambers v. South Chester (Pa.) 21 Atl. 409.

In the last-named case the following charge to the jury was approved: "You may consider these several matters [special items of alleged damages] as elements in the cause, but you are not to award damages for the building of walls or the filling up of lots as special damages, or for the likelihood of injuring the building, etc. You are not to take up these separate items, and award separate damages for them, and add them together, and say that is the damage suffered. The law has given another rule for the measuring of damages, and that rule is as before stated, and which I will now repeat. The law is this: You will consider the market value of the property before the change and unaffected by it, and its market value with the grade as affected by it. If the establishing of the new grade has added more value to the property than it has depreciated from it, the verdict should be for the defendant. If it has depreciated from the property more than it has added to it, the verdict should be for the plaintiff, and the measure of damages should be the difference between its value before and its value after."

The case of Blair v. Charleston, supra, is exactly in point as to the rule for measuring the damages in a case where there is no taking of any part of the property alleged to have been damaged by a public improvement; and in an elaborate opinion by Brannon, J., citing all of the decisions of this court pertinent to the issue, it is held: "If property is enhanced in value by reason of a public improvement, as distinguished from the general benefits to the whole community at large, it is specially benefited, and is to be assessed for the special benefits, notwithstanding every other piece of property upon or near the improvement may, to greater or less extent, be likewise specially benefited. In other words, it is not only such benefits as are special, or limited to the particular property, thereby excluding the consideration of such benefits as are common to other property similarly situated, but it is such benefits as that the particular property is by the improvement enhanced in value—that is, specially benefited—that are to be considered. If a piece of property is enhanced in value, its enhancement, or, in other words, benefits to the property, cannot be said to be common to any other piece of property specially enhanced in value, and it is thus specially benefited within itself, and irrespective of the benefit that may be conferred by the improvement upon other properties."

The opinion in that case also disposes of the contention made here that evidence of experts—i. e., opinion evidence—is not admissible on the question whether the property has been enhanced or depreciated in value by the public improvement, and holds that such evidence is admissible.

The rule sanctioned by the authorities we have referred to, and in fact universally recognized, it may be said, in all cases in which recovery was sought for damages where no part of the property is taken, but merely damaged, by a public improvement, is in entire harmony with the rule adopted in a long line of cases where it was held that the damages to the residue of the tract was an amount equal to the difference in the market value of the residue at the time of the taking and its market value after the same had been so taken. If this were not the correct rule, and plaintiff in error's contention could be sustained, damages would be recoverable in every case where the owner of property along the line of a public improvement incurred expense in adjusting his property to the improvement, although his property had been enhanced in value beyond the expense incurred, not because his property has been depreciated in value by the improvement more than benefited, but merely because other property similarly situated had been more or less benefited. Such a result would not only be unjust and inequitable, but would greatly retard the making of such common and necessary public improvements as are here complained of, and many others of like character and importance.

There is no evidence in this case, whatever, of any benefits to the community at large by reason of the paving of Twenty-Third street upon which plaintiff in error's property, assessed for taxation at $22,000, abuts; but the evidence was limited solely to the special benefits which enhanced the value of this particular property, both in fee-simple and rental value, tending to show an increase in both respects greatly in excess of the damages claimed as having been sustained by reason of the change in the grade of the street; and it would seem clear that the only inference that could be drawn from the evidence was that the other property in the community not fronting on this paved street was not enhanced in value, as the evidence shows that the fact that the property fronted upon the paved street was the sole cause of the enhancement of its value.

The case is of the first impression in Virginia upon the question of the measure of damages caused by a change of the grade of a street, where no part of the property was taken, and we have considered and determined the principles of the case, instead of discussing in detail the instructions given and refused at the trial, and deem it only necessary to say with reference to the instructions that those given by the learned judge who presided at the trial so clearly and concisely expounded the principles of law applicable to the case, and in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, that the jury could not have been misled as to their duty in disposing of the questions submitted to them.

Enough has been said of the evidence to warrant, in our opinion, the conclusion that the jury could not have rightly found any other verdict than they did find, and therefore the court below did not err in overruling plaintiff in error's motion for a new trial.

The judgment of the corporation court is affirmed.

MARBACH v. HOLMES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—TITLE.

Where both parties in ejectment claim the land from a common source, it is unnecessary for either to trace title beyond that source.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION—POSSESSION OF PURCHASER—DISAVOWAL OF VENDOR'S TITLE.

The possession of a purchaser under an incomplete contract of sale does not become adverse until there is a severance of the relation of vendor and purchaser by a distinct avowal on the purchaser's part that he is holding adversely to the vendor, and notice of such avowal is brought home to the vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, §§ 343-346.]

3. EJECTMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

In ejectment, where the defense was adverse possession, the record of a suit for specific performance brought three years before the commencement of the ejectment action by defendant against his alleged vendor, under whom plaintiff claimed, in which suit the bill was dismissed, was admissible to show that defendant's possession was not adverse at that time.

Error to Circuit Court, Elizabeth City County.

Action by S. Marbach against Henrietta Holmes. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

S. F. Collier & Son, John W. Friend, and Jones & Woodward, for plaintiff in error. S. J. Dudley and B. A. Lewis, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. In October, 1904, the plaintiff in error brought ejectment against the defendant in error to recover a certain lot situated in the town of Hampton. The defendant relied upon adverse possession under claim of right to defeat the plaintiff's recovery, and at the trial, a jury having been waived and all matters of law and fact submitted to the court, the judgment under review was rendered in behalf of the defendant.

Both plaintiff and defendant claim the land in controversy from a common source (Abraham Holmes), beyond which it is, therefore, unnecessary for either to trace title. Bolling v. Teel, 76 Va. 487; Chesterman v. Bolling, 102 Va. 471, 46 S. E. 470.

The plaintiff made out a prima facie case, connecting his title by successive conveyances with that of Abraham Holmes; while, as observed, the defendant, who had no deed or other paper title, relied solely upon adverse possession under claim of right. To rebut that contention, the plaintiff offered in evidence the record of a suit in equity, instituted in August, 1902, by C. W. Holmes, through whom the defendant claims, for specific performance of an alleged contract between his father, Abraham Holmes, and himself, for the sale of the lot in controversy. At the hearing the prayer for specific performance was denied and the bill dismissed.

It thus appears that less than three years before the institution of the present action C. W. Holmes, by the allegations of his bill, admitted that his entry upon and possession of the land was under the alleged contract of purchase from Abraham Holmes, and that the relation of vendor and vendee existed between them.

In such case the doctrine is well settled in this state that the possession of an incomplete purchaser only becomes adverse when there has been a severance of the relation of vendor and vendee by a distinct avowal on his part that he is holding adversely and not in subordination to the title of the vendor, and notice of such disclaimer is brought home to the vendor.

In the leading case of Clarke v. McClure, 10 Grat. 305, the rule is thus stated: "A vendee, who enters under an executory contract which leaves the legal title where it was and contemplates a future conveyance, enters in subordination to it, holds under and relies upon it to protect his possession in the meantime. And in such case, as also in the case of lessee, mortgagor, cestui que trust, and the like, where one is in under the owner of the legal title, a privity exists which precludes the idea of a hostile, tortious possession which could silently ripen into a title by adverse possession under the statute of limitations."

"An entry on land under a parol gift from the owner, and a claim to hold any estate by virtue of the gift, is in its nature a recognition of the continued existence of a subsisting title in the legal owner, and a claim to hold any estate by gift from the legal owner is a claim to hold in subordination to his title." Id.

The principal case has been cited and approved in a number of subsequent decisions by this court. Oreigh's Heirs v. Henson, 10 Grat. 231; Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Grat. 137, 141; Lewis v. Overby's Adm'r, 31 Grat. 601, 616; Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430, 436; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846; Hulvey v. Hulvey, 92 Va. 182, 23 S. E. 233; County of Alleghany v. Parrish, 93 Va. 615, 622, 25 S. E. 882; Va. Mid. R. Co. v. Barbour, 97 Va. 118, 33 S. E. 554; Neff v. Ryman, 100 Va. 521, 42 S. E. 314.

In Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, at page 406, 21 S. E. 813, at page 814 (50 Am. St. Rep. 846), it is said: "Before adverse possession can arise between a vendor and his vendee, or between the grantee of the vendor and such vendee, where the vendor has retained the title, and the statute of limitations commences to run, the vendee must have discovered the privity of title between them by the assertion of an adverse right, and openly and continuously disclaimed the title of his vendor, and such disclaimer be clearly brought home to the knowledge of the vendor or his grantee."

The record in the suit for specific performance was therefore clearly admissible to show the character of C. W. Holmes' possession; and for the error in excluding it the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

SMOKELESS FUEL CO. v. W. E. SEATON & SONS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 1, 1906.)

1. CONTRACTS — CONSIDERATION — MUTUAL PROMISES.

Where the consideration for the promise of one party is the promise of the other party, there must be absolute mutuality of engagement, so that each party may have the right to hold the other to a positive agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 11, Cent. Dig. Contracts, § 345.]

2. SALES—CONSIDERATION—MUTUALITY.

A contract reciting that the first party had sold to the second party from 1,000 to 1,500 tons of coal at a certain price, to be shipped as ordered between the date of the contract and a certain future date, was supported by a valuable consideration and mutuality of engagement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, §§ 31, 54-57.]

3. SAME — BREACH — EXCUSES FOR NONPERFORMANCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for breach of contract to deliver coal, the burden was on defendant to show that it was excused, under strike or car-shortage clauses of the contract, from performing the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 1170.]

4. SAME — STIPULATIONS EXCUSING NONPERFORMANCE—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract for the sale of coal, which provided that the seller would use every possible effort towards completing the contract, "but that it was subject to strikes * * * beyond the control" of the seller, bound the seller to deliver the coal, unless there was a strike which was so far beyond its control as to render performance impossible.

5. SAME—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action for breach of a contract to deliver coal, whether defendant was prevented from performing its contract by a strike beyond its control, within the meaning of a clause of the contract excusing performance in case of such strikes, held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

6. SAME—DUTY TO PERFORM—RIGHT TO IMPOSE CONDITIONS.

Where a contract for the sale of coal required the seller to deliver coal at a certain price up to a certain amount, as ordered, the seller was not entitled to demand an indemnifying bond as a condition of delivering the coal after the same had advanced in price on the market, and the buyer was under no obligation to comply with such a demand.

7. SAME — DEMAND OF PERFORMANCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for breach of a contract to deliver coal up to a certain amount, as ordered, whether plaintiff had demanded delivery of the coal, held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

8. SAME—NECESSITY OF DEMAND.

Where a contract bound defendant to deliver coal to a certain amount, as ordered, it was incumbent on plaintiff to demand the coal as a condition of putting defendant in default for failing to deliver the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, §§ 357, 1157.]

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by W. E. Seaton & Sons, a partnership, against the Smokeless Fuel Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied March 9, 1906.

Sands & Sands, for plaintiff in error. Emmett Seaton and H. R. Pollard, for defendants in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by Seaton & Sons, who are coal merchants in the city of Richmond, against the Smokeless Fuel Company, a corporation engaged in selling coal to such merchants, to recover damages for the breach by the defendant of the following contract, between the parties, which is set out in the declaration:

"This agreement entered into this eleventh day of April, 1902, by and between Smokeless Fuel Company, party of the first part, and W. E. Seaton & Sons, party of the second part, both of the city of Richmond, witnesseth: That the party of the first part has sold to the said party of the second part 1,000 to 1,500 tons New River R. O. N. steam coal from Collins Colliery Company at one dollar and ten cents ($1.10) per net ton of 2,000 lbs., freight rate to apply on this coal is one dollar and fifty cents ($1.50) per net ton of 2,000 lbs. from New River District to Richmond, Virginia. We guaranty this rate against any advance, but should there be a reduction of same during life of contract, party of the second part is to have advantage of the reduced rate on all coal shipped after such rate is put into effect. The party of the first part will use every effort possible towards completing this contract in a satisfactory manner to the party of the second part, but it is taken subject to strikes, accidents, shortage of cars, or any other causes beyond the control of said party of the first part. Coal is to be shipped as ordered between this date and April 11th, 1903. In consideration of the above both parties hereby affix their seals in triplicate on the date aforesaid.

"[Signed] Smokeless Fuel Company,

"Wm. Shands, Mgr. [Seal]

"[Signed] W. E. Seaton & Son. [Seal]"

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,139.

The petition for a writ of error sets forth three particulars in which it is claimed that the lower court erred. The first contention is that the contract sued on should have been held to be invalid for want of consideration and mutuality. This question was raised by demurrer to the declaration, and subsequently by objection to the admission of the contract in evidence, by instructions refused, and lastly by motion in arrest of judgment.

We are of opinion that the demurrer and each of the subsequent motions of the plaintiff, calling in question the validity of the contract, were properly overruled.

The general rule of law is that, where the consideration for the promise of one party is the promise of the other party, there must be absolute mutuality of engagement, so that each party has the right to hold the other to a positive agreement. Both parties must be bound or neither is bound. Am. Agricultural Co. v. Kennedy, 103 Va. 171-176, 48 S. E. 868.

We think the contract under consideration meets the requirements of this general rule. It is clear and definite in its terms, between competent parties, and for a valuable consideration, to wit, the promise of the seller to deliver the coal as ordered, within the time prescribed, and the promise of the buyer to receive the same and pay the price agreed upon. Under the terms of the contract, the plaintiff's were bound to take not less than 1,000 nor more than 1,500 tons. The price to be paid is stipulated in the contract, as is also the time in which the contract was to be performed. There was therefore not only a valuable consideration to sustain the contract, but absolute mutuality of engagement; both parties being bound to perform, and either liable to the other for a breach of the contract.

The second contention is that the circuit court erred in its interpretation of the "strike provision" in the contract sued on.

The contract provides as follows: "The party of the first part will use every effort possible towards completing this contract in a satisfactory manner to the party of the second part, but it is taken subject to strikes, accidents, shortage of cars, or any other causes beyond the control of said party of the first part."

The evidence shows that between the 11th day of April, 1902, and the 7th day of June, 1902, the defendant furnished to the plaintiffs all of the coal ordered by them at the contract price, being 160 tons. On the 7th day of June a strike occurred in the coal district where the Collins Colliery Company was located, from which the coal bought by the plaintiffs was to be shipped. The evidence shows that the expenses of the Collins Colliery Company were increased by this strike, but that it was one of the few coal companies in the district that was not compelled to close operations at any time during the strike, and that the company shipped nearly as much coal between June, 1902, and April 7, 1903 (the period in which the strike occurred), as it did between the same dates of the preceding year when there was no strike.

Upon this subject the court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court, however, instructs the jury that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show that it was prevented from fulfilling its contract by reason of strikes, shortage of cars, or other causes beyond their control.

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that after the contract sued on in this case had been made and entered into by the plaintiffs and defendant, there occurred at the mines of the Collins Colliery Company a strike which was beyond the control of said Collins Colliery Company and said defendant, and that this strike lasted during any part of the time of the contract, to wit, from the 11th day of April, 1902, to the 11th day of April, 1903, during the pendency of such strike the defendant was not compelled to deliver coal, and the contract was in abeyance during the time of such strike."

This provision of the contract clearly meant that the defendant should be relieved from the performance of its part of the contract, if there occurred a strike which was so far beyond its control as to make the performance of the contract impossible. Whether the defendant was prevented from performing its contract by a strike was a question for the jury, and we are of opinion that it was properly submitted by the instructions mentioned.

The third contention is that the defendant was relieved from performing its contract because the plaintiff failed to demand the coal. It is insisted that the only demand for coal was 10 or 12 days before the contract expired, and that the defendant then required an indemnifying bond as a condition of delivery, and that this request for an indemnifying bond was never noticed or replied to by the plaintiff.

This position is wholly untenable. The evidence tends to show that the plaintiffs were continually making demand of the representatives of the defendant company in the city of Richmond for coal to be delivered under the contract, and that if it had been delivered as demanded the whole 1500 tons would have been received; that these demands would be made of the Richmond manager of the defendant company as often as two or three times a week; and that the uniform reply was that he could deliver the plaintiff plenty of coal, but it would be at the advanced price. The order referred to by counsel for the defendant, as given 10 or 12 days before the contract expired, was written directly to the defendant company at Cincinnati, Ohio. The demand in reply for an indemnifying bond as a condition of delivering the coal was without warrant, and the plaintiffs were under no obligation to comply therewith. This question was also one for the jury, and was properly submitted to them by the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that under the contract sued on in this case it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to demand the coal included therein in order for the defendant to be held responsible for a breach in failing to deliver the same or any part thereof, and such demand must be proven by a preponderance of evidence, and cannot be inferred."

After the strike occurred in the coal district where the Collins Colliery Company was located, the price of coal advanced greatly beyond that at which the defendant company had contracted to deliver coal to the plaintiffs; and as early as October 30, 1902, the Richmond manager of the defendant company wrote to the plaintiffs that he had been advised by the "mines" to cancel all orders and contracts that they had with the plaintiffs, offering as an excuse the refusal of the plaintiffs to accept a car of egg coal not ordered by them under the contract here involved. To this letter the plaintiffs replied, saying that they were entirely justifiable in refusing to accept the car load of egg coal; that the transaction had nothing whatever to do with the contract here involved; and that they would expect the defendant to live up to such contract according to the terms named in it.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the jury was properly instructed, and their verdict was amply sustained by the evidence. For these reasons the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

(106 Va. 858)

HARDING v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS — OFFENSES — CHARGE OF OFFENSE—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code 1904, § 4108, providing that an appeal from a judgment of conviction by a justice in certain cases shall be tried without formal pleadings in writing, a warrant charging the unlawful sale of liquor, and made the basis of the trial in the circuit court on appeal from the justice's judgment, must be clear and specific, so as to inform accused of the offense with which he is charged; but such a warrant, charging that defendant did, on a certain day, in a certain magisterial district, and in a certain county, unlawfully sell certain kinds of intoxicating liquors to a certain person, and to divers other persons, was sufficiently definite.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—DISTINCT OFFENSES.

In a prosecution for an illegal sale of liquor, where the warrant averred a sale to a certain person, and to divers other persons, on a certain date, evidence of a sale made by defendant on a previous date was inadmissible, although such sale was made during the year preceding the institution of the prosecution, within which, under Code 1904, § 3889, defendant might have been prosecuted for such sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 273.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for an illegal sale of liquor, the act of the commonwealth's attorney in asking defendant, on cross-examination, whether he did not have a United States license to sell liquor, while objectionable, was not prejudicial, where the court told defendant he was not bound to answer, and instructed the jury that they could not draw any inference against defendant from his refusal to answer the same.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—OFFENSES—PUNISHMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Acts 1902-04, p. 224, c. 148, § 143, with reference to the unlawful sale of liquor, provides that a violation thereof shall be punished by fine, and, in the discretion of the court, by imprisonment. Such section also provides (on page 220) that it shall not be construed as repealing any special act prohibiting the sale of liquor in any county or town. Acts 1901-02, p. 601, c. 516, relative to the illegal sale of liquor in Lancaster county, provides that any person violating the same shall be fined not more than $500, and may be imprisoned until the fine is paid. Held, that the general statute is inoperative in Lancaster county, and one convicted of violating the liquor law in that county cannot be sentenced to confinement in the county jail in addition to a sentence of a fine.

Error to Circuit Court, Lancaster County.

W. O. Harding was convicted of an illegal sale of liquor, and brings error. Reversed.

T. J. Downing, W. B. Saunders, and Jos. W. Chinn, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Wm. A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

CARDWELL, J. W. O. Harding was tried and convicted by a justice of the peace of Lancaster county upon a warrant charging that he, "on the 29th day of April, 1905 in White Stone magisterial district, in said county, did unlawfully sell to one William K. Powell, and to divers other persons, malt liquors, whisky, brandy, wine, ale, beer, and mixture thereof, alcoholic bitters, bitters containing alcohol, and mixtures, preparations, and liquids which will produce intoxication." By the judgment of the justice a fine of $300 and imprisonment in the county jail for 10 days was imposed upon the defendant, and from that judgment he appealed to the circuit court of Lancaster county, in which there was a trial de novo, and the defendant again convicted by the verdict of the jury and assessed with a fine of $500, to which the judge added imprisonment in the county jail for a term of 2 days.

The first assignment of error here is that the demurrer to the warrant should have been sustained. This contention is made upon the ground, as it would seem, that the same particularity and technical precision of pleading is required in a warrant as is necessary in an indictment for a criminal offense.

Section 4108 of the Code of 1904, provides that "the appeal shall be tried without formal pleadings in writing, and the accused shall be entitled to trial by a jury in the same manner as if he had been indicted for an offence in said court."

While formal pleadings are by the statute dispensed with on a trial where an appeal has been taken from the judgment of a justice convicting one of an offense, the charge of the offense must be sufficiently clear and specific to inform the accused of the precise offense with which he is charged.

In Arrington's Case, 87 Va. 96, 12 S. E. 224, 10 L. R. A. 242, it was held that "an indictment for unlawful liquor selling should describe the offense in such plain and intelligible language that the accused may have notice of the precise offense with which he is charged."

Obviously the reason for the more rigid enforcement of the rule in this class of cases is that every unlawful sale of whisky, whether unlawful because in violation of the revenue laws, the local option laws, or a special act prohibiting the sale of liquor in a particular county or locality, is a separate and distinct offense, and the charge must be so made as not only to apprise the accused of the precise offense with which he is charged, that he may prepare to meet the charge and not be taken by surprise when brought to trial, but that he may plead former conviction or acquittal, as the case might be, and vouch the record of the case, if thereafter he be put upon his trial for the same offense. 10 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 473, 511, and authorities cited.

The warrant here charges the accused clearly and distinctly with unlawful selling of malt liquor, whisky, etc., to one Wm. K. Powell, and divers other persons, on the 29th day of April, 1905, in White Stone magisterial district, in Lancaster county. While not necessary, the time of the unlawful sale is charged in the warrant, and the place named, though in this case the place was not of the essence of the offense, except that it must have been in White Stone magisterial district, of Lancaster county. Savage's Case, 84 Va. 582, 620, 5 S. E. 563, 565; Arrington's Case, supra. There could have been no surprise to the defendant when put upon trial on this warrant, as it fully apprised him of the charge made against him; and, had he been convicted of that charge, he could plead the conviction and vouch the record in bar of a subsequent prosecution against him for unlawful sale of liquor, etc., to Wm. K. Powell, or to any other of the divers persons referred to in the warrant, on the 29th day of April, 1905, in White Stone magisterial district, in Lancaster county. To hold, as is contended, that a warrant charging the unlawful sale of liquor must set forth wherein the sale was unlawful, and state all the circumstances which make up the statutory offense, would be to require of a warrant like that in the case here the same formality and definiteness of pleading that is required of an indictment, which would render section 4108 of the Code of 1904, supra, meaningless or of no avail.

We are therefore of opinion that the demurrer to the warrant was properly overruled.

As we have seen, the warrant averred a sale of malt liquor, whisky, etc., to one Wm. K. Powell, and to divers other persons, on the 29th day of April, 1905; and one Clarence Balderson was allowed, over the objection of the defendant, to testify that the defendant sold him whisky on the 11th day of March, 1905.

This was error. It might have been permissible, under this warrant, to prove sales to other persons than Powell on the day named in the warrant, for the reason that other sales on that day would constitute but one and the same transaction, and that the charge of the warrant furnished the defendant with notice that he was charged with the other sales made on the 29th day of April; but evidence of a sale to Balderson on March 11th was that of a separate and distinct transaction, constituting an offense not embraced within the terms of the warrant, and of which it cannot be said the defendant had notice that he would be charged and put upon his defense.

"An indictment for an unlawful selling of ardent spirits to one person will not authorize proof of selling to another." Taggart's Case, 8 Grat. 697.

"If proof shows a different offense from that alleged in the indictment, the variance will be fatal." 11 A. & E. Enc. Pl. & Pr. 551.

Accordingly, it was held in Savage's Case, supra, that the proof in such a case (unlawful sale of liquor) must show that the offense was committed in the district mentioned in the indictment; otherwise, a conviction cannot be sustained. See, also, Richardson's Case, 80 Va. 124; Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 505.

The fact that the warrant alleges a sale to Powell and divers other persons, and the time of sale offered in proof was within the statutory period prior to the issuing of the warrant, cannot make the evidence of Balderson admissible. It is true that section 3889 of the Code of 1904 limits prosecutions of this character to a period of one year after the offense is committed, and it is also true that the sale to Balderson was made, if at all, within the year preceding the institution of this prosecution, and that the defendant was liable to prosecution for such sale upon a warrant or indictment properly charging that offense; but the question here is not whether the sale to Balderson on March 11th was within the statutory period, or whether the time of the offense is imperfectly stated—the real question being whether or not evidence of an offense which is not alleged at all, either properly or improperly, is admissible. And this question becomes all the more important since the certificate of evidence in this record discloses no evidence upon which the defendant could have properly been found guilty of any sale of intoxicating liquor to Powell or other person on April 29, 1905, and if any sale at all was proven, it was only the sale to Balderson on March 11th, so that only of that sale, not charged perfectly or imperfectly in the warrant, was it possible for the jury to find him guilty. If the defendant were now put upon trial for selling liquor to Balderson on March 11, 1905, a plea of former conviction would not avail him, as the record in this case would not show that he was charged with or tried for that offense. Justice's Case, 81 Va. 209; Page's Case, 27 Grat. 954.

In Hudson v. State, 78 Miss. 784, 19 South. 965, the case came up for trial in the circuit court on appeal from the mayor's court, and the state was permitted to strike out the names of the three persons to whom it was charged in the affidavit the accused sold liquor and he was convicted on the evidence of another person, who was not one of the three named, and who proved a sale to him by the accused when no other person was present besides himself and this witness. The Supreme Court of Mississippi held that the conviction could not be upheld and the case was remanded for a new trial; the opinion saying: "It is true that no averment of the names of the buyers in the affidavit was originally necessary, yet by making that unnecessary averment it became essential as descriptive of the offense charged." See, also, Bish. Stat.

Crime, § 1048; State v. Chisnell (W. Va.) 15 S. E. 412.

In the case just cited, the opinion, citing a number of decisions by this court, while holding that an indictment for the illegal sale of liquor may be general, and the state may under such an indictment prove any sale by the defendant within the statutory period, declares that, if the indictment charged a particular sale—i. e., but one transaction—the state would be tied down to that; and where the indictment is general, and the state has given evidence tending to show different sales, at the close of its evidence, before the defendant opens his evidence, the state should be required to elect the particular sale on which it would ask a verdict, and then all evidence relating to other sales should be excluded.

Had the warrant here charged the defendant with having, between the 11th day of March, 1905, and the 29th day of April, 1905, both inclusive, sold to Wm. K. Powell and to divers other persons intoxicating liquors, or had charged generally that the defendant had unlawfully sold intoxicating liquors to Wm. K. Powell and to divers other persons, in White Stone magisterial district, in Lancaster county, evidence of a sale to Balderson on March 11, 1905, would have been admissible, as it would have been within the statutory period limiting the punishment of such an offense. But that is not the case, and the defendant had no notice of such a charge to be made against him, and, in contemplation of law, no opportunity to prepare his defense against such a charge. Therefore the evidence of Balderson as to the sale of liquor to him on March 11, 1905, was clearly inadmissible.

The attorney for the commonwealth was permitted, over the objection of defendant's counsel, to ask the defendant on cross-examination the question, "Is it not a fact that you now have United States license for the retail of liquor?" The court told the defendant that he was not bound to answer the question, and instructed the jury that they could not draw any inference or deduction against the defendant from the fact of his refusal to answer the question.

While the question was, under the circumstances of this case, objectionable, and should not have been asked, in view of the instruction to the jury with respect to it, the defendant, in our opinion, could not have been prejudiced by the propounding of the question to him.

The ruling of the court below sentencing the defendant to two days' confinement in the county jail, in addition to the fine imposed by the verdict of the jury, is assigned as error.

There is no authority for this ruling, unless found in the act approved April 16, 1903 (Acts 1902-04, p. 155, c. 148), where, in section 143, at page 224, with reference to unlawful liquor selling, it is provided: "A violation of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by fine of not less than twenty dollars, and, in the discretion of the court, by imprisonment not exceeding twelve months." But that section, at page 220, contains also the provision "that this section [section 143] shall not be construed as repealing any special act prohibiting the sale or manufacture of ardent spirits in any county, district or town."

By the eighth section of an act approved April 2, 1902 (Acts 1901-02, p. 601, c. 516), which is a special act to suppress "the illegal and unlawful sale or traffic in ardent spirits" in Lancaster county, it is provided "that any person who is found guilty under the provisions of this act shall be fined not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars, and may be imprisoned until said fine is paid."

This statute remains in full force, and therefore the act of April 16, 1903, supra, was inoperative in the county of Lancaster when this case was tried, so that the court was without the authority to sentence the defendant to confinement in the county jail in addition to the fine imposed by the verdict of the jury.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed and annulled, the verdict of the jury act aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed herein.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. SCRUGGS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

RAILROADS—OPERATION—APPROACH TO CROSSINGS—DUTY TO SOUND WHISTLE.

Acts 1893-94, p. 827, c. 737, required railroad locomotives to sound the whistle at not less than 300 yards before reaching a highway crossing. This act was repealed by Acts 1904, p. 388, c. 253, and the Legislature which repealed it enacted the provisions now found in Va. Code 1904, § 1294d, subsec. 24, which requires railroad locomotives to sound their whistles outside of incorporated cities and towns at a distance of not less than 300 yards from places where the railroad crosses "upon the same level any highway or crossing." Subsection 38 of the same section of the Code declares it to be the policy of the state that railroad crossings over highways shall, wherever reasonably practical, pass above or below the existing structure. Held, that a railroad locomotive is no longer required to blow its whistle on approaching a place where the railroad crosses a highway by means of a bridge over the highway.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Lynchburg.

Action by T. B. Scruggs against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

F. S. Kirkpatrick, for plaintiff in error.
Caskie & Coleman, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The declaration in this case alleges, in substance, that at the point where the plaintiff received the injuries complained of the track of the defendant company crosses the public highway on a fill, with an archway therein through which the highway passes; that just east of the fill is a railway cut; that while the plaintiff was traveling along the highway, in a vehicle drawn by a horse, and was about to pass under the railway track, without being aware of the approach of any train or engine, one of the engines of the defendant, known as a "pusher," was by the careless and negligent act of the defendant suddenly, and without notice of its approach, run out of the cut and upon the archway through the fill, causing the plaintiff's horse to become frightened, and resulting in the injury for which compensation is sought in damages.

The demurrer to the declaration calls in question the right of the plaintiff to recover upon the facts alleged; it being contended that the defendant company was under no obligation to give notice of the approach of its engine to a highway not crossed by it at grade or on the same level.

The notice required of railroads in approaching highway crossings is regulated in this state by statute. The history of our legislation on the subject is brief and of comparatively recent date.

The first act relating to the matter was approved March 5, 1894. This statute, so far as pertinent, provides that: "A bell and a steam whistle shall be placed on each locomotive engine operated on any railway in this state, and said whistle shall be at least twice sharply sounded, not less than three hundred yards before a highway crossing is reached." Acts 1898-94, pp. 827-828, c. 737.

The last act relating to the subject is to be found in the recent public service corporation act, approved January 18, 1904. This statute provides that: "Every railroad company whose line is operated by steam, shall provide each locomotive engine passing upon its road with a bell of ordinary size, and steam whistle, and such whistle shall be sharply sounded outside of incorporated cities and towns, at least twice at a distance of not less than three hundred yards nor more than six hundred yards from the place where the railroad crosses upon the same level any highway or crossing, and such bell shall be rung or whistle sounded continuously or alternately until the engine has reached such highway crossing, and shall give such signals in cities and towns as the legislative authorities thereof may require. And the said company shall be liable for damages which shall be sustained by any person by reason of such neglect." Acts 1902-03-04, p. 986, c. 609, § 24, now carried into Va. Code 1904, § 1294d, subsec. 24.

The same Legislature which enacted this statute also, by an act approved March 15, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 368, c. 253), repealed the first-mentioned act of 1894, thus leaving as the only statute on the subject that found in Va. Code 1904, § 1294d, subsec. 24.

The effect of the existing statute, which limits the duty of sounding the whistle or ringing the bell to occasions when the engine is approaching a highway which the railroad crosses upon the same level, is to exempt the railroad company from giving such notice when the engine is approaching a point where it crosses the highway on an overhead bridge. The change from the statute of 1894 to the existing law must mean this, or it would accomplish nothing. The purpose of the Legislature was obviously to encourage the abolition of grade crossings which have proved to be such a constant menace to human life, and to encourage the substitution of crossings either above or below the public highway. This is declared to be the legislative policy by the same act which embraces the existing law with respect to crossings. Va. Code, 1904, § 1294d, subsec. 88.

The great danger of railroads crossing public highways at grade is well understood, and the increase of population is adding daily to the number of those who suffer therefrom. Building bridges over highways by railroads, while expensive, is a matter of vast importance and greatly to be desired in the interest of all concerned, and every encouragement should be given to that end. Where the railroad crosses the highway by means of a bridge over it, the statute wisely refrains from imposing the burden, obstruction, or inconvenience of the regulations and precautions applicable to grade crossings. If the railroad, when it avoids the danger of a grade crossing by erecting a bridge over the highway, is to be still required to ring its bell, blow the whistle, and use all the precautions applicable to grade crossings, there would be little inducement to incur the cost of such constructions in the public interest.

We are of opinion that the declaration does not state a case which, under the statute, entitles the plaintiff to recover. The judgment complained of must therefore be reversed, and the verdict of the jury set aside. And this court will enter such judgment as the lower court ought to have entered, sustaining the demurrer to the declaration and dismissing the case with costs.

BUCHANAN, J., concurs in result, but not in the opinion.

TIDEWATER QUARRY CO. v. SCOTT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. ACTION—FORM—WAIVER OF TORT.

The tort involved in a conversion of property may be waived, and the injured party may bring assumpsit for the value of the property on the wrongdoer's implied contract to pay for the property converted by him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Action, § 198.]

2. SET-OFF—ACTIONS OF CONTRACT—CLAIMS FOR CONVERSION.

Under Va. Code 1904, § 3298, providing that in a suit for debt defendant may prove any payment or set-off, defendant in an action of assumpsit may set off a claim for the conversion of his property by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Set-Off and Counterclaim, §§ 16, 32.]

3. PLEADING—STATEMENT OF DEFENSE—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code 1887, § 3249 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1709], authorizing the court to order a statement of the particulars of the claim or the ground of defense to be filed, the statement need not set out the particulars of the claim or the ground of defense with the formality or precision of a declaration or plea, but only in such manner as to notify the adverse party of its character, and an itemized account of goods claimed by defendant to have been converted by plaintiff is a sufficient statement of defense under a plea of set-off.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Charles E. Scott against the Tide-water Quarry Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. Randolph Hicks, for plaintiff in error.
Edward R. Baird, Jr., for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. Two questions are raised by this record: (1) Can a defendant in an action at law set off against a liquidated demand the value of goods belonging to the defendant which have been converted by the plaintiff to his own use? and (2) if the value of such goods can be set off, are the items of offset so described in the statement of defense as to entitle the defendant to prove them?

The plaintiff, Scott, brought an action of assumpsit against the defendant quarry company to recover a sum alleged to be due on a note and a balance due on open account.

The defendant filed a plea of nonassumpsit and a notice of set-off. The items of the account of offsets that are called in question were stated by the defendant in his account, filed as follows:

450 tons of crushed stone sold to Charles E. Scott at fifty cents per ton	$225 00
800 tons of crushed stone sold to same at 15 cents per ton.....	45 00
Three barrels of grease and oil sold to same	60 00
Seven cases of dynamite sold to same..	49 00
One car load of coal sold to same....	200 00

Upon the trial the defendant, to sustain these items of offset, introduced a witness to show that the goods mentioned were upon the premises of the defendant company at the time the plaintiff took possession thereof under a lease, that the goods were worth in the aggregate $579, and that the plaintiff had taken possession of them and converted them to his own use. The plaintiff objected to the introduction of this evidence upon the ground that it tended to establish a claim for damages that could not be set off in this suit, and upon the further ground that it related to matters not sufficiently described in the statement of defense.

We are of opinion that it was error to sustain the objection on either of the grounds mentioned.

Section 3298, Va. Code 1904, provides that "in a suit for any debt, the defendant may at the trial prove and have allowed against such debt, any payment or set-off which is so described in his plea, or in an account filed therewith, as to give the plaintiff notice of its nature, but not otherwise."

This court has held that this statute should be liberally construed, with a view to the furtherance of its obvious policy, which is to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and, as far as conveniently can be done, to effectuate in one action complete justice between the parties. Allen v. Hart, 18 Grat. 722, 729.

For the conversion of its property by the plaintiff an action of tort to recover damages could have been brought by the defendant. This mode of redress, however, the defendant had the right to waive, and to bring indebitatus assumpsit for the value of the goods. The law will imply a contract to pay for property belonging to the defendant which has been taken possession of by the plaintiff and converted to his own use.

The plaintiff insists that the items of set-off which are sought to be established by the defendant constitute an unliquidated demand, which cannot be set off in an action at law against a liquidated demand.

It is well settled that uncertain unliquidated damages cannot be set off to a demand certain. But what are uncertain unliquidated damages?

In Butts v. Collins, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 139, 156, 157, it is said: "They are such as rest in opinion only, and must be ascertained by a jury, their verdict being regulated by the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. They are damages which cannot be ascertained by computation or calculation—as, for instance, damages for not using a farm in a workmanlike manner; for not building a house in a good and sufficient manner; on a warranty in the sale of a horse; for not skillfully amputating a limb; for carelessly upsetting a stage, by which a bone is broken; for not making repairs to a dwelling house; for unskillfully working the raw materials into a fabric; and other cases of like character—where the amount to be settled rests in the discretion, judgment, or opinion of the jury. Hewlet v. Strickland, 1 Cowp. 56; Freeman v. Hyatt, 1 W. Black 394; Welgall v. Waters, 6 T. R. 488; Livingston v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 287, 8 Am. Dec. 562; Hepburn v. Hoag, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 613. In these and like cases there is no data given for computation; nor can the damages be ascertained by any mode of calculation. It is otherwise as to the amount due on a note, or on a merchant's account, or for work, labor, and services, or for a yard, a piece or a bale of flannel. The damages in such cases can be readily ascertained by calculation." Barbour on Set-Off, p. 82.

In Waterman on Set-Off, § 286, it is said: "It is not necessary, in order to constitute a valid set-off, that a price should be agreed upon for an article sold and delivered. Therefore a demand for the value of corn delivered may be set off, though the price of the corn had not been agreed on. The fact that the price had not been agreed on did not make it a case of unliquidated damages, within the sense in which these terms have been used in expounding the English statutes. The defendants' demand was for money, the value of the corn. For its recovery, indebitatus assumpsit could be maintained, and this furnishes a test in favor of its allowance as a set-off." Smith & Crawford, Ex'rs, v. Hule, Adm'r, 14 Ala. 201; Gunn's Adm'r v. Todd, 21 Mo. 303, 64 Am. Dec. 231; Norden v. Jones, 33 Wis. 600, 14 Am. Rep. 782; Ragsdale v. Buford's Ex'rs, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 192; Hill v. Perrott, 8 Taunt. 274; Allen v. U. S., 17 Wall. 207, 21 L. Ed. 553; Rob. Practice, vol. 5, pp. 964-965; Wait on Actions & Defenses, pp. 482-484; Sedgwick on Damages, vol. 2, p. 368.

In the light of these authorities, the defendant had the right to waive its action for damages against the plaintiff for his tortious act in converting the property of the defendant to his own use, and to bring indebitatus assumpsit for the value of the goods appropriated, and therefore had the right to offset the plaintiff's demand with the value of such goods. Set-offs are to be encouraged. They lessen the amount of litigation by preventing circuity of action. There is no reason or propriety in driving these parties to cross-actions, and to compel the claims to be settled in two suits, when full and equal justice can be awarded to each of them in one suit.

We are further of opinion that the contention, that the defendant's demand is not stated with sufficient clearness in its statement of defense, cannot be sustained. The defendant, as it had a right to do, chose to treat the plaintiff as a purchaser of the property he had converted to his use, and to sue for its value. Each item is described with particularity as property sold to the plaintiff, and the form and substance of this statement of defense could not fail to furnish the plaintiff with adequate notice of the defense that would be made on the trial.

The object of the statute (section 8249, of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1709]) was simply to give the plaintiff more particular information of the ground of defense than is generally disclosed by a plea, so as to enable the parties to prepare more intelligently for the trial, and to prevent surprises which may and often do result in injustice.

But such statement does not constitute the issue to be tried, and it was not intended that the particulars of the claim, or the ground of defense, should be set forth with the formality or precision of a declaration or plea, but only in such manner, however informal, as would fairly and plainly give notice to the adverse party of its character when the same was not so described in the notice, declaration, or other pleading. Columbia Accident Ass'n v. Rockey, 93 Va. 678, 25 S. E. 1009.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial in conformity with the views expressed in this opinion.

EASTERN STATE HOSPITAL v. GRAVES' COMMITTEE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 1, 1906.)

1. LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS—CLAIMS OF STATE.

Unless the statute expressly so provides, limitations do not run against the state, either as to debts and demands of a personal nature in favor of the state or as to real estate held by it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 86.]

2. SAME—ACTIONS IN NAME OF STATE.

Where a suit is brought in the name of the state, but the state has no real interest in the litigation, and its name is being used merely to enforce a right in favor of an individual or corporation, the defenses of laches or limitations may be made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 86.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS FOR STATE.

Where a suit is brought for the sole benefit of the state, the defense of limitations cannot be made, although the suit is not brought in the name of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 86.]

4. PARTIES—REAL PARTY IN INTEREST—DETERMINATION.

The courts will determine who is the real party in interest in an action by reference, not merely to the name in which the action is brought, but to the facts as they appear of record.

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACTION BY STATE AGENCY.

Where an insane hospital is created for purely governmental purposes, is controlled by the state, having no stockholders or members, except directors appointed by the Governor, and any loss resulting from its failure to collect charges imposed upon its inmates or their estates is borne by the state, and any recovery of such charges is for the benefit of the state, an action by the hospital to recover for charges in taking care of an insane person cannot be barred by limitations.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the Eastern State Hospital against P. T. Winston, committee of Richard O. Graves. There was a judgment for de-defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

C. B. Garnett, for plaintiff in error. J. G. Winston and C. B. Sands, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The only question involved in this writ of error is whether or not the statute of limitations runs against the claim sued on, which is for board and medical attention furnished Richard C. Graves as an inmate of the Eastern State Hospital.

It is settled law that the statute of limitations, unless the statute expressly so provides, does not run against the state, and that this exemption applies to debts and demands of a personal nature in favor of the state, as well as to real estate held by it. Wood on Lim. (3d Ed.) § 52; Kemp v. Com., 1 Hen. & M. 85; Nimmo's Ex'r v. Com., 4 Hen. & M. 57, 4 Am. Dec. 488; Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Grat. 572, 578; Buntin v. Danville, 98 Va. 200, 208, 24 S. E. 830, and cases cited; U. S. v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 118 U. S. 120, 6 Sup. Ct. 1006, 30 L. Ed. 81.

It is also settled that, where a suit is brought in the name of the state, the defense of laches and limitations may be made when its name is used to enforce a right which inures to the benefit of an individual or a corporation, and the state has no real interest in the litigation. Wood on Lim. § 52; U. S. v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338, 8 Sup. Ct. 1083, 32 L. Ed. 121; U. S. v. Des Moines Nav. & Ry. Co., 142 U. S. 510, 12 Sup. Ct. 308, 35 L. Ed. 1099; State, etc., v. Halter, 149 Ind. 297, 47 N. E. 665; Miller v. State, 88 Ala. 600, 603, 604.

It is also settled law that where the suit is for the sole benefit of the state, although not brought in its name, the defense of the statute of limitations cannot be made. Com. v. Baldwin, 1 Watts (Pa.) 54, 26 Am. Dec. 38, 86; Glover v. Wilson, 6 Pa. 290, 293; State Bank of Illinois v. Brown, 1 Scam. (Ill.) 106; Wastenev v. Schott, etc., 58 Ohio St. 410, 51 N. E. 84.

It is further well settled that the courts will determine who is the real party in interest by a reference, not merely to the name in which the action is brought, but to the facts of the case as they appear in the record. United States v. Beebe, supra; State v. Halter, supra; Glover v. Wilson, supra.

It was held by the court in Mala's Adm'r v. Eastern State Hospital (the plaintiff in this case), 97 Va. 507, 509, 34 S. E. 617, 47 L. R. A. 577, that said hospital was created and exists for purely governmental purposes, is a public corporation governed and controlled by the state, and acts exclusively as an agency of the state for the protection of society and for the promotion of the best interests of the unfortunate people of the commonwealth of insane and disordered minds, and that it has no stockholders, no members even, except directors having no interest in it or its affairs, who are appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, and are, in fact, public, rather than corporate, officials, endued with corporate being for a more convenient administration of the duties imposed upon them by law, and are made liable to fines for any failure to perform their duties.

The hospital, being a mere agency of the state, owned and controlled by it, all charges imposed upon its inmates or their estates for taking care of and maintaining them are for the benefit of the state, and when collected go to the support of the hospital as much as the money appropriated out of the public treasury. If not collected, the loss falls wholly upon the state; and, if there is a recovery, it will be for the benefit of the state, and the state alone, not for the benefit of the directors, nor for the benefit of any subordinate division of the state, but for the whole people—the state at large.

This being so, we are of opinion that the statute of limitations did not run against the demand sued on, and that the trial court erred in holding that it did.

This conclusion overrules the case of McClanahan v. Western Lunatic Asylum, 88 Va. 466, 13 S. E. 977, which involved the same question. The overruling of that case whenever the same question should arise again was the necessary and logical result of the decision in the case of Mala's Adm'r v. Eastern State Hospital. The doctrine announced in the former case, that a corporation which has the power to sue and be sued is entitled to make, and is amenable to, the same defenses as pertain to private persons, is not a correct statement of the law when applied to a corporation acting as an agency of the state in the performance of duties which are exclusively for public governmental purposes, and is in conflict not only with the decision in Mala's Adm'r v. Eastern State Hospital, but with principles of law recognized and acted on in numerous cases by this court. See City of Richmond v. Long's Adm'r's, 17 Grat. 375, 94 Am. Dec. 461; Sawyer v. Corse, 17 Grat. 230, 94 Am. Dec. 445; Norfolk City v. Chamberlaine, 29 Grat. 534; Yates v. Town of Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. 818, 10 Am. St. Rep. 860; Buntin v. Danville, supra; Terry v. City of Richmond, 94 Va. 538, 27 S. E. 429, 38 L. R. A. 834; Jones v. City of Williamsburg, 97 Va. 722, 34 S. E. 883, 47 L. R. A. 294.

We are of opinion, therefore, to reserve the judgment of the court of law and equity, and this court will enter such judgment as that court ought to have entered.

TOWN OF PHOEBUS v. MANHATTAN SOCIAL CLUB.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 1, 1906.)

1. LICENSES—RECOVERY OF TAXES PAID—ACTIONS.

In order to entitle a party to maintain an action to recover back a license tax paid by it to a town, it must be shown that the town had no authority to impose the tax, that it actually received the money paid, and that the payment was not made voluntarily.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Licenses, § 68.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — TAXATION — EXEMPTIONS.

Acts 1902-03-04, pp. 155, 226, c. 148, cl. 144, providing that any social club which shall desire to keep liquors on sale at its clubhouse shall pay to the treasurer of the county or corporation in which the clubhouse is situated $2 for every person who is a member of the club in lieu of all other taxes for selling liquor to its members, does not exempt social clubs from municipal taxation.

3. LICENSES—TAXES ON CLUBS.

The tax imposed on social clubs by Acts 1902-03-04, pp. 155, 226, c. 148, cl. 144, requiring social clubs which keep liquors on sale to pay $2 for every member of the club in lieu of all other taxes, is, in view of the provisions of the statute looking to the regulation of such clubs, requiring them to make reports as to their membership, officers, dues, etc., and providing for a forfeiture of their charters for failure to make such reports, a license tax within the meaning of Code 1904, § 1042, authorizing a city or town to impose a tax in addition to the state tax for the privilege of doing anything for which a "license tax" is required within the city or town, and consequently an additional tax may be imposed by the town in which the club is located.

4. TAXATION — RECOVERY OF TAXES PAID — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Payment of taxes is presumed to be voluntary, and the burden is upon one seeking to recover them back to show that the payment was not voluntary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 1013.]

5. SAME — VOLUNTARY PAYMENTS — PAYMENT UNDER PROTEST.

A mere declaration of a taxpayer, indorsed on the stub of the official's taxbook, that payment was made under protest, does not show that the payment was not made voluntarily, in the absence of any proof of pressure to make payment being brought to bear on the taxpayer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, §§ 1003-1005.]

Error to Circuit Court, Elizabeth City County.

Action by the Manhattan Social Club against the town of Phoebus. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. H. Power and O. D. Batchelor, for plaintiff in error. S. J. Dudley and B. A. Lewis, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The Manhattan Social Club instituted an action of assumpsit against the town of Phoebus to recover back a license tax.

In order for the plaintiff to maintain its action it was necessary to show: (1) That defendant had no authority to impose the tax; (2) that it actually received the money paid (this is conceded); and (3) that the payment was not voluntarily made.

By section or clause 144 of chapter 148 of an act approved April 16, 1903, known as the "State Revenue Act" (Acts 1902-03-04, pp. 155, 226), it is provided, among other things, that any corporation chartered as a social club, which shall desire to keep on hand at its clubhouse or other place of meeting, wines, ardent spirits, or any mixture thereof, alcoholic bitters, bitters containing alcohol, or fruits preserved in ardent spirits, to be sold directly or indirectly or given away to the members of such corporation, shall on or before the 30th day of April of each year pay to the treasurer of the county or corporation wherein the clubhouse or other place of meeting is situated $2 for each and every person who is a member of such corporation, which shall be in lieu of all other taxes upon such corporation for selling or giving away to its members ardent spirits or any of the mixtures or materials above enumerated; provided that the tax to be paid by any one club shall not exceed the sum of $350.

The plaintiff insists that the act imposing the tax on social clubs, by expressly providing that the taxes imposed by the state should be in lieu of all other taxes for the privileges granted, was intended to exempt such clubs from municipal taxation. While the language of the statute is very comprehensive, it does not, in our opinion, sustain the claim of the plaintiff, under the decisions of this court in the cases of Orange, etc., R. Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Grat. 176, and Humphreys v. City of Norfolk, 25 Grat. 97. In those cases, as in this, the language relied on by the parties seeking to escape taxation was sufficiently comprehensive, if regard was paid only to its literal sense, to exempt them from all other taxes, both state and municipal. But the court in both cases was of opinion that the act to which the sections under consideration belonged, respectively, was a general law imposing taxes for the support of the government, and related exclusively to taxes to be paid to the state; and that there were no considerations of reason or justice in either case (as there are not in this) which required that the exemption should be extended to municipal taxes for which no commutation was provided, and which was wholly independent of the tax to the state. The reasoning of the judges delivering the opinions in those cases applies with peculiar force to the case under consideration.

The next contention of the plaintiff is that, even if the act in question does not prohibit such tax, the defendant has no authority under its charter to tax social clubs.

Without discussing the extent of the taxing power of the defendant under the provisions of its charter (Acts 1899-1900, pp. 98-103, c. 98), which are very broad, it is clear, we think, that it has the power to impose the tax in question under section 1042 of the Code of 1904, which provides that: "In addition to the state tax on any license, the council of a city or town may, when anything for which a license tax is so required is to be done within the city or town, impose a tax for the privilege of doing the same and require a license to be obtained therefor. * * *"

While the tax imposed by the state upon social clubs is not called a license tax in the act under consideration, it is so designated in the act approved March 12, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 214, c. 116), the statute now in force upon the subject. It is sometimes difficult to determine whether a sum imposed by statute is a license fee proper or a tax. In order to determine that question it is generally necessary to ascertain the purpose of the exaction and to determine the power by virtue of which it is made.

One of the latest textbooks on the subject (21 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law [2d Ed.] 773-775) in discussing the difference between a license fee proper and a tax, says that: "Where the fee is imposed for the purpose of regulation, and the statute requires compliance with certain conditions in addition to the payment of the prescribed sum, such sum is a license proper, imposed by virtue of the police power; but, where the fee is exacted solely for revenue purposes, and payment of such fee gives the right to carry on the business without the performance of any further conditions, it is a tax." This statement of the law seems to be fully sustained by the decisions of the courts.

The fee imposed upon social clubs has all the essential elements of a license tax. Its object is to regulate the sale of ardent spirits and intoxicating mixtures. The statute imposing the tax requires compliance with certain conditions to prevent a forfeiture of the charter of such a club; it provides to whom such articles may be sold or given away; that the clubhouse or meeting place of the club shall not be located in a building in which there is a licensed public bar; the hours during which the clubhouse or meeting place may be kept open; for reporting to the clerk of the court of the county or corporation in which the clubhouse or meeting place is located, monthly, a list of its members, and annually a list of its officers for the ensuing year; for the minimum entrance fees and monthly dues which shall be charged and collected; and declares that for a willful or negligent failure on the part of the social club to comply with said requirements it shall forfeit its charter.

But, even if the defendant had no authority to impose the license tax in question, the record does not show that it was not voluntarily paid. The circumstances under which the plaintiff paid are shown by the facts agreed, which upon this question are as follows: "That it paid the town of Phoebus 'under protest' $276.74, October 15, 1903, for license commencing October 10, 1903, and expiring April 30, 1904. The 'protest' referred to was in the form of a declaration made by the club to the town recorder at the time the license was issued, and which protest appears noted on stub of license book in recorder's office in these words: 'Paid under protest.'"

The common-law doctrine governing cases of this kind is stated as follows by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Lamborn v. Dickenson County, 97 U. S. 181, 24 L. Ed. 926: "Where a party pays an illegal demand with a full knowledge of all the facts which render such demand illegal, without an immediate and urgent necessity therefor, or unless to release his person or property from detention, or to prevent an immediate seizure of his person or property, such payment must be deemed voluntary, and cannot be recovered back. And the fact that the party at the time of making the payment files a written protest does not make the payment involuntary."

The reasons for this apparently harsh doctrine, and the difficulties which would result from a different rule, are stated by Judges Carr and Tucker with great clearness and force in Mayor, etc., of Richmond v. Judah, 5 Leigh, 306. See 2 Dillon on Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 944; 2 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 1499; 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 760, and cases cited; Lincoln v. City of Worcester, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 55, 66.

Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (volume 2 [4th Ed.] § 940), states that the same principles are applicable to actions for the recovery of money paid for illegal license taxes or fines imposed by a municipal court; and his statement is sustained by Judge Cooley, in his work on Taxation (volume 2 [3d Ed.] p. 1499). Emery, etc., v. City of Lowell, 127 Mass. 138; Town Council of Cahaba v. Burnett, 34 Ala. 400; Douglas v. Kansas City, 147 Mo. 428, 48 S. W. 851.

All payments are presumed to be voluntary until the contrary is made to appear. 2 Cooley on Taxation, p. 1499; 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 762. The burden of proof was therefore upon the plaintiff to show that its payment was not voluntary. The mere declaration of the defendant, when he made payment, that it was made under "protest," does not show that it was not voluntarily made. There is no evidence that the recorder of the town, who issued the license and noted the plaintiff's protest, was authorized to receive the payment made, or that he did receive it, or that he in any way brought any pressure to bear upon the plaintiff to compel payment of the license tax or had any power to do so, or that any other official of the defendant town demanded payment thereof or was making any effort to collect it.

In Union Pac., etc. R. Co. v. Commissioners, etc., 98 U. S. 541, 25 L. Ed. 196, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the payment of taxes under a written protest, without a demand therefor or an effort to collect the same, did not make the payment a compulsory one in such sense as to give the party paying the right to recover the amount thereof.

In Douglas v. Kansas City, supra, it was held that an illegal license tax was not recoverable where there is no evidence of threats or notification to pay. Neither can a party claim that he paid a license tax under compulsion, merely because of liability to fine and imprisonment in the event he did not pay. Town Council of Cahaba v. Burnett, 34 Ala. 400.

See, also, Emery v. Lowell, supra.

We are of opinion therefore to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, and enter judgment for the defendant town as the circuit court ought to have done.

WILSON et al. v. LANGHORNE et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEES—COMMISSIONS.

Where the premises conveyed by an assignment for the benefit of creditors are sold by a commissioner appointed by the court in partition proceedings, and not by the trustee named in the deed of assignment, the trustee is not entitled to commissions upon the fund realized by the sale under a clause of the deed entitling him to commissions for the sale of the property by him.

2. SAME—RIGHT TO EMPLOY COUNSEL.

Where the creditors interested in an assignment made by their debtor were sui juris and were brought before the court in a suit to partition the assigned property, and the trustee in the assignment, while made a formal party on the ground of his ownership of the legal title, had no real interest in the suit, and the property was sold by a commissioner of the court, and the funds were paid into court by him, so that the trustee was not even entitled to commissions, the trustee could not bind the creditors otherwise represented by counsel of their own choosing by a contract employing counsel to conduct an appeal.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Action for partition by Harry S. Langhorne against George W. Langhorne, trustee, etc., and others. The property in controversy was sold by commissioners, the proceeds were brought into court, and certain defendants, viz., W. D. Wilson, Jr., trustee under an assignment for the benefit of the creditors of A. A. Langhorne, F. W. Whitacre, and J. S. Diggs, petitioned for an allowance of commissions and counsel fees. The petitions were answered by the other parties to the suit, and, the relief prayed being denied, the petitioners appealed. Affirmed.

J. Singleton Diggs, for appellants. Caskie & Coleman, Leon Goodman, Harrison & Long, John H. & L. D. Lewis, and Alfred B. Percy, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The case before us is the sequel to that of Wilson, Trustee, v. Langhorne and Others, reported in 102 Va. 631, 47 S. E. 871. The case was then remanded to the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg to be proceeded in, in accordance with the opinion then expressed. A controversy having arisen over the disposition of the fund, a final decree was entered in the corporation court distributing it in accordance with its opinion, which is filed in the record. From that decree this appeal was taken.

As it states in a very satisfactory manner the reasons which control its decision, we adopt the opinion of the court, and affirm its decree:

"This suit was for partition and distribution of an estate held by Geo. W. Langhorne, trustee, for his wife for life, and upon her death to be equally divided among her children. There were a number of liens and claims against the interest of A. A. Langhorne, one of the beneficiaries in said estate, and the subject of this litigation was chiefly as to whether his interest in said estate passed under a deed of trust from A. A. Langhorne & Co. to Wm. V. Wilson, trustee, dated the 13th day of June, 1892.

"All the creditors of A. A. Langhorne and Wm. V. Wilson, trustee, were made parties to this suit, and many of them were represented by counsel. The property was all sold, and the proceeds brought into court by its commissioners. The controversy then arose between the creditors who had declined to release A. A. Langhorne & Co., as provided in said deed, and Geo. W. Langhorne, trustee, and those creditors who had accepted said release clause, over the distribution of the fund in the hands of the court's receiver.

"This court decided that the interest of A. A. Langhorne did not pass under the deed to Wm. V. Wilson, Jr., trustee, but on appeal this court was reversed, and the Court of Appeals held that A. A. Langhorne's interest passed under the deed to Wm. V. Wilson, Jr., trustee.

"The first question raised by the petitions is whether Wilson, trustee, is entitled to commission of 5 per centum on the fund belonging to A. A. Langhorne's creditors. Under said deed Wilson, trustee, would have been entitled to 5 per centum commission upon the fund passing through his hands as trustee from the sale of this property; but as he did not sell the same, it being sold by the commissioner of this court, would he be entitled to such commission? In other words, should the court decree the fund to Wilson, trustee, for distribution when the creditors are all before the court, in order that he may receive his commissions, and thus make the fund pay a commission to its commissioner and receiver and also to the trustee?

"I think not. Wilson, trustee, did not sell this property, which was a condition precedent to his being entitled to commissions. Besides, it has been the uniform practice of this court and all other nisi prius courts, where there is a deed of trust upon property, and the creditors are all before the court, and the court sells the property by its commissioner, to pay the fund directly to the creditors. A trustee is only the agent for creditor and debtor to act impartially between them in raising and distributing the funds in accordance with the deed; and where the court, by its commissioner, performs those functions, an allowance of commissions to the trustee would be a mere donation, rather than compensation, as said trustee never performed the services for which he was to receive commissions. Where a trustee has title to the whole fund, and the court enforces the trust, it will always execute it through the trustee, unless there is good cause for a different procedure, but whenever it does execute the trust through its commissioners the trustee is never allowed commissions. No case can be found where the trustee has title to only a small portion of the estate, to secure creditors who are before the court, which it is selling and distributing the proceeds among parties entitled thereto, where the fund was decreed to the trustee for distribution. Courts of equity do not go through needless forms. In his answer Wilson, trustee, did not ask the fund to be paid to him, but to the creditors, recognizing thereby this well-established rule of courts of equity. For the reasons above set forth the petition of Wilson, trustee, must be dismissed.

"The next question raised by the petitions is the right of Diggs and Whitaker to one-half of what each person will receive under said deed of trust as their fee for conducting the said appeal.

"Diggs and Whitaker were the purchasers of Mrs. Dirom's $1,000 claim at $100, and when they entered into the contract with Wilson, Jr., and took the appeal, and knew at that time that a number of the creditors had employed counsel to protect their interests, they made no mention of said contract or claim for fees, either to said attorneys of record or the creditors. They were not employed by any of the creditors, but by Wilson, trustee, who in his depositions says he never intended to employ them to represent any person who had his own counsel, and he did not consider he had the right to do so. None of the creditors who were unrepresented by counsel are contesting their claim to said fee, but only those who had counsel.

"It is undoubtedly well settled that a trustee, where there are doubts and difficulties attending the execution of his trust, may appeal to the court for guidance, and as incident to this right, or when legal advice is necessary, or when maintaining or defending the deed of trust in suits in which the cestui que trust is not a party, may employ counsel, and out of the fund pay reasonable counsel fees. The cases of Cochran v. Richmond & Alleghany R. Co., 91 Va. 339, 21 S. E. 664, and Berkeley & Harrison v. Green, 102 Va. 378, 46 S. E. 387, certainly fall under the above rule. In the first case the trustees only were parties to the suit, and not the bondholders, except in answer to the petition of Cabell & Smith for more fee. Cochran and all the bondholders in 1891 agreed upon the fee, but Cochran contended no part thereof should come out of the fund from which he was to be paid. In that case the trustees alone were asserting the rights of the bondholders, and, of course, were entitled to have counsel fees allowed. In the latter case Green, trustee, filed a bill asking the aid of the court in the execution of his trust, and therefore had the right to retain counsel for that purpose and pay them a fee out of the fund. But these cases are not analogous to the one at bar. Wilson, trustee, in this case was only a formal party holding the legal title, and all the creditors interested in the deed of trust were sui juris and before the court. He had no interest in the suit, not even for commissions, as the fund was not raised by him. It was not his duty nor had he the right of appeal if the court's view about his commissions is sound.

"A trustee has such a beneficial interest in the trust property that he may maintain an appeal from a decree distributing it or taking it out of his possession, or otherwise affecting it adversely to the interests of his cestui que trust, but where both the trustee and the cestui que trust are parties the trustee cannot maintain an appeal to review rulings in respect to the cestui que trust, who must appeal on his own behalf.' 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Pleading & Practice, p. 197; Stewart v. Codd, 58 Md. 86.

"It is true that in Virginia the Court of Appeals has held that a trustee may appeal, though the amount of no single debt secured in the deed of trust is $500. But is not this ruling based upon the supposition that the cestui que trust inspired the appeal, or the right which they have to use the name of the trustee to appeal? Bockes v. Hathorn, 78 N. Y. 222. The trustee being the agent of both parties, creditors and debtor, and bound to act impartially (Hudson v. Barham, 101 Va. 66, 43 S. E. 189, 99 Am. St. Rep. 849), what obligation is there upon him to appeal in a controversy between different creditors of the common debtor, unless urged to do so by some of the creditors, and, if done at the instance of some of the creditors, would he not represent them alone, and not those who desired no appeal? The Court of Appeals has in a recent case (Osborne v. Big Stone Gap Colliery Co., 96 Va. 68, 30 S. E. 446) held that a trustee in a deed of trust does not represent the creditors secured in proceedings in the courts of this state affecting the trust property. If, then, the trustee is not bound to appeal, and he does not represent the creditors in proceedings in the courts of the state, so that creditors would be bound by his representation, can he make contracts for counsel fees for an appeal when the parties already have counsel of their own choosing? What would be the practical result in this case if this contract were sustained? The creditors who had counsel practically would get nothing after paying their own counsel whom they employed and those whom the trustee employed for them. Some of these creditors would practically be paying one-half of the fund coming to them for the privilege of being beaten, or asserting their rights, as advised by counsel of their own choosing.

Again, Wilson, trustee, does not ask in his answer for any fee for his counsel, so that parties to the litigation might be put on notice as to such claim. Nor is the case of Howard v. First Nat. Bank (Va.) 27 S. E. 492, 2 Va. Dec. 513, analogous to this case. In that case Howard, by arduous litigation in the name of the trustee and by direction of the court, through the courts of this and many other states, brought a fund into the circuit court of the city of Richmond, where, in 1888, the bank filed its petition to become a party and prove its debt. Its counsel did nothing but file said petition and prove its claim, which was done without difficulty or much labor, and the court held that it should not receive the benefits of Howard's labors without just compensation therefor.

"It can certainly not be contended that the creditors who refused to release Langhorne, as required in said deed of trust, under advice of counsel, and his individual creditors secured in the third clause of his deed, receive any benefits from the services of Attorneys Diggs & Whitaker, which, upon a quantum meruit, would entitle them to one-half of the small proportion of their debts coming to them. It would be a case of going for wool and being shorn, and at the same time having to pay the shearers."

"The case of McDonald v. Logan, etc. (Va.) 34 S. E. 490, was decided upon the construction of a contract, and can have no bearing on this case. The federal courts are excessively liberal on the subject of granting fees to counsel, and no state court, especially in the South, ever follows them."

"For the reasons above set forth, the court does not think Wilson, trustee, is entitled to commissions, and Diggs & Whitaker have no contract for fees binding the creditors; but as to those creditors who were not represented in the suit and are not contesting their fees they may be allowed a fee of one-half of the recovery for each."

ARAGON COFFEE CO. v. ROGERS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

March 1, 1906.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS — PURCHASERS FROM BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

A purchaser of a note from a bona fide purchaser is entitled to stand in the place of the latter in enforcing the note, although he himself has notice of equities existing between the original parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 937-943.]

2. SAME—REPURCHASE BY PAYEE.

Where the payee of a note, after selling the same to a bona fide purchaser, repurchases it, he does not thereby acquire any better right against the maker than he possessed in the first instance.

3. EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTIONS — REFUSAL TO TESTIFY.

Where alleged facts are necessarily in the possession of a party, and he, when called as a witness, persistently and without any apparent reason refuses to disclose them, it may be presumed that such facts do not exist.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 95-100.]

4. BILLS AND NOTES—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS — QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The question of whether a purchase of a note from a bona fide purchaser was made in good faith, or was made as agent for the payee in order to defeat a defense of the maker as against the payee, was for the jury, where the purchase was made four months after the maturity of the note, with the knowledge that it involved a lawsuit and was made at the suggestion of a principal stockholder of the payee, who was closely related to the purchaser, where it involved the disposition of securities by the purchaser, and where the latter, on being put on the witness stand, persistently refused to explain why he made the purchase.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Alfred M. Rogers against J. W. Harrison, doing business under the name and style of Aragon Coffee Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

H. W. Goodwyn and S. A. Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Leake & Carter, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. J. W. Harrison, doing business under the name and style of the Aragon Coffee Company, of Richmond city, purchased of Hills Bros. Co., a corporation in the city of New York, 500 bags of coffee, for which it made its negotiable note for $3,727.02, dated January 11, 1904, payable four months after date to Hills Bros. Co., or order, at Planters' National Bank, Richmond, Va. Before the maturity of this note it was indorsed to the National Park Bank of New York, who it is conceded acquired it in the ordinary course of business, and was an innocent holder of it for value and without notice. When the note fell due, payment was demanded and refused, and the note was duly protested. On November 14, 1904, this note was indorsed to Alfred M. Rogers, without recourse, who paid to the National Park Bank $3,841.69, the full amount represented by the note, principal, and interest.

In March, 1905, Rogers sued the Aragon Coffee Company upon this note. The defendant pleaded nil debit and a plea of set-off, in which he avers that he purchased of Hills Bros. Co. a certain lot of coffee, which was represented to be sound and as good as the sample of coffee then and there exhibited to the defendant by Hills Bros. Co.; and that he afterwards purchased 500 sacks of the coffee, relying on the promise of Hills Bros. Co. that it was pure and unadulterated, and as good as the sample shown and exhibited to the defendant company. The plea then alleges that the coffee was not sound and free from defects, but was unsound, and that both the sample and the coffee had been tampered with and adulterated, but so skillfully and cunningly that the defendant did not discover the fraud and could not have discovered it without such a careful examination as no man would make unless he had reason to suspect the perpetration of a fraud; that the coffee delivered was so common and inferior, and gave forth such an offensive odor when roasted and made into a beverage, that it could not be used, as to use it in his business would damage his trade and reputation. The plea further avers that Hills Bros. Co. is the real plaintiff in the suit, and that it has formed an unlawful combination with the National Park Bank of New York and Alfred M. Rogers, the object of which was wrongfully and unlawfully and by deceit to cut defendant off and prevent him from showing his rightful and lawful set-offs and equities against said note. In conclusion he claims to have been damaged by the fraud practiced upon him in the sum of $1,987.10, which sum he seeks to have set off against the note, and the balance of $1,740.92 was brought into court, which the defendant stated he was ready to pay to the plaintiff.

Upon this plea issue was taken; and, evidence on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant on this plea having been introduced before the jury, the plaintiff demurred to the defendant's evidence, the jury found a verdict subject to the demurrer to the evidence, and the court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff, to be credited by the amount which the defendant had paid into court.

We observe in limine that there is no occasion to discuss the transaction as between the Aragon Coffee Company and Hills Bros. Co. The evidence is conclusive to show a bald and iniquitous fraud. The only question which we need to consider is whether or not the parties before the court occupy such a relation to the transaction as that, under the law merchant, we must shut our eyes to the truth and close the door upon all investigation.

The National Park Bank, being the holder for value and without notice, could transmit a complete title to a third person, even though that third person had knowledge of the facts which would have defeated a recovery upon the note in the hands of the payee; the general rule being that, "if a person take with notice purchase from one without notice, he is entitled to stand in the latter's shoes and take shelter under his good faith. If it were not so, the bona fide purchaser without notice might be unable to dispose of the property, and thus its value in his hands be materially deteriorated. A bona fide holder, it is said, is entitled to have the whole world for his market.

But there is an exception to this rule, which is well established: If the payee sell negotiable paper to an innocent third party and repurchase it, he does not thereby acquire any better right against the maker than he possessed in the first instance. Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in Andrews v. Robertson, 87 N. W. 190, 54 L. R. A. 673, 87 Am. St. Rep. 870; Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 432; Ely v. Wilcox, 26 Wla. 91; Elwell v. Tatum, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 397, 24 S. W. 71, 25 S. W. 434; Hoye v. Kalashian (R. I.) 46 Atl. 271; Tod v. Wick Bros., 36 Ohio St. 370.

Judge Cooley, in Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, says: "As a general rule, the bona fide holder of negotiable paper has a right to sell the same, with all the rights and equities attaching to it in his own hands, to whoever may see fit to buy of him, whether such purchaser was aware of the original infirmity or not. Without this right he would not have the full protection which the law merchant designs to afford him, and negotiable paper would cease to be a safe and reliable medium for the exchanges of commerce. For, if one can stop the negotiability of paper against which there is no defense, held by another, it is obvious that an important element in its value is at once taken away. But this rule has never been applied to a purchase by the original payee, and it is not essential to the protection of the innocent indorsee that it should be. It cannot be very important to him that there is one person incapable of succeeding to his equities, and who consequently would not be likely to become a purchaser. If he may sell to all the rest of the community, the market value of his security is not likely to be affected by the circumstance that a single individual cannot compete for its purchase—especially when it is considered that the nature of the negotiable securities is such that their market value is very little influenced by competition. Nor is there any rule or principle of law that would be violated by permitting the maker to set up his defense against the payee, when he becomes the indorsee, with the same effect that he might have done before it had been sold at all; nor is there any valid reason against it."

In this case, then, it was not sufficient for the defendant to show that there was fraud in the transaction between him and Hills Bros. Co., for, notwithstanding that fraud, the National Park Bank, being a bona fide holder of the note, could transmit, and Rogers, the plaintiff, could acquire, a title to the note, free from all antecedent equities, unless there was evidence tending to prove that Rogers purchased, not for himself, but for the original payee in the note, Hills Bros. Co., and that this company and not Rogers was the actual beneficial plaintiff. We will therefore consider the evidence in the light of these principles.

The only evidence adduced by the plaintiff was the note upon which he sued. Having read that to the jury, he rested.

The history of that note is given in the record. The National Park Bank acquired it, as we have already said, in due course of business, and is, under the law merchant, to be considered an innocent holder for value and without notice.

On May 16, 1904, the attorney for the National Park Bank wrote to the Aragon Coffee Company the following letter:

"Gentlemen: My client, the National Park Bank, holds your note for the sum of $3,727.02 to the order of the Hills Bros. Co. which matured on the 11th inst. and has been returned from the bank where it was payable protested. The note has been placed in my hands with instructions to take such steps as may be necessary to collect it, and I have to request that you will send me without delay your check for the amount of the note, with interest to date and $1.00 protest fees."

To this letter the Aragon Coffee Company replied, through its attorney:

"Richmond, Va., May 24, 1904.

"* * * Your letter of May 16th to the Aragon Coffee Co. has been referred to me, and in reply I beg to state that this note represents the purchase price of coffee bought by the Aragon Coffee Co. from Hills Bros. & Co. The said coffee was not according to sample and that the attention of Hills Bros. was called to this in several letters to them from the Aragon Coffee Co. some time past, but which they refused to consider. My clients are perfectly square people in every particular, but do not propose to pay for coffee that they cannot use. I would suggest that you will probably find your way easier to make this money out of Hill Bros. & Co. than out of the Aragon Coffee Co.

"Very truly yours, H. W. Goodwyn."

It is among the agreed facts in the case that Hills Bros. Co. had to their credit with the National Park Bank during all the period covered by this investigation at least the sum of $5,000. It appears that one of the principal stockholders in Hills Bros. Co. was the father-in-law of the plaintiff, Rogers; that his brother-in-law was the president of the company; and that his wife was one of the stockholders in the company. It further appears that the first information Rogers had with respect to this note was derived from his father-in-law; that at his suggestion the plaintiff went to the attorney for the National Park Bank, in whose custody the note was; that he purchased it, paying the full principal and interest due upon the note; that in order to make the purchase he had to raise the money by the sale of stocks; that he took the note from the bank without recourse after it had been protested, and with the knowledge that its collection would involve lawsuit. He was put upon the stand as a witness by the plaintiff in error, and every effort to elicit the truth with respect to this transaction was met with evasion, equivocation, or silence. He was asked if to answer the questions would tend to incriminate him. He replied that it would not. The question again would be put to him, and he would again decline to answer. Why he should have desired to make this investment, when in order to make it he found it necessary to change his investment and dispose of stocks, it is impossible to answer with even a reasonable conjecture. He paid full value for a protested note; he took it without recourse; he knew that it involved a lawsuit; and yet, when called upon to explain, every question was met with a refusal to answer.

In Wigmore on Evidence (volume 1, § 285) it is said: "The consciousness indicated by conduct may be, not an indefinite one affecting the weakness of the cause at large, but a specific one concerning the defects of a particular element in the cause. The failure to bring before the tribunal some circumstance, document, or witness, when either the party himself or his opponent claims that the facts would thereby be elucidated, serves to indicate, as the most natural inference, that the party fears to do so, and this fear is some evidence that the circumstance or document or witness, if brought, would have exposed facts unfavorable to the party. These inferences, to be sure, cannot fairly be made except upon certain conditions; and they are also open always to explanation by circumstances which make some other hypothesis a more natural one than the party's fear of exposure. But the propriety of such an inference in general is not doubted. The nonproduction of evidence that would naturally have been produced by an honest, and therefore fearless, claimant permits the inference that its tenor is unfavorable to the party's cause."

And continuing this subject, the same author, at section 289, says: "At common law the party-opponent in a civil case was ordinarily privileged from taking the stand; but he was also disqualified; and hence the question could rarely arise whether his failure to testify could justify any inference against him. But since general abolition both of the privilege and the disqualification, the party has become both competent and compellable like other witnesses; and the question plainly arises whether his conduct is to be judged by the same standards of inference. This question should naturally be answered in the affirmative."

It seems plain to us that there is a stronger presumption to be raised against a party in whose possession the facts must be, if they exist, by which suspicion would be removed and all question as to the propriety of his conduct be set at rest, who stolidly refuses, without the suggestion of a reason, to aid the court in arriving at the truth. It is within the bonds of possibility that a reason existed why, "as a matter of business," to use his own language, the plaintiff may have thought it desirable to buy a protested note which he knew could only be collected as the result of lawsuit. If such explanatory facts existed, they were in his breast, and his refusal to disclose them warrants the hypothesis that he feared the exposure.

As was said in Union Bank v. Stone, 50 Me. 595, 79 Am. Dec. 631: "There was evidence proving or tending to prove that a notice of demand and nonpayment had been given the defendant. He had been notified to produce it, and did not. He was present and not a witness. If he had never received such a notice, he knew it, and, knowing it, would be little likely to omit an opportunity of stating a fact thus conclusively in his favor. The evidence tended strongly to charge him. A word from his lips might exonerate him from all liability. * * * If notice had been received, and the defendant knew it, he might well be silent. The utterances of the truth would establish the plaintiff's claim. * * * If he were a witness, he must either state the truth or a falsehood. If he testified truly, his hope of a successful defense was at an end. The defendant does not offer his own testimony. He prefers the adverse inferences which he cannot but perceive may be drawn therefrom, to any statements he could truly give or to any explanations he might make. He prefers any inferences to giving his testimony. Why? Because no inferences can be more adverse than would be the testimony he would be obliged by the truth to give. The fact of not testifying was obvious to the jury. * * * No court could perceive such a fact without attaching some degree of importance, more or less, to its existence, according to the necessity of the testimony and the emergencies of the defense. No judge exists who would not, if the trial had been before him, regard this as a fact bearing on his decision."

And in Brown v. Schock, 77 Pa. 471, it is said: "A man of ordinary intelligence must know that his failing to appear, when he had a strong motive to appear, would be evidence against him; if he relies upon his liability to disprove the motive imputed, he takes the risk, but he leaves the effect of his conduct, as a matter of evidence for the opposite side, to go to the jury."

In Bastrop State Bank v. Levy, 106 La. 586, 31 South. 164, the court said: "Judicial tribunals are established to administer justice between litigants, and the first and most important step to that end is the ascertainment of the truth of the controversies which come before them. It is only when the truth is ascertained that the law can be properly applied in the just settlement of disputes. Litigants owe the duty of assisting in every legitimate way in the elucidation of the truth. When a defendant can by his own testimony throw light upon matters at issue, necessary to his defense and peculiarly within his own knowledge if the facts exist, and fails to go upon the witness stand, the presumption is raised, and will be given effect to, that the facts do not exist."

These cases are cited, not because of any similitude of their facts to the case before us, but because all of them illustrate and enforce the principle that, when a party can by his own testimony throw light upon the matter in issue and fails to go upon the witness stand, the presumption is raised, and will be given effect to, that the facts do not exist.

In the case of Battersbee v. Calkins (Mich.) 87 N. W. 760, a firm of Niagara Falls, N. Y., were payees and holders of the note in suit. It was a negotiable promissory note, payable to their order. It was sold before maturity to a savings bank in Detroit, under circumstances which admittedly made the bank a bona fide purchaser. It was sold to this bank by the attorney of the payees, to whom it had been sent for collection. It did not appear whether or not the payees directed such sale. The attorney indorsed the note before sale in blank, as the payees had previously done. The note went to protest for nonpayment, and subsequently it was indorsed to "any bank or order," over the signature of the savings bank, and transferred to a state bank, which sent to the savings bank its check for the amount due upon the note. Plaintiff was the cashier of the state bank, and testified that he was not the owner of the note, and had brought this action for the benefit of the bank. The defendant, who was the maker of the note, sought to show that the note was obtained by fraudulent representations made by an agent of the payees. The attorney for the payees before mentioned, called as a witness for the defendant, testified that he received the note before maturity for collection, and indorsed and sold it to the savings bank, and received payment of the consideration, which he put in the bank to his own credit, and checked out, as he did other money. That he sold the note because he wanted to, and did not know that he was directed to do so by the payees. It was shown that after protest of the note this attorney had a conversation about the note with a stockholder and director of the state bank, who was also its attorney, who said that his bank would take it. The attorney of the payees before mentioned also wrote plaintiff, who was cashier of that bank, about the note, as did also the city bank after the attorney of the payees had told its officers that the state bank, of which plaintiff was cashier, would take the note. The court permitted the jury to find that the purchase of the note by the state bank, of which plaintiff was cashier, was collusive, as agent for the payees, holding that, if it was not a purchaser in the ordinary sense, it would not be entitled to set up the bona fides of the savings bank, and refused to direct a verdict for the plaintiff. In considering this question on a writ of error from a judgment in favor of the defendant, the Supreme Court said: "The plaintiff's counsel say that, being indorsed in blank, the possession of the note was sufficient proof of plaintiff's right to sue, and that it was error to permit the jury to defeat the plaintiff upon this ground, which they may have done under the charge. In the case of Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, it was held that the payee of a note could not avoid the equities in favor of the maker by repurchasing the note from a bona fide holder, to whom he had sold it. This rule should apply in this case, if, as claimed, the transfer to the Crowell bank (the bank of which the plaintiff was the cashier) was colorable only, to cover an actual payment or repurchase by Myers & Co. (the payees), or by their attorney on their behalf."

The case under consideration is, in our judgment, far stronger to show a collusive purchase upon the part of Rogers than the one cited. The facts which are set forth in this opinion, coupled with the conduct of the plaintiff when upon the stand as a witness, inexplicable upon any reasonable hypothesis, except that he feared to disclose the truth and preferred to take the chance of success by permitting the court and jury to grope for facts in the dark, when a word from him giving a rational account of his conduct would have dispelled all doubt, warranted the jury in believing that the National Park Bank, being possessed of funds belonging to Hills Bros. Co., which company was ultimately liable to it for the note, concluded not to risk a lawsuit but to look to its immediate indorser, Hills Bros. Co., and so informed that company, which then hatched the scheme of a purchase of the note by Rogers, and thus hoped to consummate its fraud.

We think, upon the whole case, it was for the jury to say whether Rogers was a purchaser in good faith or was conniving with Hills Bros. Co. to purchase the note as their agent, in order to defeat the equities of the Aragon Coffee Company.

It follows that the judgment upon the demurrer should have been in favor of the defendant, and this court will enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered.

CARDWELL and HARRISON, JJ., absent.

(105 Va. 96)

HATTON v. MOUNTFORD et ux.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT—DUTIES OF SERVANT.

Where there is no express contract between an employer and an employé, imposing upon the latter a higher degree of skill and diligence in the discharge of his duties, only the ordinary and reasonable skill and diligence which is implied by law can be required of him, but, if he contracts for a higher degree of skill and diligence than the law implies, he must perform his duties with the skill for which he contracts, and cannot excuse himself for failing to do so by showing that he performed the duties of his position with the ordinary degree of skill and diligence required by law.

2. SAME.

A contract employing a music teacher which required the teacher to be loyal in the management of the school, to put forth his best efforts for the advancement of the music department, to unite in building up the institution, and to assist in maintaining discipline, required the teacher to give a higher degree and grade of service than is implied by law in the ordinary contract between master and servant.

3. SAME—DISCHARGE OF SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

A contract by which defendant employed plaintiff as a music teacher required the latter to aid in building up the school, to assist in maintaining discipline, and to put forth his best efforts for the advancement of the music department, thus imposing on him the duty to exercise a higher degree of skill and diligence than is ordinarily implied by law in a contract between master and servant. Defendant was discharged by plaintiff, and in an action for the discharge there was evidence that defendant was inattentive to his duties, rude to pupils and other teachers, and had, in short, about destroyed the music department. The court attempted to cover the whole case by a charge to find for defendant if plaintiff by his negligence and discourtesy so conducted himself as to injure plaintiff's business by causing pupils to leave the school or to refuse to take music. Held, that the charge was erroneous in failing to bring to the jury's attention the point that plaintiff had contracted for a higher degree of skill and diligence than is ordinarily implied by law in the relationship of master and servant.

4. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — SUFFICIENCY — PRESENTATION OF WHOLE CASE.

An instruction given as covering the entire case should embrace material points in the case, although requested instructions presenting the individual points of the case are in themselves objectionable.

Error to Corporation Court of Danville.

Action by G. Fryatt Mountford and wife against R. E. Hatton. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The first three instructions, requested by defendant and refused, and which are referred to in the opinion, are as follows:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that, although the plaintiff, F. G. Mountford may possess the capacity to make a good teacher, if he failed to put forth the best efforts of that capacity while in the employ of defendant, then the defendant had a right to dismiss him without liability, and they must find for the defendant.

"(2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs, G. F. and E. E. Mountford, failed to put forth their best efforts for the advancement of the music department of Roanoke College of Danville, or failed to be perfectly loyal to the management of the school, or failed to try to work in harmony with the assistant music teachers, then the defendant had a right to discharge them, without further liability under the contract of employment and the jury must find for the defendant.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that every employé impliedly undertakes to obey the just and reasonable commands of the employer, and to be careful, diligent and industrious in the performance of what is intrusted to him to execute; and if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs failed under their contract of employment, in any of the above named particulars, then the defendant had a right to dissolve the contract and dismiss them without liability, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Green, Withers & Green, for plaintiff in error. Julian Meade, for defendants in error.

CARDWELL, J. The judgment to which this writ of error was awarded was obtained by the defendants in error against the plaintiff in error for damages alleged to have been sustained by the act of the latter in discharging the former from his employ.

Plaintiff in error was on the date of the discharge of defendants in error, and for some time prior, the president of Roanoke College, at Danville, Va. The college is an institution of learning for young ladies, situated in said city and conducted under the auspices of the Baptist Church. Among its other departments is one of music, in which both vocal and instrumental music are taught, and prior to the opening of the session of the college in September, 1904, a correspondence was begun between plaintiff in error and G. F. Mountford, one of the defendants in error, looking to the employment of Mountford and his wife to have charge of and conduct the music department of the college during its then ensuing session. Plaintiff in error prepared, signed, and mailed to G. F. Mountford, to be signed by him and his wife, the following contract:

Danville, Va., July 29, 1904.

"This contract entered into by and between R. E. Hatton, party of the first part, and G. Fryatt Mountford and wife, parties of second part; whereby parties of the second part agree to come to Roanoke College, of Danville, and unite in the building up of the college, and do what they can to that end and to be perfectly loyal to management of school and to do or say nothing to the detriment of the college or of the teachers. Prof. Mountford agrees to teach in the college, in the music department piano especially and such other studies as necessary in the music department, to teach for a period of thirty hours per week; to put forth his best efforts for the advancement of the department; to try to work in harmony with the assistant music teacher; and to assist in maintaining discipline in the college and home. Mrs. Mountford agrees to supervise or assist in supervising and superintending the piano practice if necessary. For such the parties of the second part are to receive the sum of $550, for the session work, from R. E. Hatton. This is to be paid by said R. E. Hatton, in eight equal payments if desired by said parties of the second part. It is further agreed that three months' notice is to be given before this contract is nullified, or teachers employed for next year, by either party.

"[Signed] R. E. Hatton,

"Party of the First Part.

"[Signed]

"[Signed]"

Mountford, instead of signing this contract as he received it, made a certain change therein, viz., by inserting the words "payable monthly" after "in eight equal payments," and striking out the words, "if desired by said parties of the second party"; and having made this change Mountford copied the contract, and he and his wife signed it and returned it at once to plaintiff in error.

There is no evidence tending to prove any other contract than that signed by defendants in error and returned to plaintiff in error, except that no mention is made therein or in the contract as prepared by plaintiff in error of room and board to be furnished to defendants in error in addition to the salary they were to receive; but no question arises in this suit as to room and board, as that matter was agreed upon by correspondence, and they were, in fact, furnished room and board by plaintiff in error up to the time of their discharge on December 8, 1904, and about two weeks thereafter.

Their contract having been completed, defendants in error came to Roanoke College on or about September 18, 1904, and began the performance of their respective duties—Mountford as director of the department of music, and Mrs. Mountford supervising the piano practice. For about two weeks they performed their duties fairly satisfactorily, as is admitted, but from that time on until their discharge plaintiff in error a number of times, as he claims, considered it necessary to remonstrate with Mountford and ask for a better performance of his duties; complaints having been made that he had not only been negligent in the performance of his duties in several respects, and on a number of occasions, but on one occasion was guilty of the use of vulgar and repulsive language in the presence of one of his pupils and the brother of another. These remonstrances were of no avail, and in the latter part of November, 1904, nine of the young ladies in the department of instrumental music went to plaintiff in error's office at the college and vigorously complained of Mountford, and after stating their grievances notified plaintiff in error that they would stop instrumental music or leave the college altogether if Mountford was retained as director of music. By reason of this act of these young ladies, plaintiff in error again remonstrated with Mountford, and warned him that, unless he gave proper attention to his duties, he would be dismissed, and plaintiff in error about this time began a correspondence with a musical agency looking to providing a substitute should the discharge of Mountford become necessary.

On the 8th of December, 1904, a paper signed by 19 of the 23 or 24 pupils of the college then in Mountford's department was presented to plaintiff in error, and after inquiry of some of the signers as to the causes for their presenting the paper he called Mountford into his office, explained the purport of the paper, which was that Mountford had been so negligent and inefficient in the discharge of his duties the signers refused to study under him after the beginning of the second term of the school (the second half of the session), and told Mountford that under the circumstances he could no longer retain him and his wife, and must dismiss them, which he did then and there. At Mountford's request, a number of the young ladies who had signed the paper referred to were brought into his presence and questioned as to their reasons for sending in the paper, and their answers given in Mountford's presence. Whereupon he was informed that his dismissal could not be withdrawn.

The foregoing are the facts, many of which are not controverted, relied on by plaintiff in error to justify him in discharging defendants in error, except as applied to Mrs. Mountford; she having been, as is claimed, negligent in two respects which we do not deem it necessary to consider.

The verdict and judgment on plaintiff in error's special plea, plea of not guilty, and a plea of tender of the true amount due to defendants in error for services to date of their discharge, were in favor of the latter, as damages, for $628, subject to a credit of $98.44, paid into court by plaintiff in error.

There were no instructions asked or given for defendants in error, and the first assignment of error is the refusal of the court to give three of the five instructions asked by plaintiff in error.

No. 5 deals solely with the amount of damages recoverable by defendants in error, and need not again be referred to.

No. 4 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiffs, Prof. and Mrs. Mountford, or either of them, so conducted themselves that by their carelessness, negligence, or inattention to their duties, or by their neglect and failure to perform the same, or that the plaintiff G. F. Mountford, by his rudeness and discourtesy to the students and pupils in his department, so conducted himself as to prejudice, injure, or damage the defendant, Hatton, in his business as principal of Roanoke College, or that such carelessness, inattention, and negligence in performing, or in neglecting and failing to perform such duties, or that such rudeness and discourtesy to his said pupils and students in his said department, were calculated to or might prejudice, injure, or damage said defendant, Hatton, in his said business, by causing said pupils and students, or any of them, to leave said institution or to refuse longer to take music under said plaintiffs, or either of them, in said college, that then the defendant, Hatton, had the right to dismiss and discharge said plaintiffs without notice, and without furnishing board and room, and without paying further salary beyond the time of dismissal, notwithstanding said defendant, Hatton, had agreed to furnish said plaintiffs room and board and to pay them $550 for services for a full session, and to give three months' notice before terminating their contract, and they should find for the defendant."

The questions in the case were, first, what was the contract between the parties? and, second, had defendants in error, or either of them, been guilty of such misconduct or neglect in the discharge of their duties, as, under their contract, justified plaintiff in error in discharging them from his employ?

Where there is no express contract between an employer and an employé imposing upon the latter a higher degree of skill, care, diligence, and attention in the discharge of the duties of the position he contracts to fill, only the ordinary and reasonable skill, care, diligence, and attention implied by law can be required of him. But if an employé contracts for a higher degree of skill, etc., than the law implies, he cannot excuse himself from a failure to live up to his contract by merely showing that he performed the duties of his position with the ordinary and reasonable degree of skill, etc., required of him by law. He must perform his duties with the degree and grade of service for which he contracts. Crescent Horse Shoe Co. v.

Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. 935; Wood on Master & Servant, § 15.

As we have already observed, there was, so far as this record discloses, no evidence tending to prove a contract between these parties other than that set forth in the paper set out above as copied by Mountford, signed by himself and wife, and returned to plaintiff in error, except as to board and room to be furnished by the latter to the former, omitted from the contract as originally drawn by plaintiff in error and as changed and copied by Mountford, about which there is no controversy. By that contract the duties to be performed by defendants in error were set out, and they contracted "to be perfectly loyal to management of school and to do or say nothing to the detriment of the college or of the teachers," and Mountford, as teacher "in the college in the music department, piano especially, and such other studies as necessary in the music department," agreed "to teach for a period of thirty hours per week, to put forth his best efforts for the advancement of the department, to try to work in harmony with the assistant music teachers, and to assist in maintaining discipline in the college and home." If in fact this was the contract between the parties, it called for, not the ordinary and reasonable efforts implied by law, but a higher degree and grade of service.

As to whether or not Mountford performed his duties with reasonable and ordinary skill, diligence, and attention, there is a sharp conflict in the testimony, and there is also conflict as to whether he put forth his best efforts for the advancement of the music department. But upon the point made as a justification of the discharge of Mountford, that by his acts, omissions, misconduct, discourtesy to other teachers, and the use of vulgar and repulsive language in the presence of his pupils and friends of the school, he had about broken up the department of instrumental music at the college, there is little or no conflict. It is proved by every witness examined on behalf of plaintiff in error, except two who were not asked as to it, and it was also proved by the petition above referred to, signed by 19 of the 23 or 24 young ladies in Mountford's department, offered in evidence, and, in fact, no attempt is made by Mountford or his witnesses to refute it. Mountford does not deny that he used vulgar and repulsive language in speaking of a mistake made by one of his pupils to a brother of another one of his pupils, in the presence of still another, but merely says that he did not recall using the language; but, if he did, he would not have used it if he had known of the presence of the young lady in the room. It is also an uncontroverted fact in the case that the music department in a young ladies' college, under present conditions, is indispensable, and the most profitable department of such a college. So that, with that fact, and the further fact testified to and practically not denied, that Mountford had by his misconduct, negligence, and other acts about destroyed that department of Roanoke College, so far as the first half session of 1904-05 was concerned, plaintiff in error was entitled to an instruction that the defendants in error were not entitled to recover in this action unless the jury believed from the evidence that they had given that degree of skill, care, diligence, and attention in the performance of the duties they represented themselves as ready and able to render, and contracted to render. While instruction No. 4, given, is a complete and comprehensive statement of the law applicable to a case where an employé has contracted for no higher degree of skill, care, diligence, and attention in the discharge of the duties he undertakes than that implied by law, viz., ordinary and reasonable, it does not cover this entire case, and left the jury free to find for defendants in error if they believed from the evidence that defendants in error discharged their duties to plaintiff in error with ordinary and reasonable skill, etc., although they had contracted for a higher degree of efficiency, skill, etc.

The purpose of instructions Nos. 1 and 2, refused, was to direct the attention of the jury to the higher degree and grade of capacity, skill, etc., that the evidence tended to show their contract required of them than is implied by law in ordinary contracts between master and servant, and to instruct the jury that if they believed that Mountford had not put forth his best efforts, etc., or that defendants in error had, by their lack of capacity and skill, inattention to their duties, or misconduct, violated their contract, plaintiff in error had a right to discharge them from his employment, without liability in damages for doing so.

Instruction No. 4, given, purported to cover the entire case, yet omitted to bring to the attention of the jury the point contended for by plaintiff in error, viz., that defendants in error had contracted for a higher degree and grade of skill, etc., in the discharge of the duties of the positions they undertook to fill than the law implies, and as indicated in instruction No. 4.

It may be conceded that instructions Nos. 1 and 2, refused, were equivocal in submitting that phase of the case to the jury, or were otherwise objectionable, yet as it was a material point in the case, to which much of the evidence was directed, it should have been covered by instruction No. 4 which was given as covering the entire case. Berthe Zinc Co. v. Martin's Admr., 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869; Crescent Horse Shoe Co. v. Eynon, supra.

Instruction No. 4 was one of a series of instructions intended to cover the whole case, and when left standing alone was clearly misleading, for the reason that under it the jury might have found their verdict in favor of the defendants in error without taking into consideration the question whether or not they had performed their duties with that higher degree and grade of service for which they had contracted, than that implied by law where there is no such contract. In our view of the case it cannot be said that the jury were not so misled, and therefore the judgment on their verdict complained of must be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

NORFOLK, P. & N. N. CO. v. CITY OF NORFOLK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 1, 1906.)

1. TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

The power and the right of the state to impose a tax is always presumed, and any exemption must be clearly granted; mere silence being the same as a denial of exemption.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, §§ 307, 322.]

2. LICENSES—EXEMPTIONS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

A lessee of property owned by the state and consequently exempt from taxation under the express provisions of Code 1887, § 488 [Va. Code 1904, p. 250], may, notwithstanding such exemption, be subjected to the payment of a license tax for conducting a business on or with such property.

3. SAME—MUNICIPAL TAXES—RIGHT TO IMPOSE.

The fact that the state does not impose a license tax on a business does not prevent a municipality from imposing such a tax.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Licenses, §§ 5, 6.]

4. SAME—CONSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS—UNIFORMITY OF TAX.

An ordinance imposing a license tax generally upon any person operating a steam ferry between certain points does not, when considered with other ordinances authorizing the imposition of a license tax on steam ferries operated between other points, violate the constitutional requirement of uniformity, although there is but one company engaged in operating steam ferries between the points first mentioned.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Licenses, §§ 8, 9.]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—PRESUMPTIONS.

The burden is upon one alleging the invalidity of an ordinance to establish such invalidity.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the city of Norfolk against the Norfolk, Portsmouth & Newport News Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

T. J. Wool and Frank L. Crocker, for plaintiff in error. Richard B. McIlwaine, Jr., for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The principal question involved in this case is whether or not the city of Norfolk has the power to impose a license tax upon the Norfolk, Portsmouth & Newport News Company, doing business in that city, when the instrumentalities of that business are owned by and leased from the county of Norfolk and the city of Portsmouth.

It appears that the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk are the joint owners of certain steam ferries which ply by authority of law between the city of Norfolk and the city of Portsmouth, and between the city of Norfolk and the town of Berkley, known as the "Norfolk County Ferries." By authority of law the said owners of the ferries leased the ferries to one J. L. Watson and others for a period of 10 years at an annual rental, one-half of which was to be paid to the city of Portsmouth and the other half to the county of Norfolk. This lease was assigned to the appellant, the Norfolk, Portsmouth & Newport News Company, which was operating the lease at the time the license in question was imposed by the city of Norfolk, in which is located the principal offices of the appellant company.

It is conceded that under section 457 of the Code of 1887, as amended by an act approved January 28, 1896 (Acts 1895-96, p. 218, c. 178 [Va. Code 1904, p. 239]), section 488 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 250], and the case of Black v. Sherwood, 84 Va. 906, 6 S. E. 484, the real and personal property leased in this case are exempt from taxation.

Since the city of Norfolk has no authority to impose a tax upon the leased property, it is argued that it has no power to impose a license tax upon the business of the lessee in operating the ferries, and whose principal office is in that city.

The appellant in conducting its business is entitled to, and receives, the police protection and supervision of the city of Norfolk, and no good reason is perceived why it should not bear some part of the expense of the city government, unless it has been granted immunity from taxation. The power and the right of the state to tax are always presumed, and the exemption is to be clearly granted. Mere silence is the same as a denial of exemption. Lake Drummond Canal Co. v. Com., 103 Va. 337, 348, 349, 49 S. E. 506, 68 L. R. A. 92; Phoenix, etc., Ins. Co. v. State of Tenn., 161 U. S. 174, 16 Sup. Ct. 471, 40 L. Ed. 660.

There is nothing in any of the acts of assembly relied on which expressly or by necessary implication exempts the lessee of property, which is itself exempt from taxation, from the payment of a license tax for conducting a business on or with such property. If there be no such exemption, the fact that the state does not impose a license tax thereon for state purposes does not prevent a municipality, clothed with all the power of taxation possessed by the state within its corporate limits, from imposing such tax.

In the case of the City of Norfolk v. Griffith-Powell Co., 102 Va. 115, 45 S. E. 889, it was held that the city of Norfolk possessed such power under its charter, and the mere fact that the state did not impose a license tax upon a particular business did not prevent the city from imposing such tax. See Harkreader v. Turnpike Co., 101 Tenn. 680, 683, 49 S. W. 751; City of New Orleans v. Crappel, 18 La. Ann. 725.

It is also insisted by the appellant that the ordinance violates the constitutional requirement of uniformity, as there were other steam ferries plying between Norfolk and Pinners Point and West Norfolk, in the county of Norfolk, and between Norfolk and Gilmerton, which are not taxed by the terms of the ordinance.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that the appellant operated the only steam ferries that were in operation between Norfolk and Portsmouth and Norfolk and Berkley at that time, but the ordinance (No. 134) in terms imposed a license generally upon any person, firm, or corporation operating a steam ferry between those points, respectively, so that any other person, firm, or corporation who might engage in the same business would be subject to the same tax. While that ordinance does not impose a license tax upon any person, firm, or corporation engaged in operating ferries in the city of Norfolk other than those operated between Norfolk and Portsmouth and Norfolk and Berkley, there is another ordinance (No. 143) under which a license tax be imposed upon them, and there is nothing in the agreed statement of facts to show that such license is not imposed. Neither does it appear that all persons in the same class or doing precisely the same business are not taxed alike. Morgan's Case, 98 Va. 812, 35 S. E. 448. When an ordinance is attacked upon the ground that it is invalid, the burden is upon the party alleging its invalidity to show it.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and that it should be affirmed.

CARDWELL, J., absent.

(105 Va. 129)

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. TIDEWATER RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 1, 1906.)

1. RAILROADS — CONSTRUCTION — CROSSING OTHER RAILROADS — PROCEEDINGS BEFORE COMMISSIONS.

The State Corporation Commission, in inquiring into the necessity of the propriety of the location of a crossing by one railroad over the tracks of another, under Code 1904, § 1294b, cl. 3, acts in its capacity as a court of record, and, under section 1813a, cl. 23, of the Code, providing that the commission when so acting shall observe and administer the common-law and statutory rules of evidence, should not, except in rare cases, call witnesses not introduced by either party, and, if it does call such witnesses, should swear them as witnesses called by the parties are sworn.

2. SAME—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error of the State Corporation Commission in admitting evidence is not ground for reversing their order in reference to the location of a railroad crossing, unless the other evidence in the case is not sufficient to support its finding.

3. SAME—NOTICE OF PROPOSED CROSSING.

Under Code 1904, § 1294b, cl. 3, providing that, before a railroad which crosses another road commences to work upon such crossing, the general managing officer of the former road shall submit plans and specifications to the general officer of the latter, and the general officer of the latter may apply to the State Corporation Commission to inquire into the necessity of the crossing within 15 days after the service of notice of such plans, a railroad which had failed to come to any agreement with another railroad which sought to cross its tracks and which was served by the latter road with a notice, in substantial compliance with the statute, of the proposed crossing, and which, within 15 days after receiving such notice, commenced proceedings before the corporation commission to have the propriety of the crossing determined, could not contend before the commission that the notice was not a sufficient compliance with the statute.

4. SAME—QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

Under Code 1904, c. 1294b, cl. 3, providing for proceedings before the State Corporation Commission for the determination of the necessity for a proposed railroad crossing and the place where and manner in which such crossing should be made, and further providing that, in case the method of crossing is determined upon, the compensation to be paid by the party desiring to make the crossing shall be ascertained according to the laws regulating the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the question of whether the crossing of the tracks of one railroad by another is a taking of property within the constitutional prohibitions against taking property without compensation and without due process of law is not involved in the proceedings before the commission.

5. SAME — PROPRIETY OF CROSSING — DETERMINATION.

Const. § 168 [Code 1904, p. cclxi], provides that railroads shall have the right to parallel, intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad. Code 1904, § 1294d, cl. 62, authorizes railroads to cross other railroads in the manner prescribed by section 1294b. The latter section requires crossings to be so constructed as not to impair or obstruct the works and operations of the railroad sought to be crossed, and requires them to be supported by proper structures, etc. Held that, while a railroad ordinarily ought not to be permitted to cross the throat of the yards of another railroad at grade, there may be exceptional conditions which will render such a crossing proper, and the question whether the locality of a proposed crossing is such that the crossing should not be permitted is to be determined by the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

6. SAME.

Code 1904, § 1294d, cl. 38, declaring it to be the policy of the state that the crossings of one railroad by another shall, wherever reasonably practicable, pass above or below the existing structure, does not prohibit crossings at grade, where the establishment of an overhead or underground crossing is not reasonably practicable and would involve an unreasonable expense.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Proceedings before the State Corporation Commission by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company against the Tidewater Railway Company. From an order of the commission rendered in favor of defendant, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. I. Doran, Ro. M. Hughes, Lucian H. Cocke, and Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for appellant. E. W. Knight, Walter H. Taylor, and Thos. D. Ranson, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a proceeding instituted by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company against the Tidewater Railway Company, before the State Corporation Commission, to inquire into the necessity for, and the propriety of, the location of a crossing which the latter company desired to make across the works of the former, under the provisions of clause 3, c. 2, of an act entitled, "An act concerning public service corporations," approved January 18, 1904 (Acts 1902-03-04, pp. 968, 970, 971), and found in the Code of 1904 as clause 3 of section 1294b.

The action of the State Corporation Commission in permitting W. R. Mayo and Caldwell Hardy, two citizens of Norfolk, a city near the eastern terminus of the appellee road, to appear before it and make statements in reference to matters in issue before the commission, is assigned as error. Neither of these persons was offered as a witness by either litigant, and one of them was not sworn.

In hearing and deciding the question in controversy between the litigating railway companies, the commission was acting in its capacity as a court of record, and by the express terms of clause 23 of section 1313a of the Code of 1904 (Acts 1902-03-04, pp. 137, 143, c. 147) it is provided that when so acting the commission shall observe and administer the common and statute law rules of evidence, as observed and administered by the courts of this commonwealth. As the question in controversy in this case was one which not only affected the parties to the litigation, but involved questions of the safety and convenience of a railroad crossing, in which the public were interested, the commission might, under the rules of the common law, have had the right, if the evidence introduced by the parties left it in doubt as to what its judgment should be, to call persons as witnesses not introduced by either party, whom it thought could aid it in reaching a correct conclusion. 2 Elliott on Ev. § 821; Coulson v. Disborough, 2 Queen's Bench L. R. (1894) 316.

Except, however, under very exceptional circumstances there is no necessity for such a course, and when followed the persons called should be sworn as are witnesses called by the parties.

While the commission erred in permitting these citizens to make their statements under the circumstances and in the manner in which they were made, that error furnishes no sufficient ground for reversing the order appealed from, unless the other evidence in the case was not sufficient to support the finding of the commission.

Another error assigned is that the "commission erred in overruling the objection made by the appellant, to the effect that the notice given to it by the appellee was not a sufficient compliance with the statute, as the evident impression left in the minds of the officers of the appellant road, on whom the alleged notice was served, was that the alleged notice was not final, but merely a starting point for further negotiations."

The record shows that the officials of the two roads had been, prior to the service of the notice in question, endeavoring to agree upon the place where, and the manner in which, the appellee road should cross the works of the appellant, and that they had reached a stage in their negotiations where there was no hope of an amicable settlement of their differences, and that further efforts in that direction would be useless. The notice in question was therefore given, and is a substantial compliance with clause 3 of section 1294b of the Code of 1904, which provides, among other things, that, before a railroad or other public service corporation which crosses another commences work upon such crossing, the president or general managing officer of the company which proposes to cross the works of another company shall submit plans and specifications, appliances, and methods of operation to the president or other general officer of the latter company.

While there is some conflict in the testimony as to whether or not the notice was understood to be the commencement of the proceeding required in such cases by clause 3, § 1294b, of the Code of 1904, it is clear, we think, from the record that it was so intended by the appellee, and, if the appellant did not so understand it when the notice was first served, it did later, and was permitted to assert all the rights it could have asserted if it had complied strictly with clause 3, § 1294b, of the Code of 1904, and applied to the State Corporation Commission within 15 days from the date of the notice, to inquire into the necessity of such crossing and the propriety of the proposed location. There is no merit in this contention, as no injury resulted to the appellant from the action complained of.

The appellee, under rule 10 (45 S. E. xi), assigns as cross-error the action of the corporation commission in overruling its motion to quash and dismiss the petition of the appellant, because it was not filed within the 15 days, as provided by the section under which it was filed.

As the result in this case, upon the merits, is favorable to the appellee, as will hereafter be seen, we do not deem it necessary to consider the questions involved in that assignment of error, and do not wish to be understood as in any way expressing any opinion upon them.

The main questions involved in this appeal, as stated by the appellant in the brief of its counsel, are:

"(1) Whether, if the Constitution and statutes of Virginia authorize one railroad company to cross the throat of the yard of another railroad company, that Constitution and those statutes authorize such a crossing without proper condemnation proceedings to acquire the right to cross.

"(2) Whether the crossing of the tracks and yard of one railroad company by another is a taking of property, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibitions against taking property without compensation and without due process of law.

"(3) Whether the proper construction of the Constitution and statutes of Virginia authorizes one railroad company to cross the throat of the yard of another railroad company at grade.

"(4) Whether, under the circumstances of this particular case, the State Corporation Commission was justified in directing a grade crossing."

The first and second of these questions may be considered together. Neither of them is, in our opinion, involved in this appeal. The object of this proceeding, as appears from clause 3, § 1294b, of the Code of 1904, hereinbefore referred to, was to have the corporation commission determine the necessity for the proposed crossing, and the place where, and the manner in which, it should be made. Until those questions were finally settled, no question of taking property, with or without due process of law, or of condemning the lands of the road whose works were to be crossed, or of compensation therefor, could arise. When the plans, appliances, and methods for the crossing are adopted by the corporation commission, or if an appeal be taken from its action, upon the adoption of plans, appliances, and methods for the crossing, by this court, then it becomes the duty of the company desiring to cross to make payment of proper compensation therefor before commencing work thereon; and that compensation, by the express terms of the statute under which this proceeding was had, is to be ascertained according to the laws regulating the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

Whether crossing the works of one railroad company by another is "a taking of property," within the meaning of that term under our laws of eminent domain, or what is the measure of compensation in such a case, could not be determined in this proceeding, because the corporation commission has no jurisdiction of those questions. Neither could those questions be settled by the court having jurisdiction thereof until the questions involved in this proceeding were ended, for until that time neither the location nor the character of the crossing would be known.

The next questions raised by the appellant are:

"(3) Whether the proper construction of the Constitution and statutes of Virginia authorizes one railroad company to cross the throat of the yard of another railroad company at grade.

"(4) Whether, under the circumstances of this particular case, the State Corporation Commission was justified in directing a crossing at grade."

By section 166 of the Constitution [Code 1904, p. cclxi], it is provided that: "Every railroad company shall have the right, subject to such reasonable regulations as may be prescribed by law, to parallel, intersect, connect with, or cross with its roadway, any other railroad or railroads."

Clause 62 of chapter 4 of the "Act concerning public service corporations" (Acts 1902-03-04, pp. 968, 994), approved January 18, 1904, found in the Code of 1904 as clause 62 of section 1294d, provides that: "Any railroad corporation created under the laws of this state which shall have fully located its railway, shall have power in the construction of its said railway on such route * * * to cross any railway or railroad intervening in the manner and upon the terms prescribed by section three of chapter two of this act."

Section 3 of chapter 2, p. 970, of the act (clause 3 of section 1294b of the Code of 1904) provides, among other things, that: "If any railroad, canal, turnpike, or other public service corporation deems it necessary in the construction of its works to cross any other railroad, canal, turnpike, or works of any other public service corporation, or any county road, it may do so; provided such crossing shall be so located, constructed and operated as not to impair, impede or obstruct in any material degree the works and operations of the railroad, canal, turnpike, or other works to be crossed; and provided such crossing shall be supported by such permanent and proper structures and fixtures, and shall be controlled by such customary and approved appliances, methods and regulations as will best secure the safe passage and transportation of persons and property along such crossing, and will not be injurious to the works of the company to be crossed."

This court will not, in this case, undertake to define the extent of the right of one railroad company to cross the works of another, under the foregoing provisions of law, any further than is necessary for a decision of this case. There may be, and no doubt are, many localities on every railroad where another railroad company would not have the right to cross, if for no other reason, because a crossing could not be so located, constructed, and operated as not to impair, impede, or obstruct in a material degree the works and operations of the other railroad. But what will constitute such a locality must be determined by the facts and circumstances of the particular case in which the question arises. Ordinarily one railroad ought not to be permitted to cross the throat of an existing or a proposed yard on another railroad at grade; but there may be exceptional conditions and circumstances shown in a particular case which will render such a crossing proper.

The corporation commission, upon which the primary duty of determining such questions is imposed by the Constitution and statutes of the state, has reached the conclusion that from the topography of the ground it is manifest that the location selected by the appellee company is practically the only place at or about which a crossing could take place. The commission further finds, upon all the facts of the case having reference to the general character of the country around Norfolk, to the railroads centering there, the various crossings now in existence, the expense and difficulties involved in erecting an overhead crossing at that place, and the relative dangers and inconveniences to the public likely to follow from the adoption of a grade or overhead crossing, that a grade crossing should be allowed.

It would be impossible, in an opinion of reasonable length, to discuss the mass of testimony taken in this case, and if it could be done it would serve no good purpose, as the facts and circumstances disclosed by this record are not likely to exist in another case involving the same questions. It is sufficient to say that, upon a careful consideration of the whole record, after excluding the statements of Messrs. Mayo and Hardy which were not admissible in evidence, as hereinbefore shown, we are of opinion that the findings of the corporation commission are sustained by the weight of evidence.

It was earnestly insisted by counsel for the appellant, both in their briefs and in their oral arguments, that the corporation commission, in allowing a grade crossing to be made, had not given due consideration to the declared policy of the state in favor of overhead or underground crossings. Clause 38, § 1294d, Code 1904. The change of the policy of the state from grade to overhead or underground crossings, both as to highways and railroads, is an eminently wise one, and should be given full effect "wherever," in the language of the statute, "it is reasonably practicable and does not involve an unreasonable expense, all the circumstances of the case considered." But to require the establishment of an overhead or underground crossing where it is not reasonably practicable and would involve an unreasonable expense, all the circumstances of the case considered, would be as much against the policy of the state as to permit a grade crossing where those difficulties are not shown to exist. In reaching our conclusion in this case we have not been unmindful of the provisions of that statute.

We are of opinion that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

STOKES' ADM'X v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Jan. 18, 1906.)

1. RAILROADS — ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action against a railway company for the death of a traveler at a railroad crossing, evidence relating to the crossing of a wagon in front of a freight train more than 30 years before, as to the time it required a wagon and team different from that used by decedent to go over the track at the crossing, and as to the speed of another train, was inadmissible.

2. SAME.

In an action against a railway company for injuries at a crossing, the question whether or not the company's right of way at or near the crossing had on it undergrowth which prevented the traveler from seeing the approaching train was material.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, § 1130.]

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action against a railway company for injuries at a crossing, a witness testified that he did not know the condition of the right of way at the time of the accident, and that when he went there five hours after the accident, which occurred at 5 p. m., it was dark, the refusal to permit the witness to state the condition of the right of way at the crossing five hours after the accident was not prejudicial; it being clear that the witness had stated that he did not know what the condition of the right of way was at the time.

4. RAILROADS — ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where the proximate cause of a collision with a train at a crossing was the contributory negligence of the traveler, the question of the negligent management of the train was immaterial.

5. SAME—DUTY TO LOOK AND LISTEN.

It is the duty of a traveler on a highway to look and listen for the approach of trains before going on a railroad crossing, when his looking and listening would be necessarily effective.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 1043-1051.]

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action against a railway company for the death of a traveler in a collision with a train at a crossing, examined, and held to show that decedent was guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery.

Error to Circuit Court, Lunenburg County.
Action by W. H. Stokes' administratrix against the Southern Railway Company.

There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied March 9, 1906.

G. S. Wing, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate by the Southern Railway Company.

Upon the trial of the cause the defendant company demurred to the evidence. Its demurrer was sustained, and a judgment rendered in its favor. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

It appears that about 5 o'clock on the 22d day of August, 1903, a south-bound passenger train of the defendant company ran upon the plaintiff's intestate, W. H. Stokes, who was crossing its tracks at a highway grade crossing near Meherrin, in the county of Lunenburg; in a twohorse wagon loaded with wheat, killing him and his two mules, and destroying his wagon.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the proximate cause of the accident was the failure of the defendant to cause the whistle on its engine to be blown for the crossing, as required by statute, and the running of its train, which was behind time, at an unusually rapid rate of speed.

The defendant claims that the crossing signal was blown, and that the train was not running in excess of 40 miles an hour, its schedule rate; and insists that, even if it was guilty of negligence in the management of its train, the proximate cause of the accident was the failure of the decedent to exercise due care before going upon its track.

The plaintiff took five bills of exceptions to the action of the court in refusing to permit her to introduce certain evidence, all of which, except the first, are relied on here as grounds for reversing the judgment complained of.

The assignments of error based upon bills of exceptions 2, 4, and 5 are without merit. The evidence objected to was clearly inadmissible. One relating to the crossing of a wagon in front of a freight train more than 30 years before; another to the time it required a different wagon and team to go over the track of the defendant at the crossing; and the third to the speed of another train going in the opposite direction.

It appears from bill of exceptions No. 3 that the plaintiff wished to ask Eddie Owen, one of her witnesses, if he knew the condition of the defendant's right of way at the crossing five hours after the accident occurred, stating that she expected to prove by the witness that the view from the crossing was obstructed by undergrowth on the right of way. The court refused to allow the question to be asked.

Whether or not the defendant's right of way at or near the crossing had upon it undergrowth which would have prevented the plaintiff's intestate from seeing the approach of the train, which caused his death, was a material question. The trial court so thought, as it permitted both the plaintiff and defendant to introduce witnesses to prove the condition of the right of way at that point prior and subsequent to the accident. The bill of exceptions discloses no reason why the court declined to permit the question we are now considering to be asked; but another bill of exceptions, to which it refers, shows that the witness had already stated that he did not know the condition of the right of way at the time of the accident, and that when he went there five hours afterwards (the accident occurred about 5 o'clock p. m.) it was dark.

While it would have been better to have permitted the question to be asked, no prejudice resulted to the plaintiff from the court's action, since it is clear from what the witness had already testified that he did not know what the condition of the right of way was at the time designated in the question.

This brings us to consideration of the case upon the demurrer to the evidence.

In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence in the management of its train, as charged in the declaration. For, if it was, the proximate cause of the accident, as shown by the evidence, was the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate.

The crossing is a dangerous one, and Mr. Stokes, who lived in the neighborhood and was on his way to mill, knew this. The county road crosses the railway track a little obliquely, in a cut which extends some distance both north and south of the crossing. The bank or side of the cut, which is about 25 feet from the center of the railway track, at the point where the highway crosses the railway, was originally about seven feet deep. Five or six years prior to the accident it had been cut down or lowered about two feet by the defendant, for a distance of about 65 feet along the highway and about 75 feet along the railway in the direction from which the train came. There were only three eyewitnesses to the accident. A boy about 12 years of age, a witness for the plaintiff, who was riding in the wagon with Mr. Stokes, testified that, when they reached a point in the highway about 200 feet from the crossing, "I told him I thought that I heard a roaring, and he stopped, and just as he started off he said the train was going the other way, and we drove off down to the crossing, and just as the mules' front feet got over the rail the train was right there. Then he commenced to whip the mules to get across, and I jumped off." The witness further testified that he was sitting on the seat in the wagon with Mr. Stokes and on his right side.

The engineer in charge of the locomotive, who was introduced by the defendant, testified that, as his train approached the crossing "a short distance south of Meherrin, when I got within about 100 yards or 150 yards, * * * I saw a mule team, two-horse wagon with two mules to it, being driven by a white gentleman—I did not know who he was—sitting in the wagon driving them. He looked at me. I saw him, and I commenced blowing the steam whistle, * * * and he commenced whipping his team up to cross over ahead of me. Consequently he got his mules just about across the track, and the fore wheels of the wagon were just pulling up on the rail, when the engine struck him." The engineer further testified that he put on the emergency brakes and did everything he could to stop the train; that when he first saw the mules they were about 25 or 30 feet from the track.

The other eyewitness, also put on the stand by the defendant, was a girl who was sitting at a window in a house about 80 yards from, and in full view of, the crossing as Mr. Stokes approached it. She testified that when she first saw the wagon it was about 35 steps from the crossing, a little back of where the "cut-off" was; that he was whipping his team when she first saw him, that at that time she had heard the rattle of the train and seen the smoke from it.

An approaching train could not be seen from the point 200 feet from the railway track where Mr. Stokes stopped his wagon, nor could it be seen until he reached the "cut-off," 65 feet from the crossing, at which point he could see along the railway 75 feet.

The defendant's evidence shows, by actual measurements made, and views taken, some time after the accident, that an approaching train could be seen 287 feet, when within 50 feet of the crossing; 665 feet, when within 32 feet of it; and 1,528 feet, when within 25 feet. But the plaintiff's evidence tends to show that, on account of weeds and small undergrowth growing on the "cut-off" at the time of the accident, an approaching train could not be seen more than 75 feet from the crossing until a point 30 feet from it was reached, when an approaching train could be seen a short distance—how far is not shown.

The uncontradicted evidence of the engineer is that, when within 100 or 150 yards of the crossing, he saw Mr. Stokes and his team when the mules were about 25 or 30 feet from the track, and that Mr. Stokes looked at or toward him. If Mr. Stokes saw the approaching train as the engineer testifies, then it was clearly his duty to have kept off the railway track. If he did not see the approaching train, he could have seen it if he had been in the exercise of due care. The track itself was a proclamation of danger, and it was his duty, before going upon it, to use his eyes and ears—to look and listen—and to do so when and where his looking and listening would be reasonably effective. Johnson's Adm'r v. C.

& C. Ry. Co., 91 Va. 171, 21 S. E. 238; Washington, etc., Ry. Co. v. Lacey, 94 Va. 460, 475, 476, 26 S. E. 834; 2 Sheer. & Red. on Neg., §§ 476, 478. He had no right to conclude, as he seems to have done, that the "roaring" heard 200 feet away from the track was made by a train going away from, instead of coming toward, the crossing. He had crossed the railway track more than a mile from and north of the crossing, and had traveled along the highway, the general direction of which was parallel with the railway and not far from it. It is not pretended that any train passed either way during that time. Having been warned by the "roaring" of a train, which he had no right to believe had passed, he ought to have been the more careful before going upon the track.

The little boy sitting in the wagon by Mr. Stokes testified that as the wagon approached the track from the point where they halted he looked and listened; in what direction he looked he does not state. He was sitting on the seat on the side farthest from the train. His size, his position, and the direction the wagon was moving prevented him from seeing the train until it was right upon them, unless he leaned forward or backward so as to look around Mr. Stokes. It is not shown that he did this.

We are of opinion that the circuit court did not err in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the evidence, and the judgment must be affirmed.

FLAHERTY v. FLEMING et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1906.)

1. EASEMENT—RIGHT OF WAY—OBSTRUCTION.

Kight, by deed dated the 15th of July, 1889, and duly recorded on the 22d of July, 1889, conveyed to Flaherty a lot of land on the north side of Seventh street in the city of Parkersburg, "also a free right of way for an alleyway 12 feet wide extending from the rear end of said lot across another lot owned by said Kight to the alley running to Latrobe street." After this deed was recorded, Kight conveyed the lot over which the right of way had been granted to Weber, and Weber conveyed it to Fleming. Held, that under the circumstances of this case the placing of a fence upon, or a gate upon and over, such right of way by Fleming, after becoming the owner of his lot, is a wrongful obstruction of such way, and in violation of the right of Flaherty under his deed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, §§ 124, 125.]

2. SAME—INJUNCTION.

Injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the maintenance of a wrongful obstruction of a private way.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, §§ 134, 135, 137.]

3. INJUNCTION—CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS.

It is a rule, subject to few exceptions, that a court of equity will not interfere by injunction with criminal proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, §§ 178, 179.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by Michael W. Flaherty against Charles Fleming and E. F. Wilson. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Vandervort, for appellant. J. Robert Anderson and F. L. Muhleman, for appellees.

COX, J. This is an appeal from a decree sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a bill in chancery, brought in the circuit court of Wood county by Michael W. Flaherty against Charles Fleming and E. F. Wilson, justice. The bill alleges, in substance: That J. W. Kight, by deed dated the 15th of July, 1889, and recorded on the 22d of July, 1889, conveyed to Flaherty a lot of land on the north side of Seventh street in the city of Parkersburg, and "also a free right of way for an alleyway 12 feet wide extending from the rear end of said lot across another lot owned by said Kight to the alley running to Latrobe street"; that after the recordation of this deed Kight conveyed the lot over which the right of way was granted to George Weber, and afterwards Weber conveyed it to Fleming by deed dated the 14th of April, 1897; that after Fleming became the owner of his lot he occasionally fenced up said right of way, so that Flaherty was not able to freely use the same; that about a week before the filing of the bill Fleming began the erection of a gate on and over said right of way, and obstructed the free use of such right of way by Flaherty; that shortly after Fleming purchased his lot Flaherty called Fleming's attention to the fact of the existence of such right of way; that Flaherty also gave notice in writing of his rights under his deed to Fleming, and that if he did not remove the gate Flaherty would remove it; that, the gate not being removed pursuant to the notice, Flaherty tore it down; that Fleming procured a warrant from Wilson, justice, and caused Flaherty to be arrested upon a charge of injuring and defacing real property not his own; that such right of way 12 feet wide has been used by Flaherty since he purchased his lot until so obstructed by Fleming; and that Fleming threatens to replace said gate and to reconstruct said obstructions. Previous to the decree sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill, a preliminary injunction had been awarded, as prayed for in the bill.

The principal controversy in this case is whether or not the defendant Fleming may place upon and over such right of way a fence or gate. This involves a construction of the deed to Flaherty, and the ascertainment of the intention of the parties to it when it was made. It does not clearly appear by the bill what the condition of the right of way was when the deed was made. Therefore what we shall say in relation to the intention of the parties and the construction of the deed will relate to the right of the owner of the servient lot to obstruct the right of way after the time the deed was made, and not to any obstruction or obstructions to such way which existed at the time of the making of the deed. If there be no ambiguity, we must arrive at the intention of the parties from the language used. The words are to be taken in their ordinary and popular sense, unless it appear by the context that they were used in a different sense, or unless, when applied to the subject-matter, they have a technical meaning. Railroad v. Schutte, 103 U. S. 118, 26 L. Ed. 327; Snodgrass v. Wolf, 11 W. Va. 158; Schuykill Co. v. Moore, 2 Whart. 477. For the purpose of construction, all parts of the deed must be considered together. Barber v. Insurance Co., 16 W. Va. 658, 37 Am. Rep. 800; Heatherly v. Bank, 31 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. 754. It rarely happens that the language used in one grant of an easement is exactly like the language used in another. Therefore each case must be determined according to the words used. The words here are: "A free right of way for an alleyway 12 feet wide." Generally, the mere grant of a right of way over land, and nothing more, does not pass any other right or incident. The owner of the soil may make any use of his land which does not interfere with a reasonable use of the way. Subject to the easement, his control extends indefinitely upward from the surface and downward ad infernos. Jones on Easements, § 391; 14 Cyc. 1201. However, where the easement is created by express grant, defining the rights of the parties, the terms of the grant must govern. "Whether a grantee of a right of way is entitled to a way unobstructed by gates or bars depends upon the terms of the grant, the purposes for which it was made, the nature and situation of the property, and the manner in which it has been used." Jones on Easements, § 319; Field v. Leiter, 118 Ill. 17, 6 N. E. 877; Cowling v. Higginson, 4 M. & W. 245; Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 206, 28 Pac. 944; Houpes v. Anderson, 22 Iowa, 161.

It is contended that the word "free" means free from compensation; without further payment. This contention cannot be maintained. The word "free" is found in a deed of grant. The consideration for the grant is named in it. If the word "free" means free in the sense that it is without further consideration, then it would be useless in this deed, and would give no more than the law would give without the use of the word. It is unnecessary to say "free" in the sense of without further consideration, in a deed of grant, in relation to the thing granted. There would be no more reason for using the word "free" in that sense, in relation to the right of way, than there would be for using it in relation to the lot granted by the deed. Without the use of the word in either case, the thing granted is free from the payment of consideration other than that agreed to be paid. It appears that the word "free," as used in this clause, qualifies and relates to "right of way" in a different sense. It is descriptive of the right of way—the thing granted—and is not descriptive of the use to be made of the right of way. Webster's Dictionary defines the word "free," when used in relation to a thing to be enjoyed or possessed, as follows: "Thrown open, or made accessible to all; to be enjoyed without limitations; unrestricted; not obstructed, engrossed, or appropriated; open." Applying that definition here, the word "free" indicates the condition and character of the "right of way"—the thing granted, the thing to be enjoyed and possessed. In that sense, it means an unobstructed right of way, so far as any future act of the owner of the servient lot is concerned. The additional language, "for an alleyway 12 feet wide," we think means for the purpose of an alleyway 12 feet wide, or to be used as an alleyway 12 feet wide. The way is definite, and fixed in width, and is "for an alleyway." The word "alleyway" has the same meaning as the word "alley." An alley may be public or private. When used in a plat or statute concerning towns or cities, it will be taken to mean a public way, unless the word "private" is prefixed or the context requires a different meaning. Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 24. When used in a deed between private parties, it may mean a private alley, if that clearly appears to be the intention. City of Chicago v. Borden, 180 Ill. 430, 60 N. E. 915. An alley is a narrow passage or way in a city, as distinguished from a public street. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 149. If the grant were of a public alleyway or alley, it would certainly imply an open and unobstructed alleyway or alley. From the use of the same word or words by parties in relation to land in a city, although by the context it appears to be a private alleyway, it seems to be a fair inference to say that they mean the same as to the character and condition of the alleyway, so far as future obstructions are concerned, as they would mean were it a public alley, or alleyway. In other words, the difference between a public and private alleyway is not so much in the character or condition of the alleyway as in the use and control of it.

Taking the words of the deed together, it appears to us, that the intention was to give a way open and unobstructed so far as any future act of the owner of the servient estate is concerned. If there be doubt as to this construction, then we must resort to the circumstances surrounding the transaction, the situation of the parties, the subject-matter of the deed or contract, and the subsequent acts of the parties under it. Shrewsbury v. Tufts, 41 W. Va. 212, 23 S. E. 692; Heatherly v. Bank, supra. The bill of complaint is rather barren of circumstances or facts which aid us in construction. It does appear, however, that these lots are in a city, and not in the country, and that Flaherty had the use of this right of way until Fleming purchased his lot, and down to the time of the erection of the gate, with the slight interference and obstructions by the occasional fencing up of the way by Fleming. It was nearly eight years from the time that Flaherty bought his lot until Fleming bought his lot, during which time Flaherty used such way. It seems to us that this is material upon the question of construction, and as to the intention. Upon the question of construction, see Dickinson v. Whiting, 141 Mass. 414, 6 N. E. 92; Burnham v. Nevins, 144 Mass. 88, 10 N. E. 494, 59 Am. Rep. 61; Kana v. Bolton, 98 N. J. Eq. 21; Williams v. Clark, 140 Mass. 238, 5 N. E. 802; Welch v. Wilcox, 101 Mass. 162, 100 Am. Dec. 113; Hacke's App., 101 Pa. 245. In Williams v. Clark, the controversy was concerning a crossing of a railway. The court said: "While, in terms, it is not provided that this crossing should not be unobstructed by gates or bars, yet the facts that it was to be 'convenient,' and that the railroad company itself constructed, and for many years permitted the existence of such a one, sufficiently show that what it intended to grant was a free right of passage. No usage or circumstances such as are shown where one grants a way or right of way over a field devoted to agricultural or other purposes, indicating that the right granted is to be subordinate to the rights of the grantor, or the use made by him of the premises, here exist."

The construction above adopted, in our judgment, determines the question of the right of Fleming to obstruct the way in controversy. If the way is to be open and unobstructed, so far as future acts of the servient owner are concerned, it certainly is not to be obstructed by him. The placing of any thing upon the way by the servient owner which would make it less useful or less convenient to the one entitled to the easement than an open, unobstructed way is an obstruction, and a violation of the terms of the grant. It can hardly be contended that the placing of a fence or gate upon and over this way does not make it less useful and less convenient than an open, unobstructed way. "The necessity of opening and closing the gate, as well as the more limited space through which the defendant must conduct his teams and cattle, would materially interfere with his convenient use of the lane." Dickinson v. Whiting, supra. See, also, Burnham v. Nevins, supra; Kana v. Bolton, supra. Injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the maintenance of a wrongful obstruction of a private way. Rogerson v. Shepherd, 83 W. Va. 307, 10 S. E. 632; Boyd v. Woolwine, 40 W. Va. 282, 21 S. E. 1020.

There is another feature to the plaintiff's bill. He seeks to enjoin the prosecution of the criminal proceeding upon the warrant mentioned, which appears to have been issued against Flaherty, charging him with injuring and defacing real estate not his own, namely, the gate or gates in controversy. It is a rule subject to few exceptions that equity will not interfere by injunction with criminal proceedings, having no jurisdiction or power to afford relief in such cases. Jurisdiction over criminal cases is conferred upon courts specially created to hear them, and with few exceptions it is beyond the power of equity to control, or in any manner interfere with, such proceedings by injunction. High on Injunctions, § 68, and cases cited in note 5. It appears, however, that if a statute, concerning which an arrest or criminal prosecution is threatened, affects civil property and its enjoyment, in protecting the property right equity may properly enjoin the criminal prosecution; but in such case its interference is founded solely upon the ground of injury to property and the necessity of preserving property rights. Also, where a suit is already pending in equity, and a criminal prosecution is instituted for the purpose of testing the same right as that in issue in the equitable action, in such case a court of equity may impose conditions on a suitor seeking its aid, and hence, in order to protect its prior jurisdiction, may compel him to abandon the criminal prosecution until a final determination of the whole matter in equity. Dobbins v. City of Los Angeles (U. S.) 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169; High on Injunctions, 88, and cases cited in note 10. It does not appear that the plaintiff brings himself within any of the exceptions. The criminal proceeding was commenced first, and the statute under which it was commenced is not questioned. That statute determines no property right in this case.

We are of the opinion that the injunction against the criminal prosecution is improper, and that the bill, to the extent that it relates to the criminal prosecution, is without equity. The demurrer in this cause is general, and must be overruled, because the allegations of the bill, if true, are sufficient for the purpose of an injunction preventing the obstruction, or the maintenance of an obstruction, of the right of way mentioned. Allen v. S. P. Coal Co., 58 W. Va. —, 52 S. E. 454.

It follows that the decree of the lower court must be reversed, and this cause remanded, to be further proceeded with according to the principles herein announced and the rules governing courts of equity.

SHEARS et al. v. TRADERS' BLDG. ASS'N et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1906.)

1. MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — SEPARATE SALES.

Where one executes to the same trustees two deeds of trust, at different times, conveying separate lots of land, to secure to the same person two distinct debts, and where default is made in the payment of the debts, and the trustees are required to make sale of the property, they should sell the same separately, and not jointly, and to sell it collectively will be an irregularity for which the sale, and deed made pursuant thereto, will be set aside, upon proper bill filed for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 1072.]

2. SAME—IRREGULARITIES—NOTICE TO PURCHASERS.

A purchaser at such sale is charged with notice of the irregularity. He is bound to know the powers of the trustees, and to see that the sale is made in conformity with the instrument creating the trust and as required by law.

3. SAME—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

The grantors will not be estopped to set such sale aside, because one of them was present at the sale and did not call attention to the irregularity and object to the sale.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by B. F. Shears and Hattie Shears against the Traders' Building Association and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. W. Vandervort, for appellants. W. N. Miller and Caldwell & Watson, for appellees.

SANDERS, J. The appellants, B. F. and Hattie Shears, on the 26th day of April, 1901, executed to the defendants H. H. Moss and A. K. Leonard, trustees, a trust deed on two lots in Tygart district, Wood county, to secure to the defendant the Traders' Building Association the sum of $1,100. On the 7th day of June, 1901, the same parties conveyed to the same trustees two lots in Jeannette Tavenner's addition to Tavennersville, in said county, to secure to said association the payment of the sum of $600. Default having been made in the payment of the sums secured, the trustees, on June 18, 1904, sold the properties conveyed, and defendant S. P. Moore became the purchaser thereof, at the price of $1,700, and afterwards obtained a deed. On July 11, 1904, the plaintiffs filed their bill to set said sale and deed aside. Pending the suit, an injunction was awarded by the judge of the circuit court, in vacation, restraining Moore from prosecuting an action of unlawful entry and detainer to recover possession of the property from Shears. At the final hearing the court refused to grant the relief prayed for, dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill.

The appellants present several reasons for reversal, but it is only necessary to notice the one which we regard as fatal to the decree, and which plainly calls for setting the sale aside and canceling the deed. The trustees, Moss and Leonard, in proceeding to make sale, advertised the properties jointly, or collectively—that is, they advertised the entire property jointly, by one notice—and on the day of sale the property was lumped, or sold collectively, and purchased by said Moore. These deeds of trust are specific liens upon the property separately conveyed by them to secure the amount of indebtedness therein named, respectively, and upon a sale of the property conveyed by one deed of trust, if it should bring more than sufficient to pay off the lien, it would not be proper to credit the surplus upon the loan secured by the other deed of trust, if, upon a sale of the property conveyed by that deed, it should not sell for enough to satisfy the indebtedness. The property should be so sold as to be able to determine, with certainty, the amount realized from the property conveyed by each trust deed. Who can say but what the property conveyed by one of the deeds sold for more than sufficient to pay the debt secured by it? To sell the property collectively, it would be impossible to know the proportionate amount each piece of property brought, and therefore it could not be determined how much should be credited upon each loan. The cestui que trust has no right, under the trust deed, if the property conveyed by one deed should sell for more than sufficient to pay off the debt which it was given to secure, to have the surplus applied to the satisfaction of the debt secured by the other deed of trust, in the event that the property conveyed thereby should prove inadequate for the purpose.

It is urged that the property was offered separately, and that the trustees failed to receive a bid sufficient to pay the association's debt, and therefore it was sold collectively. This cannot be offered as an excuse for selling the property collectively, because by the terms of the deeds no such right existed. The trustees were not authorized to sell, except in conformity with the contract creating the trust, and the property conveyed by each deed was only liable to be sold in satisfaction of the indebtedness thereby secured.

It is contended by the defendants that the answer of the building association shows that the properties were first offered separately, and that they were then offered together, and that, a larger price being thus obtained, the plaintiffs were not prejudiced, but benefited, by the joint sale of the property, and that the plaintiffs, having failed to set up in the bill this matter of joint sale, or make any issue in the pleadings in regard thereto, cannot now make a new or different case on this hearing. It is true the plaintiffs, in the conclusion of their bill, assign six grounds why the sale should be set aside, and in these assignments it is not complained that the properties were jointly sold; but, while this is so, it is shown by the bill that the two deeds of trust were given upon separate pieces of property to secure different debts and that the property was jointly sold. This being so, the court will look to the whole bill to see if the plaintiffs are entitled to relief, and the fact that the bill contains allegations attempting to specifically point out irregularities will not prevent the plaintiffs from relying upon the other allegations in the bill which show irregularities. This being the allegation of the bill, it is not denied by the answer, but, on the other hand, is admitted.

It is argued that it is shown that the property brought more when offered jointly than it did when offered separately, and therefore the plaintiffs are not prejudiced. How much from the proceeds of sale will be credited on the $1,100 loan, and how much on the $600 loan? How much did the property conveyed by the trust deed dated June 7, 1901, bring, and how much did the property conveyed by the second deed of trust bring? It nowhere appears. The property upon which the small loan was made may have brought a sum much more than sufficient to discharge the lien against it, and, if this be so, as we have observed, the surplus arising from the sale of the property which sold for more than sufficient to pay off the lien against it could not be applied to discharge the lien against the property, which did not sell for enough to do so.

It is claimed by the defendants that the silence and conduct of B. F. Shears at the time of the sale should estop him. It is true that Shears was present when the sale was made, but he had no control over the proceedings. The manner of advertising and selling was fixed by the trust deeds, and the sale was being conducted entirely by the trustees. Shears had no voice in it, and the fact that he was present and did not object to the sale being made in the manner in which it was made cannot in any way estop him to say now that the trustees did not proceed in conformity with the provisions of the trust deeds. The grantor misled no one by his conduct. All that can be charged to him is that he was present and was silent; that he did not then say that the trustees had no power to make the sale as they were proceeding to do. A purchaser of property sold by a trustee under a deed of trust given to secure a debt, and authorizing the trustee, after advertising in a certain manner, to make sale of the property to satisfy the debt secured thereby, is charged with notice of the powers of the trustee; and it is the purchaser's duty to inquire and determine for himself if the sale is being made in conformity with the provisions of the instrument creating the trust. The irregularity here complained of is such as, from its very nature, immediately presents itself to view. "Silence will not estop, unless there is not only a right, but a duty, to speak." Cautley v. Morgan, 51 W. Va. 304, 41 S. E. 201; Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411; 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891; Dawson v. Crow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. 564; Pocahontas Light & Water Co. v. Browning, 53 W. Va. 436, 44 S. E. 267.

For the reasons given, we reverse the decree of the circuit court, set aside the sale, and cancel and annul the deed made thereunder, and award to the plaintiffs their costs, both in this court and in the court below.

STATE v. STRAYER.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1906.)1. INDICTMENT—MISNOMER—AMENDMENT.

If a misnomer in an indictment for a felony appear before or in the course of the trial thereon, the indictment may be amended by inserting therein, under an order of the court, the true name of the accused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 514.]

2. SAME—MOTION TO QUASH.

An indictment should not be quashed because of a misnomer therein.

3. SAME—LOSS—SUBSTITUTION OF COPY.

If an indictment for a felony be stolen, lost, or destroyed after a trial thereon and the rendition of a verdict of guilty, the trial court, under its inherent common-law powers, may cause to be filed in the record of the case a copy thereof as a substitute therefor, to subserve any purpose for which the indictment may be needed in the further progress of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 78.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

In the absence of an objection to the substitution of such copy, on the ground that it is not a true or correct copy, its accuracy and correctness will be presumed.

5. SAME—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

A bill of exceptions, made up and signed more than 30 days after the expiration of the term of the court at which final judgment in the case was rendered, is no part of the record, and cannot be considered.

6. SAME—RECORD—EVIDENCE.

If it affirmatively appear, from an order in the case, that the evidence was not transcribed by the stenographer within 30 days from the end of such term, it is no part of the record, although there is a nunc pro tunc order purporting to make it so as of the term at which the judgment was rendered.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Ben Strayer was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

R. L. Blackwood, Gordon O'Blerne and F. W. Riggs, for plaintiff in error. C. W. May, Atty. Gen., and Frank Lively, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the criminal court of Cabell county sentencing Ben Strayer to confinement in the penitentiary of this state for life, under a conviction on an indictment for the murder of Sam Benedict. Some of the assignments of error are predicated upon rulings of the court as to evidence. One is the overruling of a motion to set aside the verdict as being contrary to the law and the evidence. Owing to defects in the record, it will be impossible to consider any of these assignments. There is but one paper in the record, called a "bill of exceptions." It purports to set out evidence in the case; but was not made up and signed either in the term at which the judgment was rendered or within 30 days after the expiration of that term. The term ended on the 20th day of February, 1906, as shown by a certificate of the clerk of the trial court. It affirmatively appears from a vacation order, entered on the 5th day of April, 1906, that the evidence in the case had not then been transcribed by the stenographer from his notes. Therefore the bill of exceptions could not have been made up and signed at an earlier date. It was not done before the 26th of April, 1906; for that is the date of the certificate of the stenographer. On the 27th day of April, 1906, the court entered an order purporting to make this bill of exceptions a part of the records as of the last preceding term. If the bill of exceptions was inadvertently omitted at said preceding term, as recited in this order, it did not, at that time, contain the evidence. This appears affirmatively from the vacation order. Under principles settled in Tracy's Adm'x v. Carver Coal Co. (W. Va.) 50 S. E. 825, it is clear that the evidence is no part of this record. See, also, Jordan v. Jordan, 48 W. Va. 600, 37 S. E. 556.

It is objected that the record does not show the impaneling of any grand jury, nor the finding of any indictment against the accused. The printed record does not, but certified copies of the record do, show these essential steps. Hence these assignments avail nothing. The indictment, as returned, appeared to be against Ben Thrayer, and was so recorded in the order showing its return. On his arraignment the defendant moved to quash, because his true name was Ben Strayer. This motion the court overruled, and then, on motion of the state by its attorney, permitted the indictment to be amended so as to state the true name of the defendant. Error is predicated upon this action of the court, and Buzzard's Case, 5 Grat. (Va.) 694, and Drake and Cochren's Case, 6 Grat. (Va.) 665, are cited. These cases are not in point. In the former the wrong name was inserted in the indictment, and the correct name was indorsed on the back of the indictment and entered in the record. There was a variance between the record and the indictment. The record showed one man had been indicted, while the indictment showed that a different person had been charged with the offense. It was not a simple case of misnomer, and therefore not within the statute allowing amendment. In the other case the indictment was against Drake and Cochren, but the clerk, in making a minute of it, accidentally omitted the name of Drake. The application was not to amend the indictment on the ground of a misnomer, but to amend the record of the court; a proceeding not authorized by the statute. Section 10 of chapter 158 of the Code of 1899 provides that no indictment shall be abated for any misnomer of the accused, and authorizes the court, in case of a misnomer appearing, before or in the course of a trial, forthwith to cause the indictment or accusation to be amended according to the fact. That is exactly what was done in this case. Hence neither argument nor authority, other than the statute itself, is necessary to justify the action of the court in so doing.

After the verdict had been rendered, and a motion for a new trial made, the indictment with the verdict written on it disappeared. This was brought to the attention of the court by the clerk after having been sworn by the court. The prisoner was present in the court and a record of the fact of the loss was made. Thereupon the court directed the attorney of the state to prepare, as nearly as possible, a true and exact copy of the indictment, with the indorsement thereon. This having been done, the court inspected the copy and ascertained, to its satisfaction, that it was a true and exact copy of the original indictment, together with a copy of the indorsement of the verdict thereon. Said copy was then filed in the record of the case to take the place of the original. To this action and ruling of the court the prisoner objected; and, his objection being overruled, he excepted. It does not appear that any particular objection was made to the copy. It is not pretended that it is not a true and correct copy of the original paper. The exception is based upon want of power and authority in the court to substitute a copy for the original. Bradshaw v. Commonwealth, 16 Grat. (Va.) 507, 86 Am. Dec. 722, holds that if after arraignment of, and plea by, the prisoner, the indictment be lost, he cannot be tried. At that time there was no statute authorizing new indictments to be made when an indictment has been stolen, lost, or destroyed before trial, in the manner now provided by section 10 of chapter 52 of the Code of 1899. The decision in the Bradshaw Case follows that of a divided court in Ganaway v. State, 22 Ala. 772. That case was decided in 1853. After that time Bradford v. State was decided in 1875, and is reported in 54 Ala. 230, holding as follows: "The circuit court has inherent power, without the consent of the prisoner or his counsel, to order the substitution of an indictment, when, after the plea to the merits, it has been lost or destroyed during the trial." At that time there was in Alabama a statute corresponding in all substantial particulars to the statute now in force in this state. Hence the reasoning of that court in Bradford v. State is directly applicable to this case. Both able and exhaustive, it shows conclusive reasons why the danger of putting a man to trial on a copy of the original indictment cannot result from substituting a copy after trial. Therefore a portion of the opinion is here quoted and adopted as a part of this opinion:

"It may be the defendant should not be arraigned or put on trial except on the original finding of the grand jury, because of that he should have inspection, and because of the danger, however remote, that he might be called to answer an accusation the grand jury had never presented, if, when it has been lost, its substitution on secondary proof of its contents was permitted. Such must be accepted now as the law, and the statute, authorizing the preferring a new indictment, is in affirmance of the reasoning on which Gannaway's Case rests. It does not authorize substitution. It authorizes only preferring a new indictment, excluding from the bar of the statute of limitations, the time elapsing after the finding of the first, and the presentment of the new. The loss contemplated must have occurred before, and not during, trial. The purpose is to put the defendant on trial, only on the original finding of the grand jury—that which carries with it, by its indorsements, the statutory evidence of verity. On that finding the accused was arraigned. The genuineness of the indictment was admitted by his demurrer, and recognized by the court in the judgment on the demurrer, and in interposing for the defendant the plea of not guilty. Of the existence and verity of the indictment there was no controversy. Its loss occurred during the progress of the trial, and as is the most reasonable presumption from the record after the jury had been impaneled and sworn. It was not discovered until the evidence had been introduced, and the solicitor was opening the argument to the jury. There is no doubt that the indictment substituted is an exact copy of the original. The grounds of demurrer to the original were specially assigned, and are in every respect applicable to the copy substituted. These grounds are resolvable into one—that the acts constituting the assault are not stated. They are not stated in the substituted indictment, and the statute dispenses with their statement, requiring only the statement of the fact of assault, the name of the female, and the criminal intent. Of the existence of the original indictment, and of its verity, there could be and was no controversy. The substitution was the introduction into the records of matter previously recognized by the court and admitted by the defendant—of matter the verity of which had previously passed beyond controversy. It was the duty of the court to make the record speak the truth, to conform it to the facts as they existed when the defendant was arraigned, pleaded, and was put on his trial, thereby no right of the accused is imperiled. He is not subjected to any other jeopardy than that in which he was placed when put on his trial. That the grand jury had made a presentment against him, that it was returned into court, and that he had admitted its verity, was already judicially ascertained, and apparent of record. His clear, constitutional right was to a verdict from the jury impaneled and sworn, which he had accepted as his trial. The loss or destruction of the indictment could not impair or take away this right. The state had a corresponding right that the trial should progress, and a judgment of conviction or acquittal rendered, finally determining the prosecution. Such rights cannot be impaired or destroyed by the accidental loss or the willful abstraction or destruction of papers pending the trial. Mount v. State, 14 Ohio, 295, 45 Am. Dec. 542. The substitution of such papers on satisfactory proof, by the court, is the only mode of supplying the loss, and lies within the inherent power of the court. Otherwise, the progress of a cause could be arrested—the escape of the criminal could be secured by the felonious abstraction, or the accidental loss of an indictment.”

See, also, Smith v. State, 4 G. Greene (Iowa) 189; State v. Rivers, 58 Iowa, 102, 12 N. W. 117, 43 Am. Rep. 112; State v. Stevisiger, 61 Iowa, 623, 16 N. W. 746.

Upon these authorities we have no hesitancy in saying the court did not err in substituting a copy of the original after conviction and entry of the verdict upon the record. The verdict, recorded in the order book of the court, was full and complete, showing a conviction of the crime of murder. Nothing remained to be done but to render judgment on it.

As no error in the judgment is perceived, it will be affirmed.

STATE v. CLIFFORD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 8, 1906.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER—WORDS ACTIONABLE PER SE.

Words imputing want of chastity to a woman are actionable per se.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, §§ 71-78.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—WAIVER OF ERROR.

In order to warrant the appellate court to revise errors predicated upon the abuse of counsel of the privilege of argument, it should be made to appear that the party asked and was refused an instruction to the jury to disregard the improper statements of counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2645.]

3. SAME—CONVERSATION WITH JUROR.

When it clearly appears from the record that the plaintiff in error could not have been prejudiced by a remark made to a juror during the course of the trial, the verdict should not be set aside because of such remark.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2263, 2264.]

4. SAME—NEW TRIAL.

State v. Williams, 14 W. Va. 851, Syl. pt. 2, reaffirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Berkeley County. J. R. Clifford was convicted of libel, and brings error. Affirmed.

Faulkner, Walker & Woods, for plaintiff in error. C. W. May, Atty. Gen., and Frank Lively, for the State.

McWORTER, P. At the April term of the circuit court of Berkeley county the grand jury of said county returned into court the following indictment:

“The grand jurors of the state of West Virginia, in and for the body of the county of Berkeley, and now attending the said court, upon their oaths present, that on the 3rd day of June, A. D. 1899, one J. R. Clifford, of the county of Berkeley aforesaid, was one of the proprietors, editors, and publishers a newspaper, published and printed at Martinsburg, in said county of Berkeley, state of West Virginia aforesaid, called and known as the ‘Pioneer Press’; that said J. R. Clifford, in an article and writing published by him in said newspaper, unlawfully and maliciously contriving to injure and vilify one Hattie R. Newman and to bring her into public scandal, contempt, ridicule, and disgrace, then and there, to wit, on the said 3rd day of June, A. D. 1899, at Martinsburg, in the said county of Berkeley, and state of West Virginia, aforesaid, did publish in said newspaper aforesaid, called and known as the ‘Pioneer Press,’ and circulate in said county, a false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel of and concerning the said Hattie R. Newman, containing divers false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory matters and things, of and concerning the said Hattie R. Newman (all of which matters and things were published in the said Pioneer Press, in a single article and editorial, on the said 3rd day of June, A. D. 1899), of the tenor following, to wit:

“I Shall Introduce Him.

“Rev. (7) J. O. Newman, of Hagerstown, Md., and who is set up as one of the stars of the first magnitude of the Free Baptist Church of the Shenandoah Valley, has made it a special object to pray for us at Storer College on several anniversary occasions. Last Thursday he stood on the rostrum, battling his eyes like a toad in the ashes, shaking and ducking his shallow head, and begging the Lord to have mercy on us.

“Now, we want it distinctly understood that we want none of his prayers, for they can only add damnation to our soul, if they add anything, because he himself is damnable, and, if his religion, the life he has led, and his prayers, can land him in heaven, we prefer to go to the other place.

“Since he has been blabbing in the pulpit, we have seen him skulking in the bushes with a noted prostitute, and without following him down a transaction took place only a few weeks ago that ought to make the devil blush; but John don’t seem to care about it. It is said, and no one has denied it, that he [meaning the said John O. Newman] went into his own house and found a man by the name of Baum and his wife [meaning the wife of the said John O. Newman, viz., the said Hattie R. Newman] playing the dog. [Meaning that the said Baum and the said Hattie R. Newman were then and there engaged in the criminal act of sexual intercourse, they not then and there being lawfully married to one another, and that said sexual intercourse was then and there being done and performed by them as sexual intercourse occurs and is performed by and between a male and female dog.]

"Both he and Newman's wife being teachers at the time, a public investigation took place, and Baum declared that Mrs. Newman [meaning the said Hattie R. Newman] had frequently been "stark naked" before him [meaning that she, the said Hattie R. Newman, had neither clothes nor covering of any kind on or about her person at the times he, the said Baum, had seen her, and had frequently thus exposed and shown her person to the said Baum], and to prove it told how many scars she had on her person. Hagerstown never had a more disgraceful affair, for so much of which can't be told in print. But to show what kind of fellow John C. Newman is: he came to Martinsburg a few Sundays after it occurred in company with his wife (?) [meaning that there was some question and doubt as to the said Hattie R. Newman being the lawful wife of said John C. Newman, and that they were living together presumably as man and wife, instead of being lawfully married to one another] and he preached (?) and she played and sung in the church, and so they live to demoralize the young under the guise of religion. Who blames an editor for objecting to such a moral leper and malodorous scamp as John C. Newman praying for him in public? There is no place in hell hot enough for such dirty scoundrels; but there will be nothing done about it in the Free Will Baptist denomination of this Valley, because he is too good a lackey. May God Almighty soon deliver the race of devils in the pulpit, and let our children have better examples.

"While his wife (?) [meaning that there was some question and doubt as to the said Hattie R. Newman being the lawful wife of the said John C. Newman, and that they were living together presumably as man and wife, instead of being lawfully married to one another] is black in character, John C. Newman is blacker, because he feigns to be a preacher, and is too low himself to put his foot on such rotten conduct, for well does he know that it would be kettle calling pot black."

"To the great scandal, injury, and disgrace of the said Hattie R. Newman, and against the peace and dignity of the state."

The defendant demurred to the indictment, which demurrer was overruled. At the September term, 1901, the case was tried upon the plea of not guilty, and a verdict of guilty returned by the jury. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment and to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, which motions were also overruled and judgment entered for a fine of $100 and cost of prosecution, and further provided for imprisonment of defendant in the Berkeley county jail until the fine and costs should be paid, for a period not exceeding 60 days. The defendant gave bond under section 10, c. 36, Code 1899. Upon the trial the defendant took four bills of exceptions, numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, respectively, and procured from one of the judges of this court a writ of error and supersedeas.

The first assignment of error is the overruling of the demurrer to the indictment, claiming that "the indictment is not sufficiently explicit, inasmuch as it did not inform the defendant as to what specific portions of said articles were complained of." The indictment seems not to include anything as applying to the husband of Hattie R. Newman, the J. C. Newman mentioned in the indictment, but the prosecution is for defaming the name of Hattie R. Newman only. The entire article is set out in the indictment, and the parts relied upon are brought to notice by innuendoes which sufficiently set out the statements relied upon, and gives the defendant notice of what he is expected to answer. In State v. Aler, 39 W. Va. 549, 20 S. E. 585, syl., point 2, it is held: "It is an elementary rule of pleading that whatever is alleged must be alleged with certainty, and one of the means of insuring certainty in a complaint or indictment for slander or libel is innuendo." Point 3 of the same case holds "An innuendo may serve for an explanation to point a meaning where there is precedent matter expressed or necessarily understood or known; but never to establish a new charge." Kraus v. Sentinel Company (Wis.) 19 N. W. 384; Freeman v. Sanderson (Ind. Sup.) 24 N. E. 239; 13 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 102. Words imputing want of chastity to a woman are slanderous and actionable per se. Ronnie v. Ryder (City Ct. Brook.) 8 N. Y. Supp. 5; Newman v. Stein, 75 Mich. 402, 42 N. W. 956, 13 Am. St. Rep. 447; Prescott v. Tousey, 50 N. Y. Super Ct. 12; 82 Cent. Dig. par. 71, Col. 1933. It is also contended by defendant that the innuendoes do not give the natural meaning of the statements which they purport to explain. But, where the article itself is libelous, the innuendo may be regarded as surplusage. 13 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 103: "If the words charged are not libelous per se, an innuendo is necessary. Of course, if the words complained of are unambiguous and obviously defamatory, no innuendo is necessary. If the indictment is good without an innuendo, the innuendo may be rejected as surplusage." Oting Commonwealth v. Snelling, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 321.

The second assignment of error relates to the refusal of the court to allow witness John C. Newman to be asked the following question: "Did you not tell of the said conversation at the investigation of the school board about March 21, 1899?"—as set out in bill of exceptions No. 1. The question was asked in an attempt to affect the credibility of the said Newman as a witness, who had testified that Baum's knowledge of the scars on the person of Hattie Newman came from a conversation which he had had with said Baum in which he told Baum about the scars. Baum had testified that he knew of the scars on Hattie Newman by inspection. Baum and Hattie Newman were teachers in the colored school at Hagerstown, and their conduct had been investigated by the board of education, and it appears in the record that she had been exonerated. There is nothing brought out in the evidence concerning the school investigation which would have made it material for Newman to have said anything about the scars at that time, and whether he made any reference to it at that time is not material to the issue in this case, and whatever his answer might have been it would not be material.

The third assignment of error was the refusal of the court to permit Newman being asked the following question: "Are you the same John C. Newman who offered up prayers for J. R. Clifford at Harpers Ferry in 1899?"—as set out in bill of exceptions No. 2. This question was also immaterial and could not affect the case at bar, and it was not error to exclude it. McClagherty v. Cooper, 39 W. Va. 313, 19 S. E. 415, syl., point 4, says: "Whether matter is material to the issue depends on the question whether its truth or falseness would affect the issue; and, if the truth or falseness would not affect the issue, the matter is not material." What difference could it possibly make in this case whether the witness was the same man who had offered up prayers for defendant or not.

The fourth assignment of error, as in bill of exceptions No. 3, was that the court erred in not setting aside the verdict of the jury and granting the defendant a new trial because of the language used by the prosecuting attorney in his closing argument before the jury. The language referred to is as follows: "If he had been born a beast, would have been a polecat; if he had been born a bird, would have been a buzzard; if he had been born a reptile, would have been a lizard; if he had been born a fish, would have been a mudcat; and, if a man, a libeler." To the use of which language the defendant, by his attorney, objected and called the attention of the court to the same, and the court very promptly instructed the jury that the language was improper and ought not to have been used, and that it should not be considered by the jury in any way against the defendant. The fact that the court instructed the jury that this language was improper and should not be considered would counteract any effect the language may have had to prejudice the jury against the defendant, if it did not really prove a benefit to the defendant. In State v. Allen, 45 W. Va. 65, 30 S. E. 209, syl., point 7, it is said: "Counsel necessarily have great latitude in the argument of a case, and it is, of course, within the discretion of the court to restrain them; but with this discretion the appellate court will not interfere, unless it clearly appears from the record that the rights of the prisoner were prejudiced by such line of argument." And in Landers v. Railway Co., 46 W. Va. 492, 33 S. E. 296, syl., it is held: "In order to authorize this court to revise errors predicated upon the abuse of counsel of the privilege of argument, it should be made to appear that the party asked and was refused an instruction to the jury to disregard the unauthorized statements of the counsel." State v. Shawn, 40 W. Va. 1, 20 S. E. 873; State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. 413, syl., point 13, 13 Am. St. Rep. 875.

The fifth assignment of error was that the court erred in not setting aside the verdict of the jury because the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the jury returning a verdict of guilty. The question of the weight of evidence is with the jury and a verdict should not be set aside unless it is clearly shown there is no substantial evidence at all to support their finding. In this case the defendant in his testimony states that he was the editor of the paper publishing the article set out in the indictment; and further says: "I am the author of that article." The defendant not only does not deny the writing and publishing of the article, but seems to be proud of it, and attempts to justify its publication on high moral grounds that he did it from pure motives, says he "wrote to arouse public sentiment." Such articles published habitually for a time in a decent community would evidently succeed in "arousing public sentiment," and, if it failed to do so, the moral standard of the community permitting such obscene publications could not be considered very high. It was for the jury to say whether the publication was true and published "with good motives and for justifiable ends."

The sixth assignment of error was that the court erred in not setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial because of the conversation had between the juror J. Henry Kastle and W. L. Gaff after the case had submitted to the jury and before rendering the verdict. According to the affidavits of Gaff, Kastle, and A. S. Garrett, who was also present, the conversation amounted to this: Kastle came into the store and Gaff asked him if he was still courting, and Kastle replied that he was. Then Gaff said that from the evidence he had heard it would be hard for him to decide the case, as the woman swore one way and the man the other: Kastle making no reply to this statement. There was no expression of opinion on the part of Kastle or others which showed any prejudice on the part of Kastle against the defendant, nor could the remark of Gaff have any influence on the juror tending to change his judgment in the case. When it clearly appears from the record that the defendant could not have been prejudiced by a remark made to a juror during the course of the trial, the court would not set aside the verdict when the evidence is plainly sufficient to justify the verdict found. In State v. Miller, 24 W. Va. 802, the remark that "the defendant was in a tight place" was made in the presence of two of the jurors, and was held not sufficient to set aside the verdict.

The seventh assignment of error was that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial on the affidavit of defendant showing newly discovered evidence. The affidavit of J. R. Clifford, filed in support of his motion for a new trial, gives the names of some three or four witnesses, and shows by his affidavit what he expects to prove by them, respectively, and that he discovered this since the trial. The affidavit seems to be sufficient in form, but fails to produce the affidavit of any of said witnesses showing that they were ready to and would testify to the facts set forth in case a new trial were granted. It is well settled that, in order to entitle the mover to a new trial for newly discovered evidence, he must accompany his motion with the affidavit of the witnesses by whom he expects to prove the facts stated, showing that said witnesses are ready to so testify to such facts, or, if the affidavit of the purported witnesses is not produced, the applicant must show satisfactory excuse for the absence of such affidavit. Defendant wholly fails to show any excuse why the affidavits of the witnesses are not produced. As held in State v. Williams, 14 W. Va. 851, syl., point 2: "Upon a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered testimony, the testimony of the newly discovered witness should be substantially set out in the affidavit of the witness, as it can be testified to in the court before the jury, or a satisfactory excuse be shown for the absence of the affidavit." Citing in support of the decision Armstrong Mfg. Co. v. Thompson (Sup.) 88 N. Y. Supp. 151. 4 Cur. Law, 861, refers to said Armstrong Mfg. Co. v. Thompson Case in note 76.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BROOKSHIRE v. FARMERS' ALLIANCE EXCHANGE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, Limited, et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 18, 1905.)

CORPORATIONS—DISSOLUTION—RECEIVERS.

A corporation directed its directors to wind up the affairs and return the stock to the contributors. At the time the corporation was solvent. A stockholder sued for the appointment of a receiver to wind up the affairs and distribute the stock. There was evidence that the directors under the direction of the stockholders had invested the stock in bank stock. The charter of the corporation provided that its funds should be used to conduct a mercantile agency. The stockholders had acquiesced in such investment for ten years, and thereafter they loaned the money on good security. Some of the funds were lost in conducting the business for which the corporation was formed, but no fraud or mismanagement was charged, and no neglect on the part of the officers was shown. Held, that the suit would be denied.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Carey, Special Judge.

Action by H. E. Brookshire, on behalf of himself and others, against the Farmers' Alliance Exchange of South Carolina, Limited, and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See 51 S. E. 442.

The following is the opinion of the court below:

"At a meeting of the trustee stockholders of the Farmers' Alliance Exchange, held on the 29th day of October, 1902, a resolution was duly passed: 'That the State Exchange is hereby dissolved, and the directors are instructed to pay out the funds to the contributors through the county and subtrustee stockholders, as provided by the charter, as soon as practicable.' Article 14 of the plan of the Alliance Exchange provides: 'Whenever this corporation may be dissolved, either by limitation of its charter or from any other cause, the stock shall be returned through the county and subtrustee stockholders to the original contributors.' Under this authority, the board of directors were winding up the affairs of the corporation and preparing to return the stock, or a pro rata thereof, to those entitled thereto. In March, 1903, this action was brought, whereby it was sought to have the court take charge of and wind up the affairs of the Alliance Exchange and appoint a receiver as an aid thereto. It is not alleged or claimed by the plaintiff that the Alliance Exchange is insolvent. On the contrary, the evidence shows that it owes but little, if anything. It is not only solvent, but has about $17,000 to be returned to its stockholders. The question for me to determine is whether the court should take the liquidation of the Alliance Exchange out of the hands of the board of directors, where the stockholders and plan of organization have placed it, and itself, through the aid of a receiver, wind up its affairs. To justify the court in taking this course the necessity therefore should be very clear. 'A court of equity is disinclined to take the control and management of the affairs of a corporation out of the hands of its officers and directors and substitute its receiver therefor. Nor are mere irregularities in the management of a corporation, without fraud committed or intended, sufficient for the appointment of a receiver, courts of equity being very reluctant to appoint receivers for corporations, because such appointment is a practical displacement of the boards of directors and the lawfully constituted corporate authorities.' 23 Enc. Law, 1021-23. The burden is upon the plaintiff to make this necessity appear. The danger of loss of the funds of the Alliance Exchange or serious impairment thereof is alleged in the complaint as one of the grounds for the court to take charge of the same. The plaintiff charges that the different boards of directors of the exchange for many years failed to use the funds intrusted to them in the manner prescribed by the charter and plan of organization, which resulted in loss to the stockholders. The corporation was organized in the year 1889, and of the capital stock there was paid in the sum of $23,395.35. The funds now in hand amount to $16,465.65, with some interest thereon. It is evident, therefore, that there has been a diminution of the original fund.

"But how did it occur? The charter is very broad, but the main business engaged in by the Alliance Exchange was that of conducting an agency for the purchase and sale of supplies for the benefit of the Farmers' Alliance. This business was certainly authorized by the charter and plan of the exchange. M. L. Donaldson was the first manager of the agency, which position he held until the 1st day of January, 1892. The testimony shows that the business was not successful under his management, and resulted in a loss to the Alliance Exchange of over $4,000. D. P. Duncan was his successor, and held the position of manager from 1892 until 1900, and his management resulted in a loss to the exchange of $2,600. These losses resulted from the conduct of business authorized by the charter and plan of organization through the regular agents of the corporation. These agents were acting within the scope of their authority and the corporation is bound by their acts. There is no charge in the complaint that they were guilty of any fraud or mismanagement for which they should be held liable to the exchange. Duncan is not made a party to the suit and Donaldson is made a party as a creditor; the complaint alleging that the Alliance Exchange is indebted to him. The testimony satisfies me that the diminution of the capital stock was the result of unsuccessfully conducting a business authorized by the charter and plan. The corporation and its stockholders must therefore bear the loss. It is also charged by the plaintiff that the funds of the exchange have been used by the directors for the purpose of reorganizing suspended alliances and paying salaries and expenses of an organizer of suballiances, and for the purpose of paying the salaries of managers and officers of the exchange and for other unwarranted uses and purposes. There is no proof of these charges; but, on the contrary, the proof is the other way. It is also charged by the plaintiff that the board of directors has failed and refused to pay many just claims against the exchange, thus subjecting the funds of the corporation to danger and impairment in paying the costs of litigating said claims. There is no proof of this. The testimony satisfies me that the exchange owes practically nothing. The only debts hinted at in the testimony are the claims of M. L. Donaldson and J. C. Coit, which are disputed by the board of directors, and neither of these gentlemen have testified in this case as to any debts. But even if they have valid claims against the exchange, they can sue the corporation. This action is brought for the benefit of stockholders and not creditors. That there is no danger here is conclusively shown by the fact that notwithstanding an order has been passed in this case allowing creditors to prove their claims, none have been established. It is also charged by the plaintiff that repeated efforts have been made by the stockholders of the exchange to have the directors carry out the purposes of the exchange or to wind up the corporation. The proof is that the directors have always obeyed the instructions of the stockholders and were promptly proceeding to wind up the affairs of the exchange under the resolution of the stockholders, till their efforts were arrested by the filing of this suit. It is further charged by the plaintiff that many of the suballiances owning stock in the exchange, have become inoperative and their members become scattered, and it is impossible to have a majority of the stock represented at any meeting of the stockholders. The testimony shows that about 90 per cent. of the stock was represented at the meeting of stockholders on October 29, 1902, which passed the resolution to go into liquidation. The vote was $14,827 of the stock for the resolution and $4,337 against it. It is further charged by the plaintiff that the board of directors own, manage, or control the majority of the stock of the exchange represented by the active stockholders, and are thereby enabled to control the action of the corporation. Of this charge there is no evidence whatever. I do not think the board of directors are trying to control the stockholders to the injury of the minority stockholders.

"It is further charged by the plaintiff that the board of directors had in the year 1900 on deposit in the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company about $20,000, and that they invested the same in a personal loan, and that no part of the same is being used for the charter purposes of the corporation. The history of this fund is that in the year 1893, the agency business of the exchange not being successful, the funds of the same were invested in stock in the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank and used in a banking business. This was expressly authorized by the stockholders and has been acquiesced in by them for over 10 years, and I do not think at this late day can be complained of by dissatisfied stockholders. It was authorized and ratified and acquiesced in them. 'An application for a receiver is not entitled to favorable consideration when the plaintiff has lain for a long period of years and quietly acquiesced in a condition of affairs which he seeks to change by obtaining a receiver.' High on Receivers, 14. This was done by a previous board of directors, and even if unauthorized would furnish no ground for taking the affairs of the corporation out of the hands of the present board and appointing a receiver. 'A remote or past danger will not suffice as a ground of relief, but there must be a well-grounded apprehension of immediate injury. And where the wrong complained of occurred, if at all, several years before the application for the relief, and so long since as to afford no ground for apprehension of impending danger, and no act is alleged as being now threatened, a receiver will not be allowed.' High, 13, 14. That a corporation has lost the greater part of its property and permanently abandoned its business is not alone ground for the appointment of a receiver for its remaining assets on the application of minority stockholders. It must be shown in addition that its officers have been guilty of such mismanagement of its affairs as renders a receivership necessary to preserve the existing corporate property. Clark v. Linseed Oil Company, 105 Fed. 787, 45 C. C. A. 53; 23 Enc. Law, 1022. Nearly all of the matters complained of by the plaintiff in this case happened long ago and under the management of previous boards. The board of directors in 1900 found the funds of the exchange invested in stock of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank. The dividends received on this stock were not satisfactory, and a sale of the stock was made to J. P. Matthews at par, less $1,850, the amount of an overdraft made by the agent of the corporation, D. P. Duncan. The overdraft was for $2,600, but $750 of the amount was paid from the fund realized from sale of evidences of indebtedness. The note of the said J. P. Matthews was taken for said stock for $16,465.65 and secured by a deposit of $20,000 of the capital stock of said bank. In 1902, the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company bought the business and property of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank, and other notes secured by stock of the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company were given by J. P. Matthews and indorsed by Matthews and Bauknight. The fund is now in this shape and amply secured.

"Do these transactions justify the appointment of a receiver? I do not think so. Much has said about the directors acting outside of the charter and plan of organization. The charter, after enumerating many things which the exchange could do, uses these words: 'And to conduct all other enterprises that may be necessary and desirable to their profit and benefit.' This is broad enough to cover all transactions complained of. The plan of the organization provides that the 'capital stock shall be a sacred trust fund to be used only in the purchase of goods.' Ever since the exchange ceased to purchase goods the different boards of directors have endeavored to preserve the fund and have done so. The board, in putting the fund in its present shape, used good judgment, and did an act resulting in a benefit to the stockholders. Complaint has been made against them for paying the overdraft of the agent of the corporation. There is no proof before me that this overdraft was for obligations for which the corporation was not liable. The interest on the fund since the change of investment amounts to much more than the overdraft. There is no proof that this interest has been wasted or illegally used. In addition to this, the stockholders have acquiesced in this change of investment ever since it was made, and with full knowledge thereof have in meeting assembled practically endorsed the action of the directors by directing them to return the fund to the original contributors. The fund is practically in money, for it can be converted into money on short notice. The case of Matthews v. Bank, 60 S. C. 183, 38 S. E. 437, has no application here. There the stockholders at a regular meeting authorized the directors to pay out its assets to the stockholders. They paid out a part of the assets to the stockholders and then commenced a banking business, lending money to themselves and others, and losing assets by bad management. The proof in this case shows no such state of facts, but shows that as soon as the directors were directed by the resolution of the stockholders to do so, they proceeded to wind up the affairs of the corporation and to obey the resolution. In the recent case of Klugh v. Coronaca Milling Co., 68 S. C. 100, 44 S. E. 566, it was held that minority stockholders, seeking to wind up the affairs of a corporation for negligence or mismanagement on the part of its officers or board of directors, must show on the part of the managers (1) fraudulent acts; (2) ultra vires acts; (3) negligence of corporate directors. The testimony fails to convince me that the present or any other board of directors of the exchange have been guilty of fraudulent acts, but does satisfy me that they have acted in good faith towards the stockholders, and nearly always under their instructions and with their approval. I see no such ultra vires acts as justify putting the exchange in the hands of a receiver. I have already discussed this question. Especially is this true at this late day. In the case of Johnstone v. Railroad Company, 39 S. C. 55, 17 S. E. 512, the court uses this language: 'As the complaint shows that this lease was entered into as far back as 1886, about five years before this action was commenced, and as it does not show that any dissatisfaction even has heretofore been expressed therewith either by the directors or stockholders, it is very clear that even if the lease was made without authority originally, yet it can afford no grounds for this action brought by two of the stockholders.' See, also, Johnson v. Rock Hill, 57 S. C. 381, 35 S. E. 568.

"Is there negligence on the part of the corporate directors justifying the appointment of a receiver? I think not. The investment made by the board of directors shows good management and not negligence. The fund was put out at interest and abundantly secured and can be converted into cash at any time. There is no danger to the fund. As to any accounting, the directors have accounted in this case and have for distribution the funds which came into their hands. The case as I see it, is about this: The directors have on hand about $17,000 belonging to the original contributors, and the question is, shall the court take charge of it and administer it, or permit the directors to return it under the resolution of the stockholders and plan of the organization? It is said the plan is impracticable. It is the corporation's own plan adopted by all sub-alliances. I do not regard it any more difficult than for the court to undertake to distribute the fund, and it is certainly much cheaper. The plaintiff has failed to make such a showing as justifies taking the affairs out of the hands of the directors, who are charged with the liquidation thereof, and entailing upon the fund the expenses of a receivership and the heavy costs of administering the affairs of the corporation by the court. The action having failed in its purpose, it follows that the complaint should be dismissed.

"It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the application to the court to take charge of the affairs of the Alliance Exchange and appoint a receiver therefor be denied, and the complaint dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay the costs of this action."

James S. Verner and Bellinger, Townsend, Townsend & Haskell, for appellant. Lyles & McMahan and Hunt, Hunt & Hunter, for respondents.

POPE, C. J. This court is fully satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions of the circuit judge.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

WOODS, J., did not sit in this case because disqualified.

THOMASON v. THOMASON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 15, 1905.)

DIVORCE—INJUNCTION—DISPOSAL OF PROPERTY.

Pending a suit for alimony, the circuit court issued an injunction restraining the husband from disposing of certain funds. Held, that an order modifying the injunction so as to pay half of the fund to the husband, and to invest the balance in certain lands in the name of the husband, and to enjoin him from transferring the same, sufficiently protected the wife's rights.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; D. A. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Lillie Thomason against Claude Thomason. From an order modifying an injunction restraining defendant from receiving certain funds, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Evans & Finley and Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Stanyarne Wilson, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. An order was made on the ex parte application of the plaintiff whereby his honor, Judge D. A. Townsend, enjoined the defendant, Claude Thomason, from receiving the sum of $4,200 until the further order of the court. This sum was the proceeds of defendant's judgment against the Southern Railway Company on account of injury received by him from said railway. The ground of the plaintiff's application for the injunction prayed for was the claim of plaintiff for alimony after charging her husband with desertion, etc. Subsequently, after due notice, the defendant moved for a dissolution of the injunction already granted. Upon due consideration, his honor, Judge Townsend, ordered a modification of his injunction by allowing the defendant to receive the sum of about $2,181, but restraining the defendant, who had suggested his willingness that so much of his money so received from the Southern Railway Company as was necessary to pay for the tract of land, containing 138½ acres, near Crawley station, in said county of Spartanburg, in this state, should be held by the clerk of court and so invested, from transferring said tract of land until the further order of this court. From this modification of said original order of injunction of Judge Townsend, the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

After careful consideration, the court is of the opinion that the order of Judge Townsend should be affirmed, as it seems to fully protect whatever right the plaintiff may establish under the allegations of her complaint. Inasmuch as the cause is yet to be heard upon its merits, we do not deem it necessary or proper to discuss the testimony submitted on the hearing before Judge Townsend. The order of Judge Townsend restrains the defendant from transferring the said tract of land until the further order of the court. We construe this as intending also that the defendant shall not mortgage or incumber the same until the further order of the court.

It is the judgment of this court that the order appealed from be, and the same is, affirmed.

JARO v. HOLSTEIN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 2, 1905.)

1. PARTIES—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—WRONGFUL SEIZURE—ACTION AGAINST CONSTABLE—STATE AS PARTY.

In an action against a state constable in claim and delivery for mules and wagon seized by him because hauling contraband liquor, the state is not a necessary party.

2. EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

In claim and delivery for mules and wagon seized by a state constable in hauling liquors, a bill by a wholesale liquor dealer, purporting to show that the liquor was bought for personal use, is admissible as part of the res gestæ.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—TRANSPORTATION IN STATE—SEIZURE.

Where liquor is bought in another state and transported from the place of purchase to be delivered to a party within the state by a private person, with the knowledge that it will be used for illicit traffic, it may be seized by the state constable while in the state in the possession of the party carrying it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 868.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Action by Martin G. Jaro against J. C. Holstein. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. N. Graydon, for appellant. Wm. P. Greene, for respondent.

JONES, J. In this action of claim and delivery the plaintiff recovered judgment for the possession of two mules and a wagon, and $35 damages. The appeal relates mainly to the following defense set up in the defendant's answer: "That he is a state constable, whose duty it is to look after the enforcement of the dispensary law of this state. That having information that the defendant was violating the dispensary law of the state, by hauling and handling contraband liquor both in the day and night time, this defendant was on the lookout for plaintiff, and on the night of 18th of August, 1904, near Clark's Hill, in Edgefield county, in the said state of South Carolina, this defendant found the said Martin G. Jaro with three gallons of contraband liquor in a wagon, pulled by two mules, and under and by virtue of the laws of this state this defendant seized said whisky and the wagon and team so unlawfully engaged, and reported the same to the state authorities, had the same appraised and advertised, and was preparing to carry out the law, when they were taken from this defendant's possession by the proceedings herein." The circuit judge struck out of the answer as irrelevant the words: "That having information that the plaintiff was violating the dispensary law of this state by hauling and handling contraband liquor, both in the day and night time." The appellant very properly made no effort in argument to sustain the exception as to this order. The allegation was clearly irrelevant. The issue was whether plaintiff was actually hauling contraband liquor, so as to forfeit the mules and wagon—not whether defendant had information that he was doing so.

The defendant's next proposition that the state was a necessary party has been settled against his view by a number of cases. Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 58, 17 Sup. Ct. 265, 41 L. Ed. 632; In re Tyler, 149 U. S. 164, 13 Sup. Ct. 785, 37 L. Ed. 689; Pennoyer v. McConaughy, 140 U. S. 20, 11 Sup. Ct. 699, 35

L. Ed. 363. The bill made out by the wholesale dealers from whom the liquor was purchased, purporting to show that it was bought for the personal use of the individuals therein mentioned, was admissible in evidence for what it was worth. "A memorandum made at the time of negotiating a verbal contract and relating to its terms may be admitted as pars rei gestæ." 24 Am. & E. Ency. Law, 688; 1 Elliott on Evidence, §§ 556 and 537.

All the other nine exceptions relating to the admissibility of evidence and the charge to the jury may be disposed of by considering the fourth and ninth exceptions, which are as follows: "(4) Because his honor erred in refusing to allow defendant's attorney to ask the plaintiff, Jaro, when he was on the stand, if he did not know that the man Stone, at Parksville, was recognized in the community as a liquor seller, and in ruling and holding that it made no difference whether the liquor was intended for illegal sale or not, and in further holding that the fact of it being purchased for the purpose of illegal resale could not make any difference, whereas it is respectfully submitted that if a party brings liquor into the state, knowing that it is intended for an illegal purpose, then he cannot protect himself on the ground that he is engaged in interstate commerce, and his honor erred in holding to the contrary.

* * * (9) Because his honor erred in charging the jury, at the request of the plaintiff, the following proposition: '(2) That a party has a right to buy liquors outside of the state of South Carolina and transport them to any point within the state of South Carolina, and if he buys them and while they are being transported to their destination in the state of South Carolina, even though such liquors are intended for an unlawful use, they cannot be seized until they reach their destination, neither has an officer of the state the right to seize any conveyance, horses, mules, or harness accompanying the same before they reach their destination.' It is submitted that said charge is erroneous, for the reason that if a party intends an illegal use of whisky, he is particeps criminis, and is not entitled to the protection of the law, which only applies to liquors brought into the state for a legal use."

It is contended that the ruling and charge of the court is sustained by the cases of Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 42 L. Ed. 1068; State v. Holleyman, 53 S. C. 207, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567; Smith v. Lafar, 67 S. C. 493, 46 S. E. 332; State v. Moody, 70 S. C. 56, 49 S. E. 8. In the case of Rhodes v. Iowa, supra, there was a shipment of intoxicating liquors into Iowa from another State, and the agent of the railroad carrier in Iowa, when the merchandise reached its destination, moved the package from the car in which it had been transported to the freight depot, preparatory to delivery to the consignee. It was claimed that this removal by the carrier's agent was in violation of the Iowa statute, on the ground that, under the Wilson act (Act Cong. Aug. 8, 1890, c. 728, 26 Stat. 313), the police power of the state operated upon the property the moment it passed the boundary line of the state. The court held that the subject of any interstate shipment is protected by the interstate commerce power until such shipment is consummated by the arrival of the goods at their destination and their delivery to the consignee. But it should be noted that there was no suggestion in that case that the consignee ordered the liquors for any unlawful purpose and that the carrier was aiding and abetting in the attempt to violate the state law. The case of Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co., 170 U. S. 438, 18 Sup. Ct. 674, 42 L. Ed. 1100, upholds the right of a citizen of South Carolina to order from another state for his personal use intoxicating liquors to be delivered in South Carolina. All the decisions of the United States Supreme Court construing the Wilson act subject intoxicating liquors to the police control of a state after complete delivery to the purchaser or consignee; but it has not been held, so far as we can ascertain, that the police power of a state is powerless to reach the case of a carrier, who is also the purchaser of intoxicating liquors for himself and others, and is transporting the same with knowledge that such liquors are intended for illicit sale. The case of State v. Holleyman holds that intoxicating liquors purchased in another state for the use of the purchaser himself, and transported by him in his own private conveyance across the state line towards his home, have not arrived within the state, within the meaning of the Wilson act of Congress, so as to be contraband, while in the course of transportation between the state boundary and the home of the purchaser. The majority of the Supreme Court, in banc, held that such a transportation was within the protection of interstate commerce; but the decision does not go to the extent of holding that a party in actual possession of intoxicating liquors bought for himself and others, and procured for illicit traffic, is beyond the police power of a state, merely because such liquors are in course of transportation by the purchaser in his own private vehicle from a point without, to a point within the state. The case of Smith v. Lafar merely decides that liquors shipped from one state into another by express are in transit while in possession of the express company, and an action lies against a dispensary constable, individually, for willful and malicious seizure of liquor in transit, shipped for personal use. In that case, the court used the following language: "Liquor purchased in another state and shipped to the purchaser in this state is not contraband, being protected as an article of interstate commerce until it is delivered to the purchaser. Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 42 L. Ed. 1068; State v. Holleyman, 55

S. C. 244, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567. The fact that the purchaser to whom it is consigned is engaged in the illicit sale of liquor and purchases it for the purpose of resale cannot make any difference. The liquor is none the less an article of interstate commerce, and cannot be lawfully seized until delivered to the consignee. This language, however, must be construed in the lights of the facts of that case, as should be done in every case; otherwise the general language of the court may lead to inferences and conclusions not intended by the court or warranted by the particular case. That case involved an interstate shipment founded on an interstate contract whereby the duty of the carrier required a delivery to the consignee at the termination of the shipment. Manifestly interstate commerce protected the liquor until delivery to the consignee. The mere fact that the consignee intended it for illicit sale, of course, could not affect the carrier's duty to deliver in pursuance of the interstate contract. What would be the law if the carrier was aiding and abetting the illicit traffic by making purchases and transporting liquor for such purposes, is a question not involved and not considered in Smith v. Lafar.

In the present case, it appears that the plaintiff, whose property was seized, was both purchaser and carrier, and the case sought to be submitted to the jury in justification of the seizure was that the carrier, with knowledge of the purpose to sell the liquor unlawfully, was by the act of transportation and purchase aiding and abetting in the attempt to violate the state law. The case of State v. Moody does not sustain the ruling of the circuit court, but, on the contrary, is in conflict therewith. In that case intoxicating liquors had been purchased by the defendants for themselves and others at Dockery's distillery, in North Carolina, and were being transported through Marlboro county for delivery to parties living in Darlington county. They were arrested in Marlboro county while engaged in transporting said liquors, and were indicted for such offense. The judge charged the jury, in substance, that, while one may lawfully transport liquor into this state for his own and another's personal use, yet that, if it was being transported for an unlawful purpose, it was liable to seizure and the party liable to arrest. The above charge was approved by this court. In determining the question whether a particular state statute is invalid as an attempted exercise of police power because it conflicts with interstate commerce, it must be remembered that the United States Supreme Court has announced the rule that state regulations, enacted in the exercise of the police power, are not void unless they directly interfere with or burden interstate commerce. Numerous cases may be cited to show that regulations may be valid notwithstanding they remotely or indirectly, or for a limited time or to a limited extent, affect interstate commerce. Examples may be found in the case of Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 16 Sup. Ct. 1086, 41 L. Ed. 166, which upheld a state statute making it a misdemeanor to run a freight train on the Sabbath, as applied to a freight train engaged in interstate commerce; in the case of Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, 19 Sup. Ct. 465, 43 L. Ed. 702, which upheld the statute of Ohio requiring regular passenger trains within that state to make daily certain stops each way at towns of over 3,000 inhabitants, as applied to interstate passenger trains; in the recent case of Pabst Brewing Company v. Crenshaw, 198 U. S. 17, 25 Sup. Ct. 552, 49 L. Ed. 925, which upheld a statute of Missouri subjecting intoxicating liquors, arriving in the state, to inspection regulations, as no interference with interstate commerce because it operated to deter shipments into the state.

The prime object of the federal commerce power is to protect the freedom of legitimate trade among the states. This great power is acknowledged to be paramount as to all matters not reserved to and inherent in the police power of the states, but it ought never to be so extended as to become an aid and shield for unlawful traffic. The police law of the state, which is designed to uproot illicit traffic in intoxicating liquors by seizure within this state of liquors intended for such traffic, does not materially or injuriously affect legitimate interstate commerce. It leaves wholly unhampered the citizen's right to import for personal use, and not for sale, and subjects no innocent agent of interstate commerce to the penalty of law for discharging any proper duty of such agency. We think that the principle announced in Plumley v. Mass., 155 U. S. 416, 15 Sup. Ct. 154, 39 L. Ed. 223, is applicable here. In that case a statute of Massachusetts designed to prevent fraud and deception in the sale of imitation butter, as applied to oleomargarine brought into Massachusetts from other states, was upheld as not in violation of interstate commerce. Undoubtedly oleomargarine was a legitimate article of interstate commerce, and under the case of Lelsy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 10 Sup. Ct. 681, 34 L. Ed. 128, it would not be in violation of any valid state law to sell oleomargarine, as such, in the original package in which it was imported, as interstate commerce would protect it until sale in such package. The court, however, proceeds to show that the doctrine of Lelsy v. Hardin did not apply to the case then before the court, which involved the right of a state to protect the public from deception and fraud in the sale of this food product. The court said: "The Constitution of the United States does not secure to any one the privilege of defrauding the public. The deception against which the statute of Massachusetts is aimed is an offense against society, and the states are as competent to protect their people against such offenses or wrongs as they are to protect them against crimes or wrongs of a more serious character." Upon similar grounds we think that interstate commerce will not protect intoxicating liquors imported into this state for an unlawful purpose, if the importation is in such a way as to make the carrier an aider and abettor in the scheme to violate state laws. Under these views, the ruling and charge of the court were erroneous.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Ex parte WALLACE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Findings of fact in a proceeding in a probate court for admeasurement of dower by the circuit court on appeal from the probate court are binding on the Supreme Court, and will be affirmed when supported by the evidence.

2. ACTIONS—ADMEASUREMENT OF DOWER—ACTION AT LAW.

A proceeding in the probate court for admeasurement of dower is an action at law.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Jos. A. McCullough, Special Judge.

Action by Fannie C. Wallace against E. Barton Wallace and others. From a decree affirming a judgment of the probate court, Fannie C. Wallace appeals. Affirmed.

Lyles & McMahan and J. E. McDonald, for appellant. Allen J. Green, for respondents.

JONES, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover dower in a certain dwelling and lot containing nine acres of land in and adjoining the city of Columbia. It was not disputed that William Wallace was once seized of the premises in question, that he was married to plaintiff in 1876, and died in 1902. It appears that on February 21, 1863, pursuant to a power of attorney to him, E. J. Arthur, as attorney in fact for William Wallace, executed a deed conveying the premises to Sarah Wallace and John Wallace in trust for the use of said William and his family during his natural life, and after his death for his children. On March 3, 1864, William Wallace, as executor of his father's will, filed his return in the probate court, showing the distribution of his father's estate under the will, by which it appears that the premises in question had at that time been substituted as a part of the trust estate settled on him under his father's will, in lieu of his note, at the appraised value of $6,024 and $3,981 in cash paid him, and upon his return he is credited as of the 21st of February, 1863, accordingly. There was testimony, however, that the deed was in the possession of William Wallace in 1881. This deed was not recorded until July 14, 1894.

The demand for dower is based upon the contention that this deed was delivered July 14, 1894, during coverture. The circuit court concurs with the probate court in finding as a fact that the said deed was delivered at the time it purports to have been executed. This being an action at law, the conclusion of the circuit court on a question of fact is binding on this court. It cannot be said that there was absolutely no testimony to support such finding. It must follow that the plaintiff is not entitled to dower in said premises.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POWERS—BORROWING MONEY.

Municipal corporations have no authority to borrow money, unless such authority is expressly given, or unless some duties are imposed or powers conferred on the corporations which could not be exercised at all without borrowing money.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1844.]

2. SAME—PUBLIC BUILDINGS—DEBT FOR CONSTRUCTION.

Municipal corporations may contract debts for erecting municipal buildings, to be restricted to such sums as the corporation could reasonably expect to pay out of the ordinary revenues for the fiscal year; but where a building is erected in good faith, and the expense exceeds the estimate of revenues, the indebtedness thereby incurred is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1842.]

3. SAME—NOTE FOR DEBT.

Where the officers of a town of less than 1,000 inhabitants under a municipal resolution give a note for the money used in erecting a necessary public building, and the note is afterwards renewed under resolution, it is invalid; but the holder may recover of the town the amount received and used by the town as money had and received.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1844.]

4. SAME — NOTE — ESTOPPEL TO DENY VALIDITY.

Citizens and voters of a town adopted a resolution at a town meeting for the building of a town hall, and knew of the application of the town revenues in part to the building and that the money was borrowed to pay for the balance. Held, that they were not estopped from claiming that a note given for the money by the town officers was void for want of authority in the officers.

Suit for injunction by R. L. Luther and others against J. S. Wheeler and others. Decree rendered.

Bellinger & Townsend, for petitioners. Hunt, Hunt & Hunter, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The plaintiffs, as resident taxpayers of the town of Prosperity, brought this action to enjoin the defendants, as intendant and wardens constituting the town council of that town, from paying a note for

$1,000 given to the Bank of Prosperity for money borrowed for the purpose of building a town hall, market, and guardhouse. On the application of plaintiffs' attorneys, his honor, Chief Justice Pope, granted at chambers, on August 4, 1904, a temporary injunction, and required the defendants to show cause why it should not be made permanent. The defendants appeared on August 18, 1904, in answer to the rule to show cause, and it then appearing that issues of fact were involved, H. C. Holloway, Esq., was appointed referee, "to take the testimony and report the same, together with his conclusions thereon, to the Supreme Court at its regular November term, 1904." The facts as found by the referee are substantially as follows: On March 9, 1902, after due notice given by the town council, about 65 or 70 out of the 90 or 95 registered voters of the town of Prosperity, at least one of the plaintiffs being present, met at the High School building for the purpose of nominating an intendant and wardens to serve for the ensuing year. The testimony shows after the nominations a resolution to the effect that it be "the sense of this meeting that the new council procure a lot, and erect thereon a town hall, market, and guard house," was unanimously adopted. The design and cost of the building were not considered at this meeting, and at no time was the question of borrowing money for its erection ever submitted to the citizens of the town, the newly elected council assuming entire charge of all these matters. The new council made an estimate of the income of the town for that fiscal year, and reached the conclusion that by managing economically they could pay $150 for the lot, expend $1,500 on the building, and still meet the ordinary current expenses of the town. On June 30, 1902, a lot for the site of the building was actually purchased at the price of $150, council giving the note of the town for the purchase money, with interest, due in one year. Relying on their estimate, council passed an ordinance on July 5, 1902, to borrow $1,000 from the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company, Columbia, S. C., "for the purpose of building city hall." A resolution dated July 9, 1902, and properly signed and attested by the town officials, authorized the borrowing of $1,000 from the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company with which "to carry on the affairs of the town," the obligation to be secured by pledge of "the taxes of the town arising from the levy for the present year, or the profits derived by the town from the dispensary, or both if necessary." This resolution is not referred to in the minute book of council, but the referee found that it was the same as the ordinance mentioned as passed on July 5, 1902; and this seems correct, council explaining the apparent difference in purpose for which the money was borrowed by saying that when it was found necessary to borrow they decided to put the sum borrowed into the common treasury and pay it out as needed, whether for work on the building, or for ordinary current expenses. On July 11, 1902, the town council negotiated the note of the town for $1,000, payable January 10, 1903, the resolution of July 9th being attached, at the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company, and received thereon $960. At this time the only debt outstanding against the town so far as the testimony shows was the $150 note given for the purchase money of the lot. It is true the ordinary current expenses for the remainder of the year had to be met, but the resolution authorizing the creation of the debt specified that the money was to be used "to carry on the affairs of the town," and there is nothing to show that the bank had express notice of the original ordinance specifying that the money was to be used for the purpose of building a town hall.

The cashbook of the town shows that the total municipal income from all sources for the fiscal year beginning April 22, 1902, was $1,832.19. The receipts up to July 11, 1902, were $455.56, and the expenditures $440.82, of which $297.60 was paid out on the building and the balance on current expenses. This left available to council $1,391.37 with which to pay the ordinary current expenses from July 11th to the end of that fiscal year, amounting to $1,001.13, and with which to pay the balance of $1,352.40 on the lot and building debts of $1,650, thus showing council had fallen far short in their estimate. If the $1,650 had not been spent on the town hall, council would have had a balance of $687.84 on hand at the end of the fiscal year; but, instead of limiting the cost of the building and lot to $1,650 as originally contemplated, they decided to enlarge and improve the building, and to meet the additional expense borrowed on September 8, 1902, $600 from the Bank of Prosperity, giving therefor the note of the town, payable in one year, thus making the total indebtedness of the town for the fiscal year 1902 $3,394.35, as against a total income of $1,832.19. At maturity, on January 10, 1903, the $1,000 note to the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company was taken up by the Bank of Prosperity, and a renewal note, under the seal of the town, was given by the council; the ordinance authorizing such action, which was similar to the resolution under which the original debt was incurred, being attached thereto. A like second renewal note was given at the maturity of the first, in 1904, under the authority of a similar ordinance. From this it clearly appears that this last renewal note for $1,000 to the Bank of Prosperity, maturing January 7, 1905, payment of which is herein sought to be enjoined, evidences the same debt that was created on July 11, 1902, with the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company. Thus it will be seen that council had created a debt against the town of $1,750, evidenced by three notes for $150, $1,000, and $600, respectively, which would necessarily have to be paid by a future council, after the expiration of their term of office, and out of taxes and licenses to be levied and collected in another fiscal year, and so the revenues of a future fiscal year would have to be applied to the payment of a debt contracted in a prior year. From the cashbook of the town it appears that the total income of the town, including cash on hand, from April 22, 1903, to April 26, 1904, was $1,806.95, and the expenditures $1,743.96, which included payment of the $150 note for the purchase money of the lot and of the $600 note to the Bank of Prosperity. The total income of the town from January 1, 1903, to January 1, 1904, was $1,504.17, and from January 1, 1904, to November 1, 1904, $1,292, showing that at no time have funds been on hand with which to pay the note for $1,000 held by the Bank of Prosperity. At the time it was determined to erect this building, the council had no place to meet, the market was in bad condition, and the guardhouse totally inadequate; and therefore it was necessary to erect a building of some kind for municipal purposes. When completed, the town hall cost $2,291.01, but the work appears to have been done cheaply, and the building to be quite satisfactory in every way. During the progress of the work on the building, itemized statements of the receipts and expenditures of the town, showing the amount of its indebtedness and to whom due, were published in the newspaper or posted in public places, and any other information of this kind could have been had from the clerk and treasurer. Plaintiffs acquiesced in the incurring of these debts and the building of the town hall to the extent of making no complaint until the bringing of this action. We consider first the general principles of law applicable to the case, and then the effect of the Constitution and the statute law of the state.

Municipal corporations have only such powers as are granted to them by the Constitution or by statute, either expressly or by necessary implication. The following statement of the law, taken from 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 89, is supported by practically unbroken authority: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." State ex rel. Heise v. Town Council, 6 Rich. Law, 404; State ex rel. Atkins v. Maysville, 12 S. C. 76; Blake v. Walker, 23 S. C. 517; White v. Rock Hill, 34 S. C. 242, 13 S. E. 416; Columbia Club v. McMaster, 35 S. C. 1, 14 S. E. 290, 28 Am. St. Rep. 826; Mauldin v. City Council, 42 S. C. 293, 20 S. E. 842, 27 L. R. A. 284, 46 Am. St. Rep. 729. The power to borrow money is not a necessary incident of municipal life, and hence does not exist unless expressly given, or unless some duties are imposed or powers conferred on the corporation which manifestly could not be exercised at all without borrowing money. The two leading cases on the subject are Mayor of Nashville v. Ray, 19 Wall. 468, 22 L. Ed. 164, and Swackhamer v. Hacketts-town, 37 N. J. Law, 191. Authorities to the same effect will be found collected in 8 Rose's Notes, 253; note to Jones v. Camden (S. C.) 51 Am. St. Rep. 828; Wells v. Town of Salina (N. Y.) 23 N. E. 870, 7 L. R. A. 759; Allen v. Intendant of La Fayette (Ala.) 8 South. 30, 9 L. R. A. 497; 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, §§ 125 (1), 507a; 20 A. & E. Ency. Law, 1143. The contrary view was taken in a number of the earlier cases cited in 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 118, and by some of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Nashville v. Ray, supra. There is now, however, little, if any, judicial dissent from the view that municipal officers are not the general fiscal agents of the corporation, with the implied power to borrow money for corporate purposes. This conviction of the courts has been greatly strengthened by the disasters which have befallen so many communities, growing out of the negligent and fraudulent misappropriation of money borrowed by counties, cities, and towns. In State ex rel. Atkins v. Maysville, 12 S. C. 76, the court says: "The only point discussed at bar is the power of the town of Maysville to levy taxes. It appears that no express authority is granted for that purpose in its charter. Such power can only be implied on the ground of necessary implication. To raise such an implication, it would be necessary to hold that municipal powers cannot be effectively granted without the taxing power—a proposition that we cannot affirm. No such power of taxation can therefore be implied." The power to levy taxes is far more usual and necessary to corporate existence than the power to borrow money on the faith of taxes, and, if the former is not implied from the fact of incorporation, for a stronger reason the latter is not.

There is, however, an obvious difference between borrowing money, even for the purpose of applying it to the ordinary current expenses of the town, and contracting debts to those who are employed to do those things requisite to the conduct of the town's affairs, such as street laborers, policemen, etc., or even for the erection of buildings to be used for municipal purposes. "In the one case the application of the credit is secured to the advancement of the authorized object, while money borrowed is liable to be lost, to be squandered, or to be diverted to illegitimate purposes." 2 Daniel on Neg. Inst. § 1530. Under the general rule of law, the council of the town of Prosperity could have made a debt for a town hall and guard-house to one who contracted to build it. Neely v. Yorkville, 10 S. C. 141; 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 125 (6); Police Jury v. Britton, 15 Wall. 586, 21 L. Ed. 254; Mayor of Nashville v. Ray, 19 Wall. 468, 22 L. Ed. 164; 21 A. & E. Ency. Law, 31; Clalborne County v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 4 Sup. Ct. 489, 28 L. Ed. 470; Merrill v. Monticello, 138 U. S. 673, 11 Sup. Ct. 441, 34 L. Ed. 1069; Allen v. Intendant of La Fayette (Ala.) 8 South. 30, 9 L. R. A. 497; Newgass v. City of New Orleans (La.) 7 South. 565, 21 Am. St. Rep. 368; Clark v. City of Des Moines, 87 Am. Dec. 423, and note. But even the power to contract debts for municipal purposes should be restricted to such debts as the council could reasonably expect, and in good faith did expect, to pay from the ordinary revenue of the town for the current municipal fiscal year. Without such a restriction, it is manifest there would be no safeguard against involving the town in overwhelming debt for municipal buildings and enterprises out of all proportion to its present or reasonably to be expected population and wealth. While this might not imply the same moral turpitude, it is as disastrous to the taxpayer as intentional misappropriation of borrowed money. Especially when any unusual enterprise is contemplated, all who deal with the municipal authorities are chargeable with knowledge that the council would have no right to involve the town in debt for its prosecution, unless, after a careful estimate, they with good reason believed there would be a surplus revenue for the current year, over all necessary current expenses, sufficient to pay the debt to be contracted for such building or other enterprise. If, however, such an estimate is made, leading to the reasonable conclusion that the anticipated revenue will be sufficient to meet the debt contemplated for the municipal building or other special enterprise as well as current charges, and accordingly the building or other enterprise is commenced, and any considerable expense incurred, and then it should turn out that the estimates of the expenses were too low, or the estimates of the revenue too high, indebtedness thereafter incurred in the prosecution of the enterprise would nevertheless be valid, because the law is not so unreasonable as to require in such circumstances the waste of the public funds which would be consequent upon the abandonment of the work in an incomplete condition. Judicial expression as to this limitation upon the power of municipal officers to contract debts in the name of the corporation, which we think should be insisted on, is not as explicit as might be desired; but this view is clearly intimated in the very strong opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Bradley, in Nashville v. Ray, supra. And the view of Judge Dillon is that the usual grants of municipal powers contemplate that the expense of the execution of such powers shall be met year by year from revenue derived from current taxation and other ordinary sources. 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 125. The case of Neely v. Yorkville, supra, is not an authority to the contrary, for there one of the bonds in issue was dated February 11, 1861, and the other June 4, 1861, and both were payable January 1, 1862. Presumably, they were given in anticipation of the collection of the revenues of 1861. Certainly there is no evidence in the record that they were not so given, and the question here under discussion, as far as the reported case shows, was not made in argument and was not referred to in the opinion. But even if the general rule of law should be thought not so rigid as we have stated it, as to the circumstances under which a municipality may contract debts without special authority, as we shall hereafter see, it was made so by the Constitution of 1865.

The indorsement of a note given by a municipal corporation which has no power to borrow money, or which has not exercised such power in compliance with the conditions required by law, cannot avail to give it validity. The Bank of Prosperity, therefore, cannot stand on any higher ground than the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company. There was never any power, either real or apparent, to give the note, and being therefore void from the beginning, no force could be given it by indorsement. Even when the power to borrow money is expressly given, though the holder of the paper is not bound to see that the money is properly applied, yet he takes it subject to the risk that it has been properly and lawfully issued. The authorities to this effect are so numerous that we refer only to Jones v. Camden, 44 S. C. 323, 23 S. E. 141, 51 Am. St. Rep. 819; Claiborne County v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 4 Sup. Ct. 489, 28 L. Ed. 470; Brenham v. German-American Bank, 144 U. S. 173, 12 Sup. Ct. 559, 36 L. Ed. 390. Under the principles of law to which we have adverted the conclusion cannot be avoided that the note held by the Bank of Prosperity, having been given for borrowed money, is not a valid obligation of the town. Of course, if the instrument here under consideration, in form a note, is to be regarded a bond, that would be an additional reason for holding it void; for it is not pretended there was any compliance with the constitutional conditions essential to the validity of a municipal bond issue. The question is not a practical one in this case, because the instrument is invalid, even if it be regarded as a note, since it was given for borrowed money. The court does not, however, wish to be understood as assenting to the proposition, urged by counsel for the plaintiffs, that a paper, in form a promissory note, becomes a municipal bond, merely because it has affixed the seal of the corporation. Bank v. Railroad Company, 5 S. C. 156, 22 Am. Rep. 12.

Regarding the note entirely void, and therefore eliminated from the transaction, it is still to be considered whether the bank could recover the amount loaned for which the note was given, as money had and received by the town; not because it had been loaned to the town, or because its officers had borrowed it and promised to pay it, but because it was money of another used by the town for legitimate corporate purposes authorized by law. Cogent argument may be made and strong authority adduced on both sides of this question. The argument against such a recovery is stated with great force by Beasley, C. J., in Swackhamer v. Hackettstown, supra, and by Judge Earle, in Wells v. Salina (N. Y.) 23 N. E. 870, 7 L. R. A. 759. The view expressed in these and other cases is that to allow a recovery for money had and received, while denying the power to corporate officers to make a valid contract to repay borrowed money, would be (1) to repudiate such a contract in the abstract while ratifying and giving it full effect in the concrete, and (2) to raise an implied contract to repay where there is no power to make an express contract. A statement of the basis of the action for money had and received, we venture to think, will show that these arguments are not sound. Express contracts and contracts implied in fact depend upon the will of the parties to be bound, indicated in the one case expressly in some form recognized by law, and in the other by circumstances from which assent may be inferred as a conclusion of fact. Quasi contracts, or contracts implied in law, are obligations imposed by law as duties, quite independent of the assent of the party held to be bound, and often in spite of his earnest dissent. In an action on an express contract, or a contract implied in fact, the measure of the recovery is ordinarily fixed by the promise. In an action depending on the obligation or duty called quasi contract, the measure of the recovery is the extent of the duty or obligation imposed by law, and is expressed by the amount which the court considers the defendant has been unjustly enriched at the expense of the plaintiff. If a recovery were allowed against a municipal corporation on a note for money borrowed, the judgment must be for the amount of the note, however large, and though the money may have been squandered. But in an action against a town for money had and received, the question is not what the claimant has parted with to officers who were not authorized to take his money for the town, or what they have promised him, but how much has the town been benefited. If the money was squandered, there can be no recovery; if it was used extravagantly, for buildings or enterprises not reasonably necessary for municipal purposes, there can be no recovery beyond the actual benefit. This view, it will be seen, leaves no room to say that a promise to pay back money is implied where no valid contract can be made, or that allowing any recovery for money had and received subjects the town to the same peril as to admit the unrestricted right of a municipal council to borrow money. The right to such a recovery is supported by the weight of authority, as will appear by reference to the following citations, though it has been denied, as we have seen, by courts whose opinions should receive great consideration. 1 Dillon on Munic. Corps. § 126, note, and sections 460-461; 20 A. & E. Ency. Law, 1158; Keener on Quasi-Contracts, 272; Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, 19 L. Ed. 1040; Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 6 Sup. Ct. 1055, 30 L. Ed. 176; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 1 Sup. Ct. 442, 27 L. Ed. 238; Chelsea Savings Bank v. City of Ironwood, 130 Fed. 410, 66 C. C. A. 230; Allen v. Intendant of La Fayette (Ala.) 8 South. 30, 9 L. R. A. 497. The view of the court expressed in Bank v. State, 60 S. C. 465, 38 S. E. 629, 85 Am. St. Rep. 865, is not in the least inconsistent with this view. The distinction between that case and this is made obvious by these sentences of the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Jones: "Nor do we think this action can be sustained, as contended by the respondent, as an action for money had and received. The state has only received that to which it was entitled, viz., money for the hire of convicts, received from the hands of the superintendent of the penitentiary. Plaintiff has paid no money to the state by mistake; for in the eye of the law plaintiff dealt with Neal, not with the state, and received from Neal all that it contracted for, the liability of the makers of the notes, supported by Neal's indorsement." There the state was not unjustly enriched, but received only its due, and there was no legal or equitable principle upon which it could be required to refund to a mere volunteer.

In this case these important facts are established: (1) The money was expended for a municipal purpose impliedly authorized by the charter, because reasonably necessary for the proper conduct of municipal affairs; for we suppose it will not be disputed that both under the general principles of law and the special provisions of the statute, the expenditure of public funds for the erection of a guardhouse, council chamber, and town hall would be sustained; (2) the town received full benefit for the entire amount expended; (3) the council had reason to believe, and did believe, when the building of the town hall was commenced and until they had expended on it about $300, that the entire debt of $1,000 contemplated and afterwards contracted to the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company could and would be repaid from the regular income of the town for the current fiscal year, and if the bank had exhausted all means of inquiry into the town's affairs, as it was its duty to do, nothing would have been discovered beyond these facts. If the general principles of law above stated are applied to these facts, the conclusion is obvious that the Bank of Prosperity as the equitable assignee of the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company could recover against the town the sum advanced as money had and received by the town for its benefit. But it remains to consider to what extent, if at all, these general rules have been modified by the Constitution and the statutes of this state—whether these general rules have been so altered that the town of Prosperity is under no legal obligation to refund the amount received from the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company. For it is to be observed that while a recovery for money had and received does not require either an express contract or a contract implied in fact to support it, yet it does require for its support a debt imposed by law, and where the Constitution or statute law of the state forbids, not only the borrowing of money, but the incurring of any debt, or that a debt, to be valid, must be created under certain restrictions, as, for instance, that it must have the sanction of taxpayers or voters expressed at an election, then there can be no recovery for money had and received. In its last analysis, the action for money had and received stands on the judicial conception that the use by one person of the money of another creates a debt; but this judicial conception manifestly could have no application to municipal corporations in the face of positive constitutional or statute law that no debt shall be contracted by a municipality or that a debt shall be contracted only in a certain manner.

Warned by the disasters resulting from the abuse of public credit, the constitutional convention of 1895 endeavored to protect it by making the sanction of a referendum in almost all cases necessary to the validity of public debt. Even the General Assembly was forbidden to increase the debt of the state, except by the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the qualified electors voting at a popular election, Const. 1895, art. 10, § 11. As to municipal corporations, the Constitution provides: "The General Assembly shall provide by general laws for the organization and classification of municipal corporations. The powers of each class shall be defined so that no such corporation shall have any powers or be subject to any restrictions other than all corporations of the same class." Const. art. 8, § 1. The General Assembly, in pursuance of this requirement, divided towns and cities into classes according to population. The town of Prosperity falls in the class of those containing less than 1,000 inhabitants. The Constitution further provides, in section 3, art. 8: "The General Assembly shall restrict the powers of cities and towns to levy taxes and assessments, to borrow money and to contract debts, and no tax or assessment shall be levied or debt contracted except in pursuance of law, for public purposes specified by law." For the creation of a debt of any description, therefore, it is necessary for municipal authorities to find either legislative authority or warrant in some other provision of the Constitution itself. In the statutory provision relating to towns of less than 1,000 inhabitants, to be found in article 1, c. 49, of the Civil Code of 1902, which may be said to constitute the charter of such towns, no authority is given to contract a debt of any description whatever, not even to anticipate in any way the collection of taxes for the current fiscal year. The fact that by section 1989 of the Civil Code of 1902, relating to towns of over 1,000 inhabitants, it is provided: "In cities of over 5,000 inhabitants, that, in anticipation of the collection of taxes in any fiscal year, said city council may from time to time, as occasion may require, borrow money for corporate purposes and pledge the taxes levied, or to be levied, in said year for said purposes for the payment of the money so borrowed and interest thereon"—clearly implies that the General Assembly did not intend to confer upon towns of less than 1,000 inhabitants the power to borrow money for corporate purposes, and pledge the taxes of the current year for its payment. But, as we have seen, the power to borrow money is a much larger and more dangerous power than the power to contract a debt, either for labor or supplies, or for money had and received for the benefit of the town. In the one case, the lender has only to show that the proper corporate officer received the money, and his right to recover does not in the least depend upon the benefit accruing by the actual application of the money; in the other, he who furnishes money can only recover for a debt arising from the actual benefit or enrichment of the town at his expense. The exclusion by omission, therefore, of towns of less than 1,000 inhabitants from the provision allowing towns to borrow money in anticipation of the collection of taxes does not necessarily imply an intention to deny such towns the power to create a debt of any kind in anticipation of the collection of current taxes.

While, as already said, there is no warrant in any act of the General Assembly for the creation of any debt by towns of less than 1,000 inhabitants, the following constitutional provision, attached as a proviso to the section prohibiting the creation of bonded indebtedness, except upon certain conditions, applies to all municipal corporations, and we think does warrant the creation and payment of a debt, like that now under consideration, by any municipality organized under the laws of this state, including those of less than 1,000 inhabitants: " * * * This section shall not be construed to prevent the issuing of certificates of indebtedness in anticipation of the collection of taxes for amounts actually contained or to be contained in the taxes for the year when such certificates are issued and payable out of such taxes." This section of the Constitution was framed and adopted in the light of the law of municipal corporations to which we have referred as generally recognized in this country. The well-established rule of law denying the right of municipal corporations to borrow money without special authority conferred expressly, or by necessary implication, was well known when the Constitution was adopted, as one of the greatest safeguards against waste and corruption. If it had been intended to change this rule, there would have been an express conferring, or, at least, an express recognition of the power to borrow money. Hence we think it would be going much too far to hold that this section gives by implication the power to borrow money on certificates of indebtedness, which would of course be binding on the corporation as soon as the money passed into the public treasury, without respect to whether it should thereafter be used for corporate purposes or not. But this provision of the Constitution must be held to have been made in view also of the other established rule to which we have adverted, that the proper municipal officers may contract debts for services actually rendered and money had and received to the actual benefit of the town in the prosecution of authorized municipal work, in anticipation of the taxes or other revenue, and with the reasonable expectation at the time the work was commenced and expenses incurred, that payment could and would be made from such expected revenue of the current year. When, therefore, the convention recognized the authority of municipalities to contract debts and issue certificates in anticipation of the expected collection of taxes, it plainly meant those debts which the existing law recognized as being within their province and authority to contract, and, as we have seen, a debt for money had and received for the benefit of the town, used in an enterprise authorized by law reasonably necessary for corporate purposes, the town receiving full value and the council believing and having reason to believe it would be paid from the revenue of the current year, was within the province and authority of the officers of the corporation. It is true, section 3, art. 8, of the Constitution, provides that no debt shall be "contracted except in pursuance of law, for public purposes specified by law." But this section is necessarily modified by section 7, which follows, and allows indebtedness to be incurred in anticipation of the collection of taxes. There is in this last section no specification of any particular purposes for which such debts may be contracted, and the meaning, therefore, manifestly is, they may be contracted for any legitimate corporate purpose. This was the character of the debt to the Bank of Prosperity, and its payment is authorized by the general rules of law, and is not only not forbidden by constitutional or statute law, but on the contrary, the authority to create such a debt is strongly implied in the Constitution itself. The debt being valid at its creation, its validity is not affected by the fact that it turned out that the reasonable expectations of the council as to the ability to pay from anticipated revenues were not realized, or even that the revenues received for the current year were exhausted by the application of them to other purposes.

It is true, the referee finds that on July 11, 1902, when the money was actually received from the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company, in expecting to repay it from the revenue of the current fiscal year, the council did not take into the account the ordinary current expenses for the remainder of the year; but at the beginning of the fiscal year they did take all items into the account, and reached the conclusion that the money to be expended on the town hall could be refunded in addition to providing for the ordinary current revenues, and when the money was received from the bank had actually expended on the building about $300. To prosecute the work thus in good faith begun, rather than incur the waste of abandoning it, stood on nearly as high ground of necessity as the ordinary expenses of the town.

The character of the debt was not changed by the several renewals of the note; for it was not created by the original note, which was given entirely without authority, and it therefore could not be changed in character by any change of the note. The note was of no force as against the town, but as between the Palmetto Bank & Trust Company and the Bank of Prosperity it should be recognized as the symbol of the debt, and hence its indorsement to the Bank of Prosperity will be recognized as a transfer of the debt. The note being without validity, and not representing the debt as between the town and the bank, the rate of interest expressed in it is of no consequence. The real debt is $900, the amount actually received and used, with interest from July 11, 1902, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, less any sums paid by the town thereon in the form of discount, interest, or otherwise.

Under the views herein expressed, it is not necessary to discuss the question of acquiescence; but it may be well to say that there was no evidence of participation or active assent by the plaintiffs to the borrowing of money or the incurring of the debt, and hence there could be no estoppel. Milster v. Spartanburg, 68 S. C. 34, 46 S. E. 539.

The judgment of this court is that the town council of Prosperity be enjoined from paying more than the real debt as above stated. As the practical result is mainly in favor of the defendants, the plaintiffs must be charged with the costs of the cause.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not participate in this opinion because of illness.

JOHNSON et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)
RIOT—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

There was no error in the rulings on the admission of evidence. The alleged newly discovered evidence was impeaching in its character. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial will not be interfered with. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Wrightsville; Wm. Faircloth, Judge.

J. D. Johnson and others were convicted of riot, and bring error. Affirmed.

E. L. Stephens, for plaintiff in error. B. B. Blount, for the State.

COBB, P. J. Johnson and two others were arraigned upon an accusation charging them with the offense of riot. The act of riot alleged in the accusation was surrounding the house of the prosecutor, throwing walnuts against the house, firing off pistols, and shouting to the occupants that, if they did not like it, to come out and show themselves. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the defendant assigns error upon the refusal of the judge to grant a new trial.

The court admitted evidence to the effect that at the time of the alleged riotous conduct, the wife of the prosecutor was so badly frightened that she fainted, and further admitted in evidence a sack containing rocks and walnuts shown by a witness to have been picked up about the house the morning after the alleged riot. The objection to all this evidence was that it was irrelevant. There was no merit whatever in this assignment of error. It is apparent that the evidence threw light on the conduct of the accused at the time of the alleged riot. Persons in the house claimed to have recognized the rioters through a crack in one of the windows. One ground of the motion for a new trial is alleged newly discovered evidence as to the size of this crack; it being contended that under this evidence it was impossible for the witnesses to have seen what they claimed to have seen. This evidence was impeaching in its character. The discretion of a trial judge, exercised in passing upon a motion for a new trial based upon a ground of this character, in the absence of anything indicating an abuse of such discretion, will not be interfered with. The evidence authorized the verdict, and no sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

CROSSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. COURTS—CITY COURT—CERTIORARI—NEW TRIAL.

The city court of Sylvester was not, by the act of August 11, 1904 (Laws 1904, p. 207), regularly established as a constitutional city court. White v. State, 49 S. E. 715, 121 Ga. 592. See, however, repealing act, and that creating a new court to be known by the same name, approved August 21, 1905 (Acts 1905, pp. 868, 869). A judgment of a city court, not created under the provisions of paragraph 5, § 2, art. 6, of the Constitution, can be reviewed only by a writ of certiorari. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Jackson, 25 S. E. 264, 98 Ga. 212. The power to grant new trials is confined by the Constitution to the superior courts and such city courts as are therein specified. Stewart v. State, 25 S. E. 424, 98 Ga. 202; Cooper v. State, 30 S. E. 249, 103 Ga. 406; Welborne v. State, 40 S. E. 857, 114 Ga. 793.

2. CERTIORARI — WHEN ALLOWED — TIME OF APPLICATION.

"The fact that, in a given case tried in the city court mentioned, a motion for a new trial was made, will not cut off the movant's right to take the case up by certiorari, if he voluntarily dismisses such motion and applies for the writ of certiorari within the time prescribed by the statute." Archie v. State, 25 S. E. 612, 99 Ga. 23. But he cannot pursue this remedy after the expiration of 30 days from the date of the judgment rendered against him. White v. State, 51 S. E. 505, 123 Ga. 503. As the city court judge was without power to entertain the motion for a new trial, it was a mere nullity, and the filing thereof could not operate to extend the jurisdiction of the court over the case beyond the date of its final judgment. White v. State, 51 S. E. 505, 123 Ga. 503, distinguishes the case of Roach v. Sulter, 54 Ga. 458.

3. SAME — DISMISSAL.

The application for the writ of certiorari having been made too late, the judgment of the superior court dismissing it for that reason should not be disturbed.

CITY COUNCIL OF AUGUSTA et al. v. CLARK & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. LICENSES — MUNICIPALITIES — CLASSIFICATION — REVIEW BY COURT.

When a city charter authorizes a municipality to require by ordinance a license tax of persons engaged in any occupation, trade, or business carried on within the corporate limits of the city, the municipal authorities may by ordinance classify the different occupations for taxation, and impose different taxes in different amounts upon the different classes; and a classification made by such authorities will not be interfered with by the courts, unless it manifestly appears that the classification is unreasonable and arbitrary.

2. SAME — ARBITRARY CLASSIFICATION.

The classification of persons lending money upon personal property or personal security in a different class from chartered banks, negotiators of loans on realty, real estate agents, and dealers in bonds and stocks, and the imposition of a tax differing in amount upon such money lenders from that imposed upon such other classes, is not so wanting in reason that the ordinance providing for such classification will be declared void as being entirely arbitrary.

3. USURY — PENALTY — POWER OF MUNICIPALITY TO IMPOSE.

In the absence of express charter power, the authorities of a municipality have no authority to impose a penalty upon one charging usury.

4. LICENSES — ORDINANCE — MONEY LENDERS.

A tax ordinance imposing a license tax on money lenders, and providing that the license shall be void whenever the usury laws of the state shall be violated, is invalid so far as the forfeiture is concerned, but valid as to the tax upon the business.

5. SAME — BOND — VALIDITY OF REQUIREMENT.

A tax ordinance fixing the amount of tax to be levied upon an occupation, and requiring the person engaged in this occupation to give a bond in conformity with an act of the General Assembly, is not void as to the tax, even though that part of the ordinance requiring the bond may be invalid.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Clark & Co. against the city council of Augusta and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Clark & Co. filed a petition for injunction against the city council of Augusta and the sheriff of the city, containing substantially the following allegations: On December 22, 1904, the city council of Augusta adopted an ordinance levying taxes for the support of the government of the city for the year 1905, and in the ordinance a license or business tax of $350 was imposed upon a certain class of persons, to which plaintiffs belonged; such class being described in the ordinance as follows: "Money Lender. A money lender as contemplated by this ordinance is one who carries on the business of lending his own or other peoples money, and not as a stock and bond broker, pawnbroker, chartered bank, negotiator of loans on realty, real estate agent or firm of such agents, or dealers in bonds and stocks as herein provided, but who carries on the business of lending money on personal security or personal property, other than stocks and bonds, shall also be deemed a money lender, $350.00. Provided, this license is issued by the city and accepted by the licensee with distinct understanding and agreement that whenever the licensee in the conduct of his business shall violate the usury laws of Georgia, this license shall be thereby forfeited, and from the date of such violation it shall not be lawful for such licensee to do further business under this license, and must file a bond in conformity with state law. Money lender, agent or agency for collection of claims, or carrying on business in the city, whether office located in city or not, subject to foregoing provisions, $350.00." It is alleged that that portion of the ordinance just quoted is void, first, because it discriminates against money lenders of the class to which plaintiffs belong in favor of negotiators of loans on realty, who are really money lenders under another name, the license upon the latter being only $50, and that this discrimination is in violation of that provision of the Constitution of the state which declares that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of citizens; second, the ordinance provides that the license shall be forfeited when one holding the same shall violate the usury laws of the state, the provision for forfeiture being void for the reason that the state statutes on the subject of usury are exhaustive in reference to penalties and forfeitures; third, the ordinance requires the applicant for the license to file a bond in conformity with the state law, and the state law referred to, being the act of August 15, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 79), is violative of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, the provisions which it violates being those which declare that protection to person and property is the paramount duty of the government, and that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and that citizens of the United States residents of this state shall be declared citizens of this state, and it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to pass such laws as will protect them in the full enjoyment of their rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship; and that laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state, and no special law shall be passed in any case for which provision has been made by general law; and that the right of the people to be secure in their houses and persons against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and that the act also violates that provision of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. It is alleged that the city council of Augusta and the city sheriff, attempting to enforce the provisions of the state law and the ordinance against plaintiffs, have caused execution to be issued which has been levied upon the property of the plaintiffs, and that the sheriff will proceed to sell the same, unless steps are taken to stop the sale. It is alleged that the plaintiffs were engaged in the business of lending money in the city of Augusta when the ordinance was passed. The prayers of the petition are for injunction to restrain defendants from proceeding further with the execution, for general relief, and for process. To this petition the defendants filed a demurrer and an answer. The answer admitted the allegations so far as they related to the existence of the ordinance, but denied that the ordinance was in any way in violation of either the Constitution of Georgia or the Constitution of the United States. It was alleged in the answer that the plaintiffs had not paid the license in accordance with the ordinance, and that they had never in any way complied with the statute referred to, and that they had never filed the bond required by the ordinance, nor in any way complied with the statute referred to in the petition. It was alleged that plaintiffs were engaged in a gross violation of the usury laws of the state; the percentage which they charged being 400 and 500 per cent. per year. The case was heard by the judge on the petition, demurrer, and answer; and an injunction was granted as prayed for in the petition. To this ruling the defendants excepted. The ordinance also levied a tax on the persons engaged in the following businesses: Banks (excepting such as are exempt by law) capital stock not exceeding $100,000, $50; exceeding $100,000 paid capital, $100; stock and bond broker, $75; negotiator of loans on realty only, $50; pawnbroker, $350; real estate agent, $25; private banks, $350.

C. Henry Cohen, W. H. Barrett, and Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiffs in error. Louis Brooks, Austin Branch, and Jos. Hall, for defendants in error.

COBB, P. J. 1. The charter of the city of Augusta authorizes the city council to pass an ordinance requiring any person, firm, or corporation to pay a license tax upon any occupation, trade, or business carried on within the corporate limits of the city, provided that the occupation, trade, or business is not one already taxed exclusively by the state. Acts 1896, p. 119. Under this power the city council is authorized to determine what occupations shall be made the subject of taxation. The charter does not require that the same tax shall be imposed upon every occupation. But the Constitution requires that taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects. All property within the territory of a taxing power shall be taxed, and none shall be exempted, except that which the Constitution in terms authorizes the Legislature to exempt. The Constitution, however, does not require all occupations to be made the subject of taxation. Some may be taxed, and some may be left free from taxation, according to the discretion of the taxing authority. But, when a given class are subjected to an occupation tax, all of that class must pay the same tax. Civ. Code, § 5883. It will thus be seen that the Constitution recognizes the propriety of classifying subjects for taxation other than property, and leaves the matter of classification to the determination of the taxing power, whether it be the General Assembly or one of the subordinate public corporations created by it. The classification of occupations for taxation must not be purely arbitrary, but must be founded upon some valid or sufficient reason. Whether there is a reason for the classification is a question primarily intrusted to the judgment of the taxing power, but is subject to be reviewed by the courts; and, whenever the classification is shown to be unreasonable and arbitrary, the courts will interfere, and prevent injustice from resulting from such a classification. It will be seen from the ordinance that a tax of $350 is levied upon money lenders of the class to which plaintiffs belong, as well as upon pawnbrokers and private banks. So far as the amount of the tax is concerned, these three occupations are placed in the same class. Chartered banks and other classes of money lenders are taxed in lesser and different amounts, varying from $25 to $100.

2. There is no contention that the tax is excessive in amount, and therefore the decision in Morton v. Macon, 111 Ga. 162, 36 S. E. 627, 50 L. R. A. 485, is not pertinent to any of the questions raised in the present case. The question is whether money lenders of the class to which the plaintiffs belong are essentially of the same class as chartered banks, negotiators of loans, real estate agents, and lenders upon stocks and bonds. Taxes are imposed upon all these classes, but in different amounts. They are each separate and distinct occupations, varying from each other in their nature as to the details of the business carried on, and simply because they all might be classified in the one general class of lenders of money is no reason why these different occupations might not be arranged in different classes for the purpose of taxation, and a different amount of tax placed upon each. If the classification is not subject to the criticism of being arbitrary and without foundation in any sound reason, the fact that a different amount of tax is levied upon the different classes is wholly immaterial, where no question is made as to the tax upon a particular class being excessive in amount. It is within the power of a city council, under charter authority of the character possessed by the city council of Augusta, to make one general class of all persons engaged in the business of lending money; and it is also in their power to subdivide this general class into further classes, so long as the subdivision is not wholly arbitrary and unreasonable. The subdivision of the general class of money lenders as set forth in the ordinance does not seem to be wholly without reason; and, as the right to classify exists and the right to determine the amount to be placed upon each class is reposed in the city council, we do not think the ordinance is subject to the criticism made upon it in the petition.

3, 4. It is contended that that portion of the ordinance levying a tax upon money lenders is rendered void by reason of the provision therein that a violation of the usury laws shall work a forfeiture of the license. The effect of this provision in the ordinance is to impose a penalty for usury. It purports to work a revocation of the license of one engaged in the business of lending money; and, if the city has authority to require a license to engage in this class of business, the forfeiture of this license is nothing more or less than a penalty for charging usury. The language of the ordinance indicates that this was the purpose and intent of this enactment. The laws of this state regulate the rate of interest to be charged, and provides what penalty shall be imposed for the exaction of usury. These laws are exhaustive upon this subject, unless there is something in the charter of the city expressly authorizing it to deal with the subject of a penalty for usury. It is not claimed that there is in the charter any such authority. The ordinance, so far as it purports to impose a penalty upon money lenders for usury, is absolutely void for want of authority in the city to enact that provision. But we do not think this provision in the ordinance vitiates the whole ordinance upon the subject of taxation upon money lenders. The purpose of the ordinance was primarily for the raising of revenue, and not the punishment of usury, and that part of the ordinance which attempts to punish the usurer is such an insignificant part of the ordinance as a whole, and even of the particular provision, that it may be eliminated therefrom without affecting the validity of what remains. Whether any part of a law can be upheld when one part of it is invalid depends upon whether the invalid part is so connected with the scheme of the law that it is to be presumed that the lawmaking power would not have passed the law without its inclusion therein. Of course, no one will contend that the passage of the ordinance for the purpose of levying taxes for the support of the city government was so dependent upon the provision imposing a penalty for usury upon money lenders that without it the ordinance would not have been passed. See in this connection, Mattox v. State, 115 Ga. 212, 41 S. E. 709.

5. It is contended that the ordinance, so far as it relates to money lenders, is invalid, for the further reason that the ordinance requires the money lender to file a bond in conformity with the state law; the state law being the act of 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 79), providing for the regulation of the business of lending money on household goods, wages, etc. It is said that this act is unconstitutional, for various reasons set forth in the petition, and, the act being unconstitutional, as the ordinance requires a compliance with the act, the ordinance is void for requiring something to be done which the city council had no right to require. It is unnecessary in this case to pass upon the constitutionality of the act. If it is constitutional, then the plaintiffs, so far as the character of the business regulated by the act is concerned, would be compelled to give the bond therein required, whether there was anything in the ordinance of the city of Augusta upon the subject or not. The ordinance of the city of Augusta embraces a larger class of money lenders than those whose business is regulated by the act. But the ordinance embraces all of those who are embraced within the act. A money lender engaged in such a business in the city of Augusta as would make him liable to the tax would, therefore, be subject to the regulations of the state law, and the ordinance simply requires that which, if the act is constitutional, the law requires. But suppose the act is unconstitutional, then, in order to obtain a license from the city of Augusta, they would not be required to give a bond, because they could not be required to give a bond under an unconstitutional law. The city council had a right to impose a tax upon the class of persons to which the plaintiffs belonged, and the tax as imposed is not subject to any of the objections made by them. They are therefore subject to the payment of this tax. They have not paid the tax required of them. When they have paid or tendered this tax, and a license is refused them on the ground that they have not given the bond required by the ordinance, they can then raise the question whether the act referred to in the ordinance is not unconstitutional. The question as to the constitutionality of the act of 1904 is therefore prematurely made. It may be that the city will not require the bond to be given. If it does, then the plaintiffs may, with propriety, invoke a decision of the court as to the validity of that law. If that part of the ordinance requiring the bond to be given is invalid, its invalidity would not void the whole ordinance, for the reasons given a preceding portion of this opinion, and, until they have complied with that part of the ordinance which is unquestionably valid, they will not be heard to question the constitutionality of the act of the General Assembly that is made a part of the ordinance by reference to the same.

SANDERS, SWAN & CO. v. ALLEN et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. SALES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The verdict of the jury was plainly based on an erroneous theory as to the measure of the plaintiff's damages, and the court below did right to grant a new trial.

2. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Under the act approved December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 53), the only circumstances under which the representative of a deceased person who is jointly sued with such representative will be disqualified from testifying as to transactions with his deceased codefendant are "when his evidence would tend to relieve or modify the liability of the party offered as a witness and tend to make the estate of said * * * deceased party primarily liable for the debt or default."

3. SAME—EVIDENCE OF AGENT.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 5269, subd. 5, in order to render incompetent the evidence of an agent or attorney at law of a sane or surviving party as to transactions with the insane or deceased adverse party at interest, the agency or confidential relationship must have existed at the time of the transaction testified about.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by Sanders, Swan & Co. against S. H. Allen, administrator, and others. Verdict for plaintiffs. From an order granting a new trial, they bring error. Affirmed.

Dean & Hobbs, for plaintiffs in error. H. H. Perry, Howard Thompson, G. H. Prior, and Parks & Gaillard, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. This case comes up on exceptions to the second grant of a new trial. The suit was for damages from the breach of two contracts for the sale and future delivery of cotton; and the jury found for the plaintiffs the full amount sued for. The plaintiffs, besides excepting to the grant for a new trial assign error upon their exceptions pendente lite to the rejection of certain evidence which will hereafter be mentioned.

1. We do not hesitate to rule that the grant of a new trial was proper. The amount of damages claimed by the plaintiffs was the difference between the contract price of the cotton and the price which they were compelled to pay for other cotton in order to fill contracts that they had made on the basis of their contracts with the defendants. It was not alleged or shown that the defendants had any notice that the cotton they contracted to sell the plaintiffs had been resold by them, and, in the absence of such a showing, no such basis of calculation could be used to compute their damages; the correct measure of damage being the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time the cotton should have been delivered. Wappoo Mills v. Guano Co., 91 Ga. 396, 18 S. E. 308; Huggins v. Southeastern Lime Co., 121 Ga. 311, 48 S. E. 933. It is true that the defendants did not attack the petition by an appropriate special demurrer on account of this defect, and that there was no evidence to show what the market price of cotton was at the time stipulated for the delivery of that covered by the contracts sued on; but, even so, the verdict for damages was plainly based on an erroneous theory of law, and had no legal foundation upon which to rest. It was therefore contrary to law, and was properly set aside by the trial judge.

2, 3. The second and third headnotes need no elaboration, further than to say that the evidence offered by the plaintiffs should have been admitted. It did not appear that the evidence of Cooper would affect in any way his liability under the contracts sued on. The act of 1897, referred to in the second headnote, was primarily designed to prevent the party offered as a witness from deriving any advantage by giving testimony which his deceased codefendant could not contradict. This case did not fall within the provisions of that act. The other witness offered had formerly been an agent of Sanders, Swan & Co.; but the agency had terminated at the time of the transactions testified about, and it appeared that he was not in any manner interested in the suit. His testimony should have been admitted.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

FIELD v. JORDAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE—LACHES.

Complainants having negligently allowed three years to pass without seeking to set aside the judgment complained of at law, under the facts of this case equity can grant them no relief.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. W. Jordan and others against T. S. Field. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. O. Lovett and W. W. Haden, for plaintiff in error. R. J. Jordan, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiffs below filed their equitable petition to the superior court, alleging that they were the defendants in an action brought against them by Field, the defendant in the case at bar, and that when the case came on for trial at the April term, 1900, of the justice's court in which it was pending, a demand was made for a bill of particulars, whereupon the magistrate continued the case for the term and marked upon his docket, "Bill of particulars demanded, and cont." But during the term at which the case was continued, to wit, on May 1, 1900, the justice rendered judgment against petitioners without their knowledge. When their attention was called to this judgment by a summons of garnishment which had been issued thereon, their counsel immediately brought to the attention of counsel for Field the fact that the judgment was irregular, and Field's counsel promptly agreed that it should be treated as a nullity, and it was so treated; the justice acquiescing therein and setting the case down again for trial. When the case thus came on for trial it was continued at the request of Field, who, "on cross-examination, showed that there was better evidence than his own as to the correctness of the account sued on." Since that trial the case has been continued from time to time, but never tried. In December, 1903, Field, having employed other counsel than those who made the agreement to treat the judgment as void, again proceeded to enforce the judgment rendered May 1, 1900, and it is to restrain him from so doing that this action was brought. The judge below granted the injunction prayed for, and Field excepted. The evidence introduced upon the hearing disclosed a state of facts substantially similar to those alleged in the petition. The defendant, however, did make an affidavit to the effect that he had never agreed to consider the judgment a nullity and had not ratified the agreement of his former counsel treating it as such. In addition to his answer, the defendant filed a demurrer upon the ground, among others, "that more than three years have elapsed since said judgment was rendered, and the filing of this proceeding to set the same aside, and the same is barred." As the judgment will be reversed upon this ground of the demurrer, it is unnecessary to set forth the other grounds.

Whatever may be the moral duty of Field in regard to this judgment, he cannot be restrained, either at law or in equity, from enforcing it. In the case of Field v. Peel, 122 Ga. 503, 50 S. E. 346, it was decided that the judgment was not void, but erroneous, and, as the plaintiffs have allowed the time to pass within which they could have attacked it at law, under the facts of this case equity is powerless to assist them. It appears that the judgment was rendered May 1, 1900, and so entered upon the justice's docket. This was constructive notice to the plaintiffs that the judgment had been rendered, and, if they were dissatisfied therewith, they should have applied for a writ of certiorari within the time allowed by law.

Moreover, it appears that they received actual notice of the judgment some time after the 80 days had elapsed; but then, instead of taking steps to have it vacated, they relied upon the naked promise of counsel for Field that it would be treated as a nullity. Instead of relying upon this naked promise to treat the judgment as a nullity, defendants in execution, within the statutory period allowed for instituting proceedings to set aside judgments, should have begun proceedings to set aside or vacate this judgment. And this period is fixed by statute at three years. Civ. Code 1895, § 3764. Their failure to take the proper steps within the time allowed can only be termed negligent. The various sections of the Code (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3987, 3988, 5370) which prescribe the method of setting judgments aside in equity for fraud, accident, or mistake, all contain the provision that the movant must show that there has been no fault or negligence on his part. These plaintiffs have not met this requirement. While the case from which it is taken is not exactly on all fours with the one at bar, we quote the following language from the opinion as applicable here: "Equity does not help the sleepy. Only the vigilant, the watchful, the searchers for an available and legal remedy * * * are [given] the passports to her favor. She does not relieve against the plain statute of limitations of three years as a bar to set aside a judgment at law, but rather follows the law and applies it herself. Often she not only does that, but sets up her own bar to any demand that is stale and shows laches." Morris v. Morris, 76 Ga. 738.

Nor is the fact that the justice agreed to treat the judgment as a nullity of any avail. When once his judgment is rendered, unless it be absolutely void, his hands are tied, and he can no more lawfully set it aside than he can vacate the judgments of this court. White v. Burnett, 113 Ga. 151, 38 S. E. 332 (2); Field v. Peel, 122 Ga. 506, 50 S. E. 346.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

HACKNEY v. J. R. ASBURY & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT—EFFECT—LIMITATIONS.

The mere dismissal in general terms of a suit will not, after the expiration of six months from such dismissal, operate as a bar to the bringing of a second suit by the same plaintiff against the same defendant and on the same cause of action, when the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitation applicable thereto at the time the second suit is brought. Section 3786 of the Civil Code of 1895 is not applicable to such a state of facts, as that section provides: "If a plaintiff shall be nonsuited, or shall discontinue or dismiss his case, and shall recommence within six months, such second case shall stand upon the same footing, as to limitation, with the original case."

2. SAME—DISMISSAL AS TO CERTAIN DEFENDANT—WANT OF SERVICE—NEW ACTION—NECESSITY OF PAYING COSTS.

Where two persons were sued, the case dismissed as to one for want of service upon him, judgment rendered against the other, and on the execution against him as an entry of nulla bona was made, the plaintiff was not required to pay the costs of the first action before bringing suit against the person not served therein, as for want of service the former suit was never commenced against him (McLendon v. Hernando Co., 28 S. E. 152, 100 Ga. 219), and therefore the suit against him could not be the recommencement of a former action against him, so as to bring it within the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 5043.

3. COURTS—COUNTY COURT—JURISDICTION.

Upon the trial of an appeal from a county court, the judge of the superior court did not err in refusing to charge, upon request, that if the defendant resided in a named militia district of the county, and the residence of the county judge who had tried the case was in another designated militia district, and the suit was for less than $50, there should be a finding that the county court did not have jurisdiction of the case.

4. EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

FERGUSON v. McCOWAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. SALE—BILL OF SALE—UNCERTAINTY.

Where the description in a deed to personalty is so general that the property sought to be thereby conveyed cannot be distinguished from the general mass of articles of a similar nature, the instrument is void for uncertainty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, §§ 54-57.]

2. APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The mere allegation that the court refused to permit the plaintiff "to show by [a named witness] that the property sued for was the property of" the plaintiff is not a good assignment of error.

3. TRIAL—NONSUIT—WHEN GRANTED.

The granting of the nonsuit was proper. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Horace A. Ferguson against R. F. McCowan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Horace A. Ferguson sued R. F. McCowan and Furman D. Lawton for the value of certain furniture, books, and surgical instruments alleged to be the property of the plaintiff and to have been unlawfully seized and sold by the defendants. "After showing the sale as alleged and the value of the property sued for, the plaintiff offered in evidence the following deed to show title in plaintiff": A warranty deed from E. G. Ferguson to the plaintiff, purporting to convey, besides other personalty, "office furniture and bedroom furniture, consisting of tables, chairs, bedsteads, bedding, etc., and books, surgical instruments, etc." On objection by defendants this instrument was excluded from evidence upon the ground that the property sought to be therein conveyed was not sufficiently described. Plaintiff then offered to prove by the maker of the deed that the property seized and sold by the defendant was the same as that described in this instrument. The court refused to permit the witness to so testify. The court also refused to allow the plaintiff "to show by [the maker of the instrument] that the property sued for was the property of" the plaintiff. "Plaintiff showed by said witness that there was no other writing purporting to convey said property, except the deed offered in evidence." There being no other evidence, the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted, assigning error upon the rulings of the court in rejecting evidence and in granting a nonsuit.

M. G. Bayne, for plaintiff in error. T. J. Cochran, T. R. Martin, J. L. Lawton, and Westmoreland Bros., for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts). 1. "A deed must itself contain descriptive words, with respect to its subject-matter, such as will enable a third person to apply the same to the locus in quo without resorting to any secret and undisclosed intention on the part of the parties thereto." Huntress v. Portwood, 116 Ga. 351, 355, 42 S. E. 513, 515. There were no such words, describing the property sought to be conveyed, in the instrument offered in evidence in the present case as would enable a third person, without resorting to the secret or undisclosed intention of the parties thereto, to apply the description to any particular office or bedroom furniture or to any specific books or surgical instruments. In other words, there was nothing in the writing by which the personalty sought to be conveyed could be distinguished from the general mass of similar articles. In this connection see Stewart v. Jaques, 77 Ga. 365, 368, 3 S. E. 283, 4 Am. St. Rep. 86; Hampton v. State, 124 Ga. 3, 52 S. E. 19, and cases cited. The instrument was void for want of sufficient description of the property sought to be conveyed. This being true, it follows that the court did not err in refusing to allow it to be introduced in evidence, nor in refusing to permit the maker thereof to testify that the property taken and sold by the defendants was the same as that described in such writing.

2. The mere allegation in the bill of exceptions that the court refused to allow the plaintiff "to show by [the maker of such instrument] that the property sued for was the property of" the plaintiff, is not a good assignment of error, as it is not stated how or by what character of evidence such fact was attempted to be shown by the witness.

3. There being no evidence to support the allegations in the petition, the granting of a nonsuit was proper.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

SANDERS v. CARTER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES—PLEA TO PETITION FOR RULE—DISMISSAL.

Where it is alleged in a petition for a rule against an officer that he has levied the plaintiff's fi. fa. upon property of the defendant sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's lien, and that he has had ample time in which to "make said money and has not done so," a plea by the officer denying each and every paragraph of the petition will not be dismissed on the ground that "it is not an answer to the rule, but simply a general denial of the plaintiff's petition."

2. SAME—VALIDITY OF LEVY.

Either an actual or constructive seizure of chattels by an officer will constitute a valid levy upon personalty. But where an officer goes to the residence of a defendant in execution for the purpose of making a levy, and, the defendant being absent, merely requests a member of the latter's family to inform the defendant that he has made a levy upon certain personalty, which he found and left therein, and does nothing else, not even making an entry of the levy upon the writ, there has been no seizure whatever, and hence no valid levy.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Upon the hearing of a rule against a constable for a failure to sell property upon which it was alleged in the plaintiff's petition that he had made a levy, and the evidence shows that there has been no valid levy, it is not erroneous for the judge to refuse to admit in evidence testimony tending to identify the specific property upon which the attempted seizure was made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Elberton; P. P. Proffitt, Judge.

Proceedings by J. W. Sanders against R. P. Carter. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Z. B. Rogers, for plaintiff in error. J. N. Worley, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Sanders brought a rule against Carter, as constable, for failure to make the money on a levy. The constable in his answer set up a general denial of the facts alleged in the petition, and upon the trial Sanders moved to dismiss the plea "because it was not an answer to the rule, but simply a general denial of the plaintiff's petition." The court overruled the objection, and the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff traversed the answer, and the case proceeded to trial. Upon the hearing the uncontradicted evidence showed that the constable, in company with the plaintiff and another, went to the house of the defendant in fi. fa. at night, for the purpose of levying upon a quantity of cotton. The defendant was not at home. The plaintiff testified: "Mr. Carter levied on the cotton and told some of [the defendant in fi. fa.'] family who was there that he had levied on the cotton, and for them to tell Arthur [defendant in execution] when he came. The cotton was not locked up. After the levy Mr. Carter told me that the papers were not in proper shape. He gave them back to me, and I took them to Mr. Bond [justice of the peace], and it was for them and for him and in his presence I wrote out the last two lines of the description in the fi. fa. He made no entry of the levy on the fi. fa." The officer left the cotton where he found it. The plaintiff then attempted to prove, by parol evidence, that the cotton alleged to have been levied on was the property described in the mortgage upon which the fi. fa. was issued. The court would not allow the testimony, entered upon judgment discharging the officer from the rule, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. The court properly allowed the constable's answer to stand. The plaintiff alleged that there had been a levy, that the property levied upon was sufficient to satisfy his lien, and that the officer had had ample time in which to "make said money and had not done so." In denying each and every allegation of the petition, the officer necessarily denied that there had been a levy; and, if there was no levy, it follows as a logical sequence that there were no funds in his hands out of which to satisfy the plaintiff's lien. The answer could not be construed as evasive or ambiguous, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in not dismissing it.

2. It would seem, from the evidence, that the execution did not contain a sufficient description of the property, and that the constable recognized this deficiency in the fi. fa. and returned it to the plaintiff in order that it might be cured. But whether this irregularity would render the levy a nullity or not, it is not necessary to decide; for, under the plaintiff's own testimony, there had been no lawful levy. To constitute a levy, there must be a seizure by the officer, either actual or constructive. There was, of course, no actual seizure here; nor was there a constructive seizure. "Actual or constructive seizure, as distinguished from the oral declaration of an officer of an intent to seize, or that he had seized property under a writ then in his hands for execution, is essential to the completion of a levy; and hence the mere appearance of an officer in possession of an execution at a store of the defendant, accompanied by the announcement that he had come to levy upon a stock of goods therein, does not constitute such a seizure as would amount to a levy of the writ then in his hands." Jones v. Howard, 99 Ga. 451, 27 S. E. 765, 59 Am. St. Rep.

231. And in that case the court said: "A constructive seizure is accomplished by the actual reduction by the officer of the property intended to be seized to his control. He must have brought such property so far under his subjection that he could exercise control over it. * * * He must do some act for which he could be successfully prosecuted as a trespasser, if it were not for the protection afforded him by the writ." Had the constable in the case at bar found the defendant in execution at home at the time of the alleged levy, and had the defendant agreed to hold the cotton levied upon for the officer, the rule would be different. But where the officer merely went to the house of the defendant in fi. fa. and informed a member of the household that he had levied upon a heap of cotton which he had seen in one of the rooms of the house, and left without seeing the defendant, and did not even make an entry of such "levy" upon the writ, there certainly has not been such a seizure as the law requires.

8. From the foregoing it follows that the court below did not err in refusing to admit the testimony offered by the plaintiff to prove that the property at the house of the defendant upon which the alleged levy was made was the property described in the mortgage upon which the fi. fa. was issued. If the acts of the constable did not amount to a levy, it is immaterial upon what specific property the attempted seizure was made. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

WEST v. BRAKELOW S. S. CO., Limited.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

SHIPPING—INJURIES—EVIDENCE—NONSUIT.

As the evidence for the plaintiff was not sufficient to authorize a verdict in his favor, the court committed no error in granting a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah;
T. M. Norwood, Judge.

Action by Henry West against the Brake-low Steamship Company, Limited. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error, and defendant assigns cross-error. Judgment on main bill affirmed; on cross-bill dismissed.

Garrard & Meldrim, for plaintiff in error.
Robt. L. Colding, for defendant in error.

FISH, O. J. Henry West sued the Brake-low Steamship Company, Limited, for damages for personal injuries. The substance of the petition was: The defendant company, a foreign corporation, was on November 25, 1902, the owner of the steamship Ramleh, which was, on that date, being loaded with rosin and lumber in the port of Savannah. For the purpose of stowing lumber in the ship, the defendant company erected thereon a derrick, to which was suspended a "fall," or rope, which was old, worn, unsafe, and dangerous. While the lumber attached to such rope and supported thereby, for the purpose of being loaded in the vessel, was being carried onto the ship, the rope, by reason of its worn condition, broke and caused a piece of lumber to fall upon the plaintiff, who was engaged at the time as a laborer in loading the vessel, causing his injuries as set out in the petition. The plaintiff did not know of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the rope, and could not have known of it by the exercise of ordinary care. He relied upon the defendant company to furnish reasonably safe instrumentalities for the loading of the ship. It was the duty of the defendant to furnish a safe and sound rope, and it knew, or could have known by inspection, of the unsafe condition of the rope which broke. The answer denied the material allegations of the petition. On the trial, at the conclusion of the evidence submitted by the plaintiff, the court, on motion of defendant's counsel, granted a nonsuit, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted.

The evidence for the plaintiff tended to establish all the allegations of his petition, except as to the erection of the derrick upon the ship by the defendant, the furnishing by it of the rope, the breaking of which caused the plaintiff's injury, and that it was the duty of the defendant to furnish the rope which was being used in loading the vessel. There was no allegation that the plaintiff was employed to do the work in which he was engaged by the defendant, nor any allegation that the vessel was being loaded by the defendant itself, and the evidence did not show that such were the facts. The plaintiff testified that at the time he was injured he was employed by Churchill, a stevedore. Bryant, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, who was one of the laborers engaged in loading the ship, testified that the rope which broke "came out of the forecabin," and that he noticed the condition of the rope and called the attention of the boatswain of the vessel thereto, who looked at it, and "said he guessed it would do all right." This witness also testified that the boatswain "is over the sailors," and that "the captain is first, and the first mate next, and the second mate next, and the boatswain next, when they have not got a third mate." Another witness for the plaintiff testified: "I know when you call for new rope it comes, to my remembrance. Generally call for it from the mate, I suppose. I hardly ever see the captain around on the deck. Q. They generally call on the mate and they get it? A. I suppose so."

In our opinion there was no error in sustaining the motion for a nonsuit. From the evidence it appears that the plaintiff was not a servant of the defendant company, but was employed by the stevedore, who was engaged in loading the ship, and who, apparently, was an independent contractor for this purpose. If the stevedore had taken a contract to load the vessel with the lumber and furnished the labor and necessary appliances for so doing, then it is clear that the owner of the vessel would not be liable to the plaintiff for the consequences of the negligence of such independent contractor. Young v. Smith & Kelly Co. (decided at the present term) 52 S. E. 765 and authorities cited. Whether this stevedore or the defendant company furnished the rope used for the purpose of loading the ship with the lumber does not appear. The mere fact that the rope in question came out of the forecabin of the ship did not show that the owner of the vessel undertook to furnish it as an appliance to be used in loading the ship. Even if it belonged to the defendant, it might have been merely borrowed by the stevedore for this purpose. Nor did the mere supposition of a witness that, when a new rope was needed, the mate was called on for it, amount to evidence that this rope was furnished by the defendant company for the purpose indicated. The same may be said with reference to the testimony that the attention of the boatswain, who commands the sailors, was called, by one of the laborers engaged in loading the vessel, to the condition of this rope, and that he looked at it and said he guessed it would do. In order for the defendant company to be made liable for the plaintiff's injuries, it was necessary for it to appear that it had control and supervision of the work of loading the vessel, or that it furnished the instrumentalities for loading the same, including the rope in question, and was negligent in the respect and manner alleged in the petition. The plaintiff failed to make out such a case, and the nonsuit was properly granted.

HIX v. GULLEY.

1. TRIAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

When the court provisionally admits evidence on the statement of counsel that he will subsequently supply a defect in the preliminary proof necessary to its admission, it is not for the judge of his own motion to determine whether such defect has been supplied and rule out the evidence, without a request to that effect from the other party.

2. EVIDENCE—LOCATION OF BOUNDARIES—GENERAL RECOGNITION.

In the trial of a case involving the location of a dividing line between coterminous landowners, evidence of a witness examined by interrogatories that a given corner "was recognized by all the adjoining landowners as the true corner" was properly excluded, when it did not appear from the answer of the witness who were the landowners referred to, whether they were owners of the land at the time they recognized the true corner, or at what date this recognition was made by them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, § 155; vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 1121-1134.]

3. APPEAL—REVIEW.

The evidence, though conflicting, was sufficient to authorize the verdict. There was no complaint of the charge of the judge; and, if any error was committed in the admission or rejection of evidence, it was not of such a character as to require the granting of a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hart County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by E. F. Gulley against J. E. Hix. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. N. Worley and A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiff in error. James H. Skelton, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was an action of ejectment, which involved the question as to the location of the dividing line between two coterminous landowners. The evidence was voluminous, but an examination of the brief of evidence discloses that it was of such a character that a verdict in favor of either party would have been authorized. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and a motion for a new trial, made by the defendant, was overruled, to which ruling he excepted. Therefore it is only necessary to determine whether there was any error of law committed which would require the granting of a new trial.

1. In one ground error is assigned upon the admission of a deed. In the ground the names of the parties, the date, and the names of the attesting witnesses are stated. It does not appear therefrom what land was conveyed by the deed. Objection was made to instrument, on the ground that its execution had not been proved, and it had not been recorded. The court admitted the deed upon the statement of counsel for plaintiff that evidence would be introduced to show that plaintiff's predecessor in title received the deed some 30 years before the suit was brought, and the same had been in the possession of persons claiming the land since that time. It appears that this evidence was not thereafter introduced. The attention of the judge should have been called to this fact before the case was closed, and a motion made to rule out the deed. This not having been done, complaint cannot be made in a motion for a new trial as to the admission of the deed. See Stone v. State, 118 Ga. 705, 45 S. E. 630, 98 Am. St. Rep. 145 (9); Cawthon v. State, 119 Ga. 396, 46 S. E. 897 (7). In addition to this the ground was insufficient, in that it did not describe the deed so that it could be determined from the motion alone whether the admission of the deed was erroneous.

2. One of the witnesses was examined by interrogatories. One of the interrogatories was as follows: "State whether or not the corner of the east end of said line was a hickory corner, and state whether or not said hickory was recognized by all the adjoining landowners as the correct corner." And the answer to this interrogatory was as follows: "The corner of the east end of said line was a hickory corner, and was recognized by all the landowners as being the true corner." This interrogatory was objected to as leading, and the court sustained the objection and ruled out the question and answer. We do not think the question was a leading question. See Franks v. Gress Lumber Co., 111 Ga. 87, 36 S. E. 314. Neither do we think there was any error in rejecting the evidence. It did not appear therefrom who were the landowners referred to, nor whether they were landowners at the time of the recognition of the corner, nor that the persons referred to as recognizing the corner were landowners at the time the recognition was made.

3. The motion for a new trial contained a number of other grounds relating to the rejection of evidence, but the questions raised are not of such a character as that it will be profitable to enter into an extended discussion in reference to them. Most of the grounds are wholly without merit, and if the court committed any error at all, either in the admission or rejection of evidence, the error was not of such a character as to require the granting of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

HALL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1906.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—COMPETENCY OF JURORS.

In passing upon a ground of a motion for a new trial based upon alleged expressions of opinions of jurors before the trial as to the guilt of the accused, the trial judge occupies the place of a trier, and his finding that the jurors were competent will not be reversed, unless under all the facts the discretion of the judge was manifestly abused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 3070.]

2. HOMICIDE—DYING DECLARATIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

While the testimony of a witness, whose evidence goes to the jury through the medium of dying declarations, is to be considered under the same rules that govern them in determining the credibility of other witnesses who testify from the stand, the failure of the judge to charge upon the subject of such rules will not be a sufficient reason for granting a new trial, in the absence of an appropriate and timely written request asking instructions upon the subject.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the judgment refusing the new trial will not be disturbed.

L. M. Hall was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. C. Wright, W. L. Stallings, B. F. McLaughlin, and J. W. Shell, for plaintiff in error. W. G. Post, H. A. Hall, J. R. Terrell, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COBB, P. J. Hall was convicted of the offense of murder, and sentenced to the penitentiary for life. He assigns error upon the refusal of the judge to grant him a new trial.

1. It is alleged in the motion that two of the jurors who were selected for the trial of the case were not impartial. Numerous affidavits appear in the record as to statements claimed to have been made by these jurors prior to the trial, indicating that their minds were not in such condition as that they could accord to the accused a fair trial. There also appear the affidavits of these two jurors in which they either deny or explain the statements accredited to them; each swearing that, at the time they were sworn upon their voir dire and selected, their minds were perfectly impartial, and they went into the trial of the case free from bias or prejudice either on the one side or the other, and that the verdict to which they agreed was the result of a conscientious consideration of the evidence produced. Under such circumstances, the judge was the trier who was to pass upon the question of the competency of the jurors, and his judgment will not be reversed, unless it is apparent from the record that he has abused the discretion which the law vests in him. Perry v. State, 117 Ga. 719, 45 S. E. 77, and citations. See, also, King v. State, 119 Ga. 427, 46 S. E. 633. No such abuse of discretion has been shown as to authorize this court to interfere.

2. Complaint is made that the court erred in failing to charge the jury that, in considering the weight and credit to be given to the alleged dying declarations of the deceased, the character of the deceased for wickedness and his disregard of the laws of God should be taken into consideration by the jury. The credibility of witnesses whose testimony goes to the jury through the medium of dying declarations is subject to the same attack, and should be determined under the same rules governing the testimony of living witnesses who testify upon the stand. Such a witness may be impeached by proof of contradictory statements, by proof of general bad character, or in any other way by which the law authorizes the impeachment of a witness. In Nesbit v. State, 43 Ga. 238, Mr. Chief Justice Lochrane said: "The peculiar character of the deceased for wickedness and disregard of the law of God in his outpourings of blasphemy would have invoked the consideration of the jury; for, if a man, even without hope of life in this world, nevertheless without belief in God or in the divine revelation, while his declarations would be admissible, their weight and consideration should be weighed by the jury." See, also, 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L.

(2d Ed.) 384. While all of this is true, in order to render the failure of the judge to charge upon the subject available for an assignment of error, it must appear that there was a timely and appropriate written request, and, as none appears in the present case, the failure of the judge to charge upon the subject, even if the evidence was of such a character as to authorize it, is not a sufficient reason for reversing the judgment.

3. The evidence in behalf of the state made out an atrocious case of murder. The claim of self-defense set up by the accused in his statement bears the evident impress of afterthought. The credibility of the witness whose dying declarations were introduced was a question for the jury, and, as they have resolved the case by believing this testimony, and as the trial judge has declined to interfere with their finding, under the established rules of this court, his discretion will not be interfered with.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

FRIEDMAN v. GOODMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS.

The general grounds of the motion for a new trial were without merit.

2. SAME—FAILURE TO INSTRUCT.

Failure of the trial judge to give a particular instruction to the jury, which the losing party in his motion for a new trial contends should have been given, is not cause for a new trial, even if such instruction would have been abstractly correct, if neither the pleadings nor the evidence in the case required it to be submitted to the jury.

3. DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES.

The verdict in favor of the plaintiff was not excessive in amount.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Geo. T. Cann, Judge.

Action by Bertha Goodman against Sam Friedman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Bertha Goodman brought an action for damages against Sam Friedman, alleging that while she "was proceeding quietly along Margaret street," in the city of Savannah, "on her way home," she was living on one side of this street and the defendant upon the other, and "as she got to a point on said street opposite his house, a vicious dog," of which the defendant was the owner or keeper, "sprang upon her and bit her severely, throwing her to the ground and fastening his teeth in her right breast, inflicting dangerous, severe, and painful wounds," and that she was also severely bitten in other places upon her body. She further alleged that the defendant knew of the viciousness of the animal, but failed and refused "to keep his dog shut up." The defendant in his answer, admitted that he kept the dog in question, and that it had bitten the plaintiff, and denied that he knew that it was vicious, and alleged that it was not, and that his own little children and those of his neighbors were accustomed to play with it, without being harmed or injured by the animal in any way. He further alleged that "the members of plaintiff's family would irritate and tease the dog and throw rocks and other missiles at him; that upon one occasion a member of the family, with their dogs, was passing the house, and, the dogs becoming engaged in a fight, she took a stone or brick and struck this dog, injuring him so seriously that he was unable to walk for some time; that this treatment caused the dog to have an intense aversion to the members of the family, and that one day one of the girls was passing and he caught her cape and tore it; that the dog was not vicious, however, because when this happened one of the other children present caught the dog around the neck and held him so that he could not do her any harm." He further alleged that when he "heard of this occurrence he took the dog out in the country, so that it could not be possible for these people to come in contact with him, but on the day that the plaintiff was bitten one of the hands had loosed the dog for the purpose of helping him to catch a sheep, * * * and the dog, as was perfectly natural, ran away and came back home"; and "when near defendant's home he met the plaintiff, and, evidently seeking to avenge a wrong which he considered had been done him, he bit her." On the trial of the case the plaintiff showed that the attack of the dog upon her was wholly unprovoked, and the character and extent of her injuries. There was evidence, pro and con, as to the dog's previous viciousness. The evidence for the plaintiff showed that the animal, prior to its attack upon her, had bitten other people, among them her niece, Miss Rachel Friedman, who testified that, without provocation on her part, the dog had bitten her, torn her cape, and torn the clothes off her, and that she carried these clothes to the defendant, showed them to him, and told him about the occurrence, and to keep the dog in the house. The defendant testified that Miss Rachel Friedman had come to him and told him that the dog jumped on her somewhere on the street, and, if it had not been for Millie Davis, he would have bitten her, that the dog tore her cape up, and that she showed him a cape and waist. He also testified that he took the dog "out to the country, and he was tied, and one of the colored men out there unloosed him to catch sheep, and the dog came back to the city on the day this thing happened to Mrs. Goodman." The jury found a verdict for $400 in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

W. B. Stubbs and Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. Twiggs & Oliver, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1, 2. There was no merit in the general grounds of the motion for a new trial. By an amendment to the motion error was alleged as follows: "(1) Because the court, though not requested, failed to submit to the jury the question as to whether the defendant was negligent, and failed to charge the jury that, though the defendant might have known that the animal was vicious, still, if it escaped and was at large without fault upon his part, the defendant would not be liable. (2) Because the court charged the jury as follows: 'If she [the plaintiff] does show that the dog was vicious, and the defendant knew it was vicious and that the injury was without fault upon her part, she would be entitled to recover.'" The assignment of error upon this charge was that "it authorized plaintiff to recover, although the defendant used ordinary care and diligence to keep the dog from getting at large." Whether, in this state, the gist of an action against the owner or keeper of a vicious domestic animal for injuries inflicted by such animal is the mere keeping of the animal with knowledge of its vicious propensities, as is held in some jurisdictions, or is the negligent keeping of the animal after such knowledge, as is elsewhere held, we need not determine in this case. For, in the view which we take of the case, it is immaterial whether the defendant would or would not be liable, if he exercised due and proper care in the keeping and management of the dog, after notice of its vicious propensity. Civ. Code 1895, § 3821, declares: "A person who owns or keeps a vicious animal of any kind, and by careless management of the same, or by allowing the same to go at liberty, another without fault on his part is injured thereby, such owner or keeper shall be liable in damages for such injury." It has been held that under this section it is still necessary, as at common law, to show, not only that the animal was vicious or dangerous, but also that the owner or keeper knew of this fact. Harvey v. Buchanan, 121 Ga. 384, 49 S. E. 281, and citations. It would seem, from the language of the section, that liability for injuries inflicted by such an animal would result from negligence in the manner of keeping or confining the animal, or the care exercised in confining it, after notice of its dangerous or vicious propensity, and not from the mere keeping of the animal after such notice; but, as above intimated, it is unnecessary to determine this question. It is clear that if the defendant, after knowledge of the viciousness of the dog, allowed it to go at liberty, he became responsible to any one whom the dog, while at liberty, might attack and injure. Therefore, if the question whether the defendant allowed the dog to go at liberty on the occasion when the plaintiff was injured by the animal was really not involved in the case as made by the pleading and the evidence, it matters not that the judge failed to instruct the jury that the defendant would not be liable if he "used ordinary care and diligence to keep the dog from getting at large," even if this be sound law. Both the answer and the testimony of the defendant amounted to an admission that after being informed of the attack which the dog, while at large upon the streets of Savannah, had made upon a member of the plaintiff's family, he had not exercised such care and diligence to prevent the animal from going at liberty; but, on the contrary, had allowed it to go at liberty. He knew that the dog had "an intense aversion to the members of the [plaintiff's] family," and had already made a violent attack upon one of them, and yet, according to both his answer and his testimony, he merely took the dog from its home in the city out into the country and left it, and the place where he left it was sufficiently near to the city for the dog to reappear at its old haunts on the very day that it was turned loose in the country. There is not the slightest intimation in his answer or his testimony that he gave any instructions whatever as to the care to be exercised in reference to the animal to those in whose keeping he left it. He admitted in his answer that on the day that the plaintiff was injured the dog was turned loose by one of the hands on the place where he had left it for the purpose of catching a sheep, and that it "was perfectly natural," when this was done, for the animal to run away and come back to its home in the city. If the "perfectly natural" consequence of turning the dog loose in the country to chase a sheep was that it ran away and came back to its home in the city, then it necessarily follows that to thus allow the animal its freedom was to allow it to go at liberty, not only in the country, but upon the street in the city of Savannah where it met and bit the plaintiff. And as the defendant was responsible for the want of care or diligence of those in whose keeping he had left the dog, when one of them allowed it to go at liberty, the defendant, in the eye of the law, allowed it to do so. The dog was at liberty, upon a public street in the city, when it attacked and injured the plaintiff. The defendant admitted this, and that he was the keeper of the animal. It was shown that before this knowledge of the dog's dangerous and vicious propensity was brought home to the defendant. It would seem that these facts made out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant. But, admitting that they did not, the defendant undertook to show the kind and degree of care which he exercised to restrain the animal of its liberty, after notice of the attack which it made on a member of the plaintiff's family, and, in so doing, he not only wholly failed to show any facts from which the jury would be authorized to find that he was not negligent, but, in effect, admitted that, when the plaintiff was bitten, the dog was at large upon the streets of Savannah, because he had, through those for whose negligence he was responsible, allowed it to go at liberty. For these reasons, if for no others, there was no merit in the exceptions to the charge of the court.

3. Another ground of the motion for a new trial was that the verdict was excessive in amount. The physician who attended and treated the plaintiff after she was bitten by the dog testified that he found her very much excited, and "that she had a very deep wound in her right breast, and on the abdomen, going down, there were long scratches. These didn't seem to be teeth marks so much. It seemed as if something else had pulled down on there. That extending, probably, from her breast down here [indicating], the marks would skip a little and then appear lower down again. The wound in her breast was possibly one-fourth or one-half inch deep. * * * I treated her off and on, probably for six or seven days. Sometimes in the early part I called twice a day, then once a day, and then once every two days. Probably I paid her seven or eight visits, or something like that. I think it healed up in about 10 days." The plaintiff herself testified that the dog jumped on her, bit her, and threw her down and held her; that a man came over and knocked the dog off; that her "bosom was full of blood"; that she was bitten in three places, once on the breast and twice on the stomach; and that she did nothing to provoke the animal. We think a verdict in her favor for $400 was, as to amount, fully authorized by this evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

STONER v. PATTEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1906.)
WATERS AND WATER COURSES — DIVERSION — INJUNCTION.

When, on the interlocutory hearing of an equitable petition to enjoin an alleged unlawful diversion of a stream of water which furnishes to the plaintiff his only unfailing water supply, the judge, upon conflicting evidence, reaches the conclusion that the plaintiff has established his right to an injunction, the same should be granted without qualification, when the evidence shows that the damages which he may suffer will be incapable of ready computation and ascertainment; for, in such a case, a bond given by the defendant to answer for any recovery of damages which may be had against him cannot afford adequate protection to the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by W. B. Stoner against Z. C. Patten and Reuben Lusk. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error, and Patten assigns cross-error. Reversed on main bill of exceptions; on cross-bill, affirmed.

W. B. Stoner filed his petition against Z. C. Patten and Reuben Lusk to enjoin the diversion of a certain stream of water. It appeared from the allegations of the petition that Stoner is the owner of a portion of lot No. 70 in the ninth district and fourth section of Walker county, Ga., and Mrs. Carrie Powell owns lot No. 71, on which is located a spring, the waters from which flow down upon and through the property of petitioner, furnishing him and his tenants with a never-failing water supply, which is used for domestic purposes. The defendant Patten, claiming the right under Mrs. Powell, has constructed a pipe line from this spring to his dwelling house for the purpose of conveying the waters of the spring to his premises. He has constructed a catch-basin upon her land, with a view to conveying the waters therefrom by means of pipes to his dwelling, and intends to make an unlawful diversion of the waters from the natural course or stream, whereby they are transmitted to the land of petitioner, to his irreparable injury and damage. Patten is a nonresident, and his codefendant, Lusk, is, as petitioner is informed and believes, insolvent. The defendant Patten filed an answer in which he admitted that he had, under a contract with Mrs. Powell, the owner of lot No. 71, entered upon her premises, and had by blasting discovered a stream of water above the Powell spring; but he averred that the waters of this stream, if indeed they entered the spring from which petitioner claims he obtains his source of supply, did so by percolation and seepage merely, and not through any well-defined subterranean passage or channel. He further averred that the waters flowing from the Powell spring had no such passage or channel through which they were conveyed to the premises of petitioner; and that, if any of the waters of that spring passed to his land, they did so only in cases of overflow, and by percolation, and not by means of any surface or subterranean stream. Patten admitted that he was constructing a pipe line for the purpose of supplying his residence, then in course of construction, and that the waters thereby conveyed would not be turned back upon petitioner's land. He also averred his solvency and ownership of the property in Walker county, and that his codefendant was only his employé and had no interest whatever in the controversy. On the interlocutory hearing, the evidence was conflicting as to whether there was any subterranean connection between the stream from which Patten proposed to get his water supply and the stream from which the plaintiff claimed to have derived his supply; and, if so, whether there was a well-defined channel through which the waters emerging upon the Powell land were transmitted to the premises of petitioner. The nonresidence of Patten was not controverted, nor was his ownership of property in Walker county denied. The court passed an order dissolving the temporary restraining order previously granted, on condition that Patten would give bond in the sum of $1,000 obligating himself to pay to the plaintiff such recovery as he might obtain in any suit thereafter instituted to recover damages by reason of the diversion of water alleged in his petition, occurring within one year from that date, September 27, 1905. Stoner sued out a bill of exceptions alleging error in the refusal of the court to grant the injunction as prayed, instead of permitting a bond to be given in avoidance of the restraining order; and Patten sued out a cross-bill of exceptions, complaining that the court erred in requiring him to file a bond and in not revoking unconditionally the restraining order theretofore passed.

Payne & Payne, for plaintiff in error. Williams & Lancaster, R. M. W. Glenn, and Z. D. Harrison, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). Generally, an underground stream of water may be diverted without liability to a proprietor whose land it might reach in its natural and ordinary course; yet, where it has once emerged and afterwards sinks, if its exact course can be traced to where it emerges again, so as to render it certain that it is the same water, the proprietor of the surface at the latter point will be protected in its use, the same as if it were not a subterranean stream. Saddler v. Lee, 66 Ga. 45, 42 Am. Rep. 62, construing the provisions of section 3019 of the Code of 1873, now embraced in Civ. Code, § 3880. There was a sharp conflict as to whether the stream of water which Patten seeks to divert is the same as that from which water emerges upon the surface of the plaintiff's land. There was also some conflict as to whether the water flowing over the surface of the plaintiff's land was in point of fact used for domestic purposes, as claimed by him. Unless it was the same stream of water, Patten had the undoubted right to the use of the water emerging at the point on Mrs. Powell's land where he proposed to connect his pipe line, and could, with her consent, divert it from its natural course, so far as the plaintiff was concerned. On the other hand, if one and the same stream flowed beneath the surface of both the Powell tract and that owned by the plaintiff, and its course was well defined and could be traced with certainty, then Patten would have no more right to divert it from the plaintiff's land than he would if the stream flowed continuously upon the surface. In the latter instance, if the water was the only unfailing supply which could be used by the plaintiff or his tenants for domestic purposes, the damage caused by its unlawful diversion would be irreparable, because incapable of ascertainment and exact computation, and the restraining order should not have been dissolved upon the giving of a bond. Woodall v. Cartersville Min. & Mfg. Co., 104 Ga. 156, 30 S. E. 665. Before the judge would have been authorized to grant even a conditional injunction, he would necessarily have had to reach the conclusion from the evidence that it was the same stream, though running partly underground, which furnished a common supply of water to both the plaintiff and the defendant, and that the damages resulting from a diversion of the water would prove irreparable. The mere fact that Patten was a nonresident would not entitle the plaintiff to equitable interference. Morgan v. Baxter, 113 Ga. 144, 38 S. E. 411. It appeared both from the pleadings and the evidence that Patten had sufficient property located in Walker county to meet any recovery of damages which might be obtained against him; and we are bound to assume that the judge would not have undertaken to afford the plaintiff relief upon the ground of the nonresidence of Patten, unless it was further made to appear that he had in this state no property which could be subjected to the satisfaction of a judgment against him. Since the evidence warranted a finding in favor of the plaintiff upon the issue which was really the only point the judge was called on to determine, we are not prepared to hold that he erred in not revoking unconditionally the restraining order; but, as the giving of a bond will afford the plaintiff no substantial protection, in the event he sustains damages which are incapable of computation, we are of the opinion that the judge should, if he thought the granting of an injunction was proper, have granted it unconditionally.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill, affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

WILLCOX et al. v. KEHOE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT — REPAIRS — COVENANTS IN LEASE.

A covenant in a lease, whereby the lessor expressly stipulates that he will not be bound to make repairs, alterations, additions, or improvements upon the leased premises, but agrees that the lessee, at his option, may make such repairs, etc., as shall be necessary, and that he will reimburse him therefor to an amount named, is a personal obligation on the part of the original lessor, and does not run with the reversion, so as to bind an assignee thereof.

2. SAME — PURCHASE FROM LANDLORD — LIABILITY ON LEASE.

One who buys land subject to a lease containing a covenant of the character indicated in the preceding note is not bound for the breach of the purely personal covenant of his predecessor, made prior to the sale of the land to him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; T. M. Norwood, Judge.

Action by William Kehoe against C. H. Willcox and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

R. R. Richards and Peeples & Jordan, for plaintiffs in error. O'Connor, O'Byrne & Hartridge, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The Domestic Coal & Wood Company, a firm composed of Willcox and Salas, leased from Harriet C. Jones and others a wharf lot in the city of Savannah for the term of three years and four months; the date of the lease being May 29, 1901. The plaintiffs in error are a partnership doing business under the name of the Standard Fuel Supply Company, and are successors in business to the Domestic Coal & Wood Company. One of the conditions of the lease referred to was as follows: "It is covenanted and agreed by and between the parties of these presents, that the said [lessees] shall take and occupy the said property as it stands at the beginning of this lease, and that the said [lessors] shall not be called upon or be responsible for any additions, alterations, improvements, or repairs upon the said leased property, or any part thereof, or for any dredging or increased depth of the water along said wharf front, and that all such additions, improvements, repairs, or dredging shall be made by the [lessees] at their option and at their own expense. But said [lessors] hereby covenant and agree to reimburse and to pay to the said [lessees] for any necessary repairs, improvements, or dredging made or done by them a sum not to exceed in the aggregate during the term of said lease twelve hundred dollars ($1,200), to be paid to said [lessees] at the time or times when said repairs or dredging is completed and payment for the same becomes due." The instrument contained various other covenants which are not material to this discussion. Only one of the covenants of the lease is expressly made applicable to the successors or assigns of either party, viz., a stipulation that, in the event of default in the payment of rent, the lessors, "their successors or assigns," shall have the right to re-enter and terminate the lease. During the years 1901 and 1902 the original lessees and their successors, the plaintiffs in error, expended for necessary repairs on the leased premises a sum in excess of the $1,200 provided by the clause of the contract which has been quoted. Of this amount $802.30 was reimbursed to the original lessees, presumably at the time the repairs were made. The remainder, $397.70, has never been reimbursed, though demand for same has been made. In April, 1905, Kehoe, the defendant in error, purchased the wharf lot, and after the expiration of the lease brought suit against the lessees for an amount alleged to be due for three months' rent of the premises. The defendants filed a plea, in which they sought to recoup against the plaintiff's claim for rent the difference of $397.70 between the amount that has been paid to them and their predecessors by way of reimbursement for repairs made and the amount of $1,200 provided for by the covenant to reimburse, which has already been set out. On motion of counsel for the plaintiff the plea of recoupment was stricken as insufficient in law, and the defendants excepted. It will be seen that two controlling questions are presented for decision, viz.: Was the covenant to reimburse one which ran with the land, or a merely personal obligation on the part of the original lessors; and, if it was not a covenant running with the land, was Kehoe, who bought subject to the lease, bound by its terms to the extent that he will be held liable for the previous breach of the covenant by his predecessor in title?

1. At common law a distinction was drawn between the land—i. e., the right to the possession of leased premises and the reversion, or the right to the estate after the expiration of the lease; and it seems that "covenants ran with the land, but not with the reversion. Therefore the assignee of the lessee was held to be liable in covenant and to be entitled to bring covenant, but the assignee of the lessor was not." See note to Spencer's Case, 5 Rep. 16, 1 Smith's L. C. (9th Am. Ed.) 180, citing Thursby v. Plant, 1 Wms. Saund. 300, n. 10, and Butler v. Archer, 12 Irish C. L. 104. To remedy this inequality the statute of 32 Henry VIII, c. 84, was passed, whereby it was enacted, in effect, that assignees of lessors should "have like advantage against the lessees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, by entry, for nonpayment of the rent, or for doing waste or other forfeitures, and by action only, for not performing other conditions, covenants, or agreements, expressed in the indentures of leases, * * * as the said lessors and grantors, their heirs or successors, might have had," and that "all lessees and grantees of lands, * * * their executors, administrators, or assigns, shall have like action and remedy against all persons and bodies politic, their heirs, successors, and assigns, having any gift or grant of the king, or of any other person of the reversion of the said land and hereditaments so letten, or any parcel thereof, for any condition or covenant expressed in the indentures of their leases, as the same lessees might have had against the said lessors and grantors, their heirs or successors." From the sweeping language of this statute it would seem that Parliament intended that all covenants in leases should run both with the land and the reversion, or in other words, that assignees of both lessor and lessee should be entitled to all the benefits and subject to all the burdens of covenants contained in the lease. But in Spencer's Case, 5 Rep. 16, 1 Smith, L. C. (9th Am. Ed.) 174, two important limitations were placed upon covenants running with the land. Quoting from the language used in that case, they were: (1) "When the covenant extends to a thing in esse, parcel of the demise, the thing to be done by force of the covenant is quodammodo annexed and appurtenant to the thing demised, and shall go with the land, and shall bind the assignee, although he be not bound by express words, but, when the covenant extends to a thing which is not in being at the time of the demise made, it cannot be appurtenant or annexed to the thing which hath no being," and in order for the assignee to be bound he must be expressly named in the covenant. (2) "But although the covenant be for him and his assigns, yet if the thing to be done be merely collateral to the land, and doth not touch or concern the thing demised in any sort, there the assignee shall not be charged." The first of these rules was, in the subsequent English case of Minshull v. Oakes, 2 H. & N. 793, attacked as unreasonable, and the opinion was expressed that Spencer's Case was decided contrary to the rule (note to Spencer's Case, 1 Smith's L. C. 186); but it has, nevertheless, been followed generally by the courts, both of England and the United States. In the opinion of the writer, the second rule quoted was intended merely to protect the assignee of the lease or of the reversion against whimsical or unreasonable covenants in leases; but it has been given a much more restricted application, and accordingly this court has held that, "to constitute a covenant running with the land, the covenant 'must have relation to the interest or estate granted, and the act to be done must concern the interest created or conveyed.'" Atlanta Consolidated R. Co. v. Jackson, 108 Ga. 638, 34 S. E. 184, citing 1 Ballard's Real Prop. § 491.

Now, as to the application of these rules to the covenant under consideration. The trial judge, in an able opinion delivered when the judgment was rendered striking the plea of recoupment, held that the covenant related to a thing merely in posse, and therefore that it could not bind the assignee, in the absence of an express stipulation that they should be bound. He seems to have proceeded upon the idea that because the lessor was not bound under the lease to make any repairs, but might or might not do so at his option, the subject of the covenant was "floating," or uncertain. His honor was doubtless for the moment confused with the idea that the covenant was one by which the landlord agreed at the option of the tenant to make repairs, whereas he in fact expressly declined to undertake any such obligation, and agreed, not to repair, but to reimburse. But, assuming the correctness of the premise taken, we cannot agree to the correctness of the conclusion reached. The fact that the tenant might or might not make repairs to the wharf or dredge the channel is, in our opinion, unimportant. The question is, was the thing to be repaired or dredged in existence at the time the covenant was made?

The affirmative of this question is not disputed. And so, had the covenant been that the landlord should repair, it would not have been necessary, in order to bind the assignees of the reversion, that they should be expressly named. But, as we have seen, the covenant was to reimburse for repairs which the lessee was permitted to make; and the pivotal question for us to decide is whether this was a covenant so related to the estate or interest created as to run with the land, whether the word "assigns" was used or not. A case very closely in point, and one which has been very frequently cited by the text-books and the courts of various states, is that of Bream v. Dickerson, 2 Humph. 126. There it appeared that a lease was made for a term of years at a stipulated rental; the lessor covenanting for himself and heirs "to pay and satisfy [the lessees], their heirs and assigns, at the expiration of the lease, the full and fair cash valuation of such improvements as might be standing on the premises at the expiration of the lease, provided it did not exceed the sum of $1,500. This sum, whatever it might be, he reserved to himself the right to pay in one, two, and three years from the expiration of the lease, or to pay the same out of the rents of said improvements, if they would rent for an amount sufficient to pay it." During the term both the lease and the reversion were assigned, and improvements to an amount greater than $1,500 were placed on the land by the lessees and their assignees. At the expiration of the lease the assignees of the reversion refused to pay any amount for the improvements on the land, and the tenants sought to enjoin them from bringing an action of ejectment for the land until they had either paid the value of the improvements or permitted the plaintiffs to receive such value out of the rents and profits. In the opinion the court, speaking through Turley, J., said: "Whether a particular express covenant sufficiently touches and concerns the thing demised as to be capable of running with the land is not unfrequently a question of difficulty, but such as we do not feel it to be in the case now under consideration. There is no covenant on the part of the lessees to improve. They may do so, or not, at their option. The covenant is on the part of the lessor to pay for improvements if they should be made and left standing at the expiration of the lease. A covenant, to run with the land, must touch and concern it, and it is difficult to see how a covenant to pay a pecuniary consideration for a house, if the tenant shall think proper to erect it, can be said to touch and concern the estate." See, also, Gardner v. Samuels, 116 Cal. 84, 47 Pac. 935, 58 Am. St. Rep. 135; Hansen v. Meyer, 81 Ill. 321, 25 Am. Rep. 282; Etowah Mining Co. v. Wills Valley Mining Co., 121 Ala. 672, 25 South. 720. So, in the present case, we fail to see how a covenant to pay money for purely contingent repairs, to be made at the option of the lessor, can be said to touch or concern the land, or to have relation to the estate or interest conveyed, so as to constitute it a covenant running with the land. The case of Atlanta Consolidated R. Co. v. Jackson, 108 Ga. 634, 34 S. E. 184, while different as to its facts, contains strong authority arguendo for the ruling now made. Whether, had the lessee been bound by the lease to make the repairs, the covenant to reimburse would have been tantamount to a covenant to repair by the lessor, and would have run with the land, quære?

2. Having reached the conclusion that the covenant to reimburse did not run with the land, it is easy to decide that the assignee of the reversion, Kehoe, was not bound by its terms by reason of the fact that he took with notice of it and subject to the lease in which it was contained. It is not necessary to decide whether, had the repairs been made subsequently to the purchase by Kehoe, he would have been bound to reimburse by reason of his notice of the covenant in the lease. It appears that there had been a complete breach of this purely personal obligation before Kehoe bought. The only notice with which he was charged was notice that his predecessors in title owed their tenants money for repairs which the latter had made on the property. While it may be argued with force that he bought the property subject to the subsequent obligations imposed by the lease, it cannot seriously be contended that he purchased, along with it, the previously incurred personal debts of his grantors, growing out of their ownership of the property.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

FORLAW et al. v. AUGUSTA NAVAL STORES CO.

AUGUSTA NAVAL STORES CO. v. YOUNG.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. DOMICILE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Under the evidence in this case, the question of domicile raised by the plea to the jurisdiction was one of fact, and it was properly submitted to the jury for determination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Domicile, § 40.]

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

In the absence of a proper request to that effect, it is not error for a judge, in his charge upon the question of one's domicile, to fail to draw the distinction between "actual residence" and "legal residence."

3. DOMICILE—QUESTION OF FACT—INSTRUCTIONS.

As the jury was to determine the question of fact as to whether the defendant had a family, and there was some evidence to show that the defendant's business caused a frequent change of residence, there was no error in giving in charge to the jury sections 1824 and 1825 of the Civil Code.

4. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court properly refused a written request to give a charge which assumed that there was no dispute as to an issuable fact.

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—FRAUD OF AGENT—ACTION BY PRINCIPAL.

There was evidence warranting the jury to return the verdict as made by them, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial upon the issue raised by the plea to the jurisdiction.

6. SAME—DUTIES OF AGENT—TRUST RELATION.

The relation of principal and agent is a fiduciary one, and the latter cannot make advantage and profit for himself out of the relationship, or out of knowledge thus obtained, to the injury of his principal; and, the agency being established, the agent will be held to be a trustee as to any profits, advantages, rights, or privileges under any contract made and obtained within the scope and by reason of such agency, and he will be compelled to transfer to the principal the benefit of his contract upon repayment to him of such sums as he may have expended in consideration of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, §§ 132-140.]

7. FRAUD—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

As to one of the defendants, it does not appear that he acted other than as an agent for a codefendant; and there being nothing clearly and distinctly alleged to show mala fides on his part, nor any allegation showing that he participated in the profits arising from the alleged fraudulent scheme or conspiracy, his demurrer, wherein he contended that the petition did not set out any cause of action against him, was properly sustained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Bill by the Augusta Naval Stores Company against D. J. Forlaw and others. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Judgment in each case affirmed.

The Augusta Naval Stores Company, a partnership composed of Hogan and Heath, filed an equitable petition against D. J. Forlaw, Frank D. Christie, the Woodward Lumber Company, and the Ellis-Young Company, alleging in substance as follows: The petitioners formed a partnership for the purpose of conducting a turpentine business. For this purpose they acquired leases to about 3,713 acres of land in the county of Richmond, and in order to obtain such leases they had to pay the owners of the properties partly in cash, and the balance out of the profits of the business. To make the cash payments, they borrowed money from the Ellis-Young Company, a corporation of Savannah, and transferred to said company the leases as security. "Said leases thus obtained were of the value of $2,500, * * * and said company advanced the necessary money to make the payment called for thereby," which amounted to about $900. Petitioners took possession of the tracts of land, and by their agent are still in possession thereof. Some time subsequent to this transaction, petitioners entered into an agreement with the Woodward Lumber Company, under the terms of which the lumber company agreed to lease to petitioners the turpentine privileges on what is known as the "Cashin Mill Tract," containing 2,000 acres, for $6,000 cash and one-half of the net profits realized on said tract, which was to be ascertained by making certain deductions and allowances and then dividing the profits according to the agreed stipulations. Petitioners went into possession of the Cashin mill tract and commenced operations thereon. This lease covered a period of three years. Thereafter, pursuant to an agreement with the Ellis-Young Company, petitioners drew on them for $6,000, attaching to the lease a transfer thereof to the Ellis-Young Company. Petitioners based their authority for drawing on the Ellis-Young Company upon the following letter which was received from said Ellis-Young Company shortly after the first draft: "Yours of the 20th at hand, with leases, which seem to be in order. Your drafts will be paid as advised. When you need anything in the way of axes or tools, let us know." The Ellis-Young Company, instead of paying said draft of $6,000, telegraphed petitioners to "hold draft until papers could be examined and Wade conferred with"; Wade being the agent or inspector of the Ellis-Young Company, who had examined the properties covered by the lease. The matter was suspended until the arrival of J. R. Young, agent of the Ellis-Young Company, "who brought with him one D. J. Forlaw." These persons caused the title to the property to be examined, and inspected the property, and expressed themselves as more than pleased with the turpentine privileges thus obtained by petitioners, but objected to the arrangement whereby the Woodward company should share in the net profits made by petitioners in said turpentine business on said property, whereupon petitioners agreed to make any reasonable change in the contract desired by the Ellis-Young Company. Said Young as agent, as aforesaid, and said Forlaw proposed to petitioners that, instead of conducting the business in the form of a partnership, it would be best to immediately form a corporation to be known as the "Augusta Naval Stores Company," with a capital stock of $7,500, which amount the Ellis-Young Company would lend to the new corporation, the stockholders of which should be as follows: Young, owning one-third; Forlaw, owning one-third; and petitioners, owning one-sixth each—and that this corporation should own all of the leases that had theretofore been transferred by petitioners to the Ellis-Young Company for advances theretofore made, amounting to about $800, and also the lease on the Cashin mill tract. Young and Forlaw further proposed to petitioners that the capital stock to be owned by petitioners in the new corporation could be obtained from the Ellis-Young Company and paid for out of the profits of the business, "petitioner Heath's firm [Heath & Cooper] in the meantime to sell goods to the company and the hands working for the turpentine farms, acting as commissary; and petitioner Hogan to be paid, in addition to the stock aforesaid, the sum of $500 for his services up to that time in obtaining said turpentine privileges." Forlaw was to get a salary to superintend the farms, Hogan to be employed to assist Forlaw when found to be necessary. Said Young stated that rather than have the Woodward Lumber Company interested in the profits of the business, his company would be willing to pay the Woodward Lumber Company more money than the $6,000.

Relying upon these propositions and believing that they would be carried out in good faith, petitioners agreed thereto and thereupon opened negotiations with the Woodward Lumber Company, through Forlaw, which resulted in another agreement being reached under the terms of which the Woodward Lumber Company agreed to waive all of its interest in the net profits and to sell the turpentine privileges in said Cashin mill tract for the sum of $10,000—$5,000 cash, and $5,000 in 12 months. Forlaw then drew two drafts upon the Ellis-Young Company, one sight draft for $5,000, which was paid, and one for $5,000 payable one year after date, which was accepted by said Ellis-Young Company; the lease from Woodward Lumber Company being transferred to the Ellis-Young Company as security for the $10,000. "That during all this time, from November, 1908, down to the present time (being since the time when petitioners brought from Screven county 15 negro hands, and put them to work upon the turpentine farms hereinbefore referred to), said work has been going on, has been conducted in the name of petitioners; petitioners being in possession of said property, both of the 3,713 acres, and also of the said 2,000 acres of the Cashin mill tract. That since January 9, 1904, petitioners, under the promise aforesaid, having been expecting the said parties, Forlaw, Young, and the Ellis-Young Company, to proceed with the corporation agreed upon, and have allowed the said Forlaw to go upon the turpentine farms aforesaid and supervise the same, they also being still under the control of one Frank D. Christie, who was put in charge by petitioner when the work first started." Forlaw, Young, and the Ellis-Young Company refused to pay petitioner Heath the $500 as agreed, paying him only $300, and refused to fulfil said contract made with petitioners and to recognize their rights in said property, and their refusal to so do was a breach of the contract which released petitioners therefrom. Moreover this breach was the part of a fraudulent scheme on the part of defendants, except the Woodward Lumber Company and Christie, to get control of the turpentine privileges aforesaid. Petitioners have made demand upon Forlaw to discontinue his control over said property and all further operations on the same, as well as to cease his supervision of the employees and Christie; but to no avail. Petitioners have tendered, and continue to tender, to Forlaw, Young, and the Ellis-Young Company, all money heretofore advanced to them by said defendants, and demanded a reconveyance of the leases heretofore described; but defendants would neither accept the tender nor comply with their demand. Forlaw, Young, and the Ellis-Young Company obtained said original leases under their contract with petitioners to act as factors, and defendants cannot change their status towards petitioners without petitioners' consent. Defendants occupy a trust relation with petitioners, which they have abused; and by their propositions as aforesaid they have imposed upon petitioners' confidence and induced them to act contrary to their interests. The defendants, with the exception of the Woodward Lumber Company, are joint trespassers upon petitioners' property, and their continuing to supervise the operations of the property is a daily trespass and damage to petitioners, which is irreparable and cannot be measured in damages. Forlaw is insolvent, and his claim to own the lease interest from the Woodward Lumber Company is a cloud upon petitioners' title. The Woodward Lumber Company refuses to recognize petitioners as the owners of the lease executed by it to Forlaw, although in equity petitioners are the owners of said lease; but the Woodward Lumber Company claims in no way to be bound by the fraudulent imposition put upon petitioners by Forlaw, Young, and Ellis-Young Company. Christie, whom petitioner put in charge of said property, and who is still in possession and control as the agent of petitioners, claims to be uncertain as to his duty and status, saying that he does not know whose orders to obey, whether to obey Forlaw or to carry out the commands of petitioners; and he refuses to recognize the rights of petitioners, thereby becoming a joint trespasser with Forlaw. He is insolvent. Owing to this condition of affairs the work is not progressing as it should, and, if continued, will result in great damage to petitioners. They pray that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the properties; that Forlaw and Christie be enjoined from further interfering therewith in any way; that Forlaw, Young, and the Ellis-Young Company be required to transfer back to petitioners all of the leases obtained from petitioners; and for general relief.

The petition was amended by the allegation that Forlaw and his associates had formed a corporation known as the "D. J. Forlaw Company," for the conduct of said turpentine business, without naming petitioners as incorporators, although petitioners had fully complied with their contract; and that the failure of the defendants to carry out their agreement has endamaged petitioners in the sum of $10,000; and they pray "that defendants be required to account with petitioners as to the proceeds of the business done under said leases." Upon motion the Woodward Lumber Company and Christie were stricken as parties defendant; to which no exception was taken. Forlaw filed a plea to the jurisdiction, claiming Chatham county as his residence. The jury found against his plea. He made a motion for a new trial, upon the general grounds, and because the court erred in charging the jury that: "If you find that Mr. Forlaw was a resident of Richmond county at that time, the form of your verdict will be: 'We, the jury, find that at the time this suit was filed D. J. Forlaw was a resident of Richmond county.' If you find that he was not a resident of this county at that time, the form of your verdict will be: 'We, the jury, find that D. J. Forlaw at the time this suit was filed was not a resident of Richmond county'"—the error being that the charge fails to draw the proper distinction between being a casual resident of a county and a legal resident. Error was alleged upon the following charge: "The domicile of every person of full age and laboring under no disability is the place where the family of such person shall permanently reside, if in this state. If he has no family, or they do not reside in this state, then the place where such person shall generally lodge shall be considered his domicile," the error being in charging the jury at all as to where the domicile of a person is who has no family; the evidence being that Forlaw had three children all of whom were minors. Error was further assigned upon the following instructions to the jury, as not being applicable to the facts of the case: "If a person shall reside indifferently at two or more places in this state, such person shall have the privilege of electing which shall be his domicile; and if such election be made notorious, the place of his choice shall be his domicile. If no such election is made, or, if made, is not generally known among those with whom he transacts business in this state, third persons may treat either one of such places as his domicile, and it shall be so held; and in all such cases a person who habitually resides a portion of the year in one county, and another portion in another, shall be deemed a resident of both, so far as to subject him to suits in either for contracts made, or torts committed in such county." "Transient persons whose business or pleasure causes a frequent change of residence, and having no family permanently residing at one place in this state, shall be held and deemed as to third persons, to be domiciled at such place as they at the time temporarily occupy." Error was also assigned, because the court refused a request to give in charge the following: "There being no dispute as to the fact that D. J. Forlaw has a family of which he was the legal head, the only question of fact for you to determine under this plea is as to the place where the family resided at the time of the service of the writ." The court overruled the motion for a new trial, and Forlaw excepted.

The evidence as to the question of jurisdiction was practically as follows: Forlaw is a widower with three minor children. During a portion of the year two of his minor children are away, in Milledgeville, at school. He considered Savannah his home, and for two years his children had been living there at the home of his brother-in-law, as aforesaid. When he went to Savannah he carried his household goods, and there they have remained in the house occupied by his children. He is a turpentine prospector, and that carries him away from home most of his time. During the two years preceding the trial he had spent portions of his time in different places in Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina. He usually went to Savannah three times a week to see his children. While in Savannah he did not always stay at the house of his brother-in-law, but sometimes stayed at a hotel. He did not return his taxes in Savannah, but paid them after this suit had commenced, for the current year and the year preceding. "I went to Savannah two years ago," he testified, "intending to make that my home, and did make it my home. I have never changed that intention." He communicated this intention to W. H. Fleming prior to the filing of the suit, who testified that he notified counsel for the plaintiffs that Forlaw was not a resident of Richmond county before these legal proceedings were commenced. Counsel for plaintiffs acknowledged being so notified by Fleming, but said: "I remember the conversation, but don't think it occurred before we filed the suit." Forlaw had lived in Richmond county about two months before the suit was filed, spending his time at a turpentine camp which he referred to as "home." He brought bed-clothes and other necessities with him when he came to Richmond county, with which he fitted up his "shanty" at the camp. At the time of the trial, he had been in Richmond county about nine months, during which time he had made five or six trips to Savannah. Forlaw and the Ellis-Young Company filed demurrers to the petition upon the following grounds: (1) The petition does not set forth a cause of action against "this defendant." (2, 3) The contract of lease set forth in the petition is void, for the reason that it was not in writing, and was not to be performed within a year from its date, and there has been no such part performance as to take it out of the statute of frauds. (4, 5) Defendants made no valid and binding contract for the formation of the corporation named in the petition; and Forlaw made the lease from the Woodward Lumber Company not as the agent of the petitioners, but in his own name. The court overruled these demurrers, and the defendants excepted. Young also demurred, upon the ground that the petition set forth no cause of action against him, as it appeared that he acted only as agent, and not individually. His de-murrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. W. K. Miller, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). 1. If the three minor children of the plaintiff in error, Forlaw, had resided permanently under a roof which he had provided and under which he himself lodged when on his visits to them, we might have been able to hold as a matter of law that even though the greater part, or practically all, of his time was passed at other places in other counties or in other states, he had a family. But that is not the case presented by the record in the cause arising out of the issue made by the plea to the jurisdiction. "A family is defined as a collective body of persons who form one household, under one head, and one domestic government, including parents, children, and servants, and, as sometime used, even lodgers or boarders." 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 866. Again: "A family is a collective body of persons who live in one house and under one manager." Webster's Dictionary. And again: "Parents with their children, whether they dwell together or not; * * * in a narrow use the children of the same parents, considered collectively or apart from the parents." Century Dictionary. "In a broad sense the word 'family' may include all the person's children, whether living with him or not, and even their relatives; but in a more limited sense it includes only those living together as one household." Hart v. Goldsmith, 51 Conn. 479. "'Family' is defined as (1) persons who collectively live together in a house or under one head; a household; (2) those who are of the same lineage, or who are descended from one common progenitor; a race or tribe; a house." Peeler v. Peeler, 68 Miss. 141, 8 South. 392. The word "family" has no one fixed, technical definition. Its meaning varies very greatly according to the subject of the law in which it is used; it varies in different statutes, and has received various definitions in different jurisdictions, even in the interpretation of statutes substantially identical. The very extensive range of these definitions is well illustrated in the numerous citations of authorities given under the first definition of the subject, from the American & English Encyclopedia of Law, above quoted. It follows that the meaning of the word "family," in the section of the Code defining domicile is not necessarily identical with the meaning of the same word as used in the homestead and exemption laws; and we find still further variations of its meaning when we pursue it to criminal laws and police regulations. See Goode v. State, 16 Tex. App. 414; Bones v. State (Ala.) 23 South. 485.

Without attempting to select from the numerous definitions of the word "family" one that would be so comprehensive and general as to be applicable in all cases, we think that no definition of the word as used in Civ. Code, § 1824, would be acceptable or satisfactory that does not convey the idea of unity of the household in which are gathered the members of the family as one collective body under the management or control of the head thereof, or to which the head of the family, though called away by the demands of business for periods of longer or shorter duration, constantly returns or expects to return. There was evidence in the case at bar from which the jury would have been authorized to find that Forlaw was, in this sense of the word, the head of a family. And, as we view the case, the preponderance of the evidence was in support of his contention on this point. But there was evidence to the contrary, which authorized a different finding. From Forlaw's own testimony we are left in doubt as to the terms upon which his children were living with the brother-in-law, when they were in the latter's house. His son was "there all the time," whether as a boarder or as a member of the brother-in-law's household the record is silent. His daughters "are there when they are through with school," but how much time they spend at school as compared with the duration of their stay under the brother-in-law's roof we are left to conjecture. His household goods and furniture were also at his brother-in-law's, but whether in use as the furniture in any particular room, or whether stored away in the house, we have no means of discovering. The defendant whose domicile is in question had not paid taxes in Chatham county, not even a poll tax, nor had he returned any property for taxation in that county until after this suit was filed against him and his codefendants. When he visited his family in the city of Savannah he stayed at a hotel when he did not stay at the place with his children; but what proportion of this time when in Savannah he spent at the latter place, and what at the hotel, we are again left to infer from indefinite and very general statements. As was pertinently suggested in argument here, in the event suit against Forlaw had been brought in Chatham county and it had been desired to serve the writ upon him at his "Most notorious place of abode," should it have been left at the residence of his brother-in-law or at the hotel where he frequently lodged? Or again, suppose that one of his children had resided permanently in Chatham county and the other two in Baldwin while he was sojourning in Richmond, where would his domicile have been? That would be determined from intention, declarations, and acts, making it a fact to be determined by the jury under the instructions of the court, and not by the court, as a matter of law. "The existence or nonexistence of a domicile in a given locality, where the facts are conflicting, is a mixed question of law and fact. So far as it involves questions of fact, including the ascertainment of the intention of the party, it is solely within the province of the jury, whose determination is conclusive, unless the verdict is set aside as having been against the evidence. * * * As generally speaking the question of what should be considered the domicile of a party is in all cases rather a question of fact than of law." 9 Cyc. 865. What we have ruled touching the meaning of the word "family" is altogether in reference to the sense in which it is used in Civ. Code, § 1824, defining domicile. In other connections the word might have a broader, or a more limited, or a more technical meaning; as, for instance, in the laws relating to homestead and exemptions. Rountree v. Dennard, 59 Ga. 629, 27 Am. Rep. 401. See, also, Fulghum v. Strickland, 123 Ga. 258, 51 S. E. 294.

From what we have said above, the conclusion reached in headnotes 2, 3, 4, and 5 necessarily follows.

6. This case is clearly within the fundamental equitable principle laid down in the sixth headnote. It is true that Forlaw was not nominally the agent of the plaintiffs in this case. He was the agent of the Ellis-Young Company, who were the factors of the plaintiffs; but he brought himself within confidential relations of a fiduciary character with Heath and Hogan when he and Young, by advising with the former and suggesting material changes in the terms of the lease which had been contracted for with the Woodward Lumber Company, induced them to waive their (plaintiffs) interest and right in the turpentine privileges in the Cashin mill tract, so that a new lease might be obtained from the lumber company of the turpentine privileges on this valuable tract of land. It is true that Forlaw took the lease from the lumber company to himself individually, but this was under an agreement and understanding between him and the plaintiffs, according to which a corporation should be formed and a one-third interest of the stock thereof taken by Heath and Hogan, the Ellis-Young Company furnishing them the money with which to pay for the same. So the new lease of the mill tract, whether Heath and Hogan, or the Ellis-Young Company, or Forlaw were named therein as lessees, was for the benefit of the corporation which was to be created; that is, for the benefit of the incorporators, two of whom were, under the stipulations set forth in the petition, to be these plaintiffs. When Forlaw went to the Woodward Lumber Company to secure the new lease, he went armed with knowledge, with authority, with power he had acquired because of the confidential relations into which he had been brought with the two men who are now seeking equitable relief. The plaintiffs themselves, through Forlaw, had opened negotiations with the Woodward Lumber Company, which resulted in an agreement being reached whereby the lumber company agreed to sell the entire turpentine privileges on the Cashin mill tract for a fixed sum, waiving its rights to a part of the profits arising from the business which had been stipulated for in the first contract. The lease to Forlaw could not have been obtained but for the agreement and consent of the plaintiffs that it should be made, or that agreement and consent had but for the confidence reposed by the plaintiffs in Young and Forlaw. The latter and certain named associates, neither of whom were Heath or Hogan, proceeded to secure a charter for a corporation under the name of the "D. J. Forlaw Company," but with the identical object and the same rights, powers, and privileges as had been contemplated for the corporation agreed upon between himself, Young and the plaintiffs. To rule that the Ellis-Young Company was to be permitted to hold the leases assigned to it to the turpentine privileges in the 3,713 acres and the lease to the Cashin mill tract, executed to Forlaw and assigned by him to the Ellis-Young Company, would be a holding at variance with the doctrine established by numerous authorities, and it would be unsupported by any authority to which our attention has been directed.

The safe principle and sound, under the facts of a case like this, seems to be one announced in the American note to Keech v. Sandford, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 53, where it was thus forcibly and comprehensively expressed: "Wherever one person is placed in such relation to another, by the act or consent of that other, or the act of a third person, or of the law, that he becomes interested for him, or interested with him, in any subject of property or business, he is prohibited from acquiring rights in that subject antagonistic to the person with whose interests he has become associated." And in the case of Conant v. Riseborough, 139 Ill. 391, 28 N. E. 791, it was said: "The principles applicable to the facts of this case are well settled by the authorities. 'If confidence is reposed, it must be faithfully acted upon and preserved from any intermixture of imposition. If influence is acquired, it must be kept free from the taint of selfish interest and cunning and overreaching bargains.' 1 Story's Eq. Jur. § 308. Where a person is intrusted as a confidential agent with the conduct of business where he professes not to act for himself, but for others who have placed their confidence in him, he is disabled in equity, even though he may be a volunteer, from dealing in the matter of his agency on his own account. 'The agency being established, he will be compelled to transfer the benefit of his contract, although he may swear that he purchased on his own account.' Dennis v. McCagg, 32 Ill. 429. The rule applies, not only to persons standing in a direct fiduciary relation towards others, but also to those who occupy any position out of which a similar duty ought, in equity and good morals, to arise. No party can be permitted to purchase an interest when he has a duty to perform which is inconsistent with the character of a purchaser. Davis v. Hamlin, 108 Ill. 39, 48 Am. Rep. 541; Vallette v. Tedens, 122 Ill. 607, 14 N. E. 52, 3 Am. St. Rep. 502." And the facts demanding the application of these rules and principles, the statute of frauds cannot be invoked to prevent it.

If the allegations of the equitable petition in this action are true (and they are to be taken as true as against the demurrer), the Ellis-Young Company, the factors of plaintiffs, stand in a fiduciary relation to them, and, if the fraud and conspiracy alleged can be proved, are trustees ex malificio; and the same is true of Forlaw, in whose name the lease from the Woodward Lumber Company was executed, should the same charges be established by the evidence. In another well-reasoned opinion from the court last quoted, we have the following ruling which strengthens the conclusion we have reached in the case at bar. "Where a confidential agent of one having a lease of a theater, who, from his position, was well acquainted with the profits of his principal in the use of the building, and who knew, some months before the old lease expired, that the latter was desirous of renewing his lease, offered privately to lease the theater of the owner, proposing to give a larger rental than was reserved in the old lease, and denied to his principal that he was competing with him for the lease, but in fact did procure a lease to be made to himself, it was held, that the benefit of such lease a court of equity would hold to inure to his principal, and that the agent would be held to hold the same as trustee for his principal." Davis v. Hamlin, cited supra. It was contended by counsel for the losing party in that case that the rule which the court applied, which holds an agent to be a trustee for his principal, had no particular application to the case, because Davis, the agent, was not an agent to obtain a renewal of the lease, and was not charged with any duty in regard thereto; that his was but the specific employment to engage amusements for the theater, and that he was only an agent within the scope of that employment; that Hamlin, having a lease which would expire on a certain date, had no right or interest in the property thereafter, and that Davis "in negotiating for the lease did not deal, with any property wherein he had an interest, and that the leased property was not the subject-matter of any trust between them." It was further argued that the relation there between Hamlin and Davis was only one of master and servant or of employer and employé, and that the rule had never been applied to that relation as a class, "that the classes coming within that doctrine are embraced within the list of defined confidential relations, such as trustees and beneficiary, guardian, and ward, etc." But the court replied that the subject was not comprehended within any such narrowness of view, but that in applying the rule, it is the nature of the relation which is to be regarded, and not the designation of the man filling the relation. Or, as clearly expressed in an elementary work on equity, "The rule under discussion applies not only to persons standing in a direct fiduciary relation towards others, such as trustees, executors, attorneys, and agents, but also to those who occupy every position out of which a similar duty, in equity and good morals, ought to arise." Bishop, Eq. § 93. See, also, Fricker v. Americus Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 52 S. E. 65. And we have no hesitancy in affirming the judgment overruling the demurrers of Forlaw and the Ellis-Young Company.

7. As to J. R. Young, since it does not appear that he acted other than as agent for the Ellis-Young Company; and there being nothing clearly and distinctly alleged to show mala fides on his part, nor any allegations showing that he participated in the profits arising from the fraudulent scheme or conspiracy, his demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment in each case affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

WALKER v. WADLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT — LEASE — CONSTRUCTION—CONTINUANCE—OPTION OF LESSEE.

A lease contract, wherein the owner of land demises the premises for one year, with an option to the tenant during that year to extend the lease for four years upon "notice of intention to take this option," and a further option of renting the premises for an additional term of five years at an increased rental, notice of acceptance of which to be given by the tenant at a stated time preceding the commencement of such additional term, is a lease for ten years at the election of the lessee, absolute for the first year, and optional with the lessee as to the future continuance under the terms and conditions prescribed in the lease contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 275.]

2. SAME — ASSIGNMENT — SUBLETTING — RENEWAL OF LEASE.

A covenant in such a lease contract that the lessee, "his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall not be at liberty to assign this lease or sublet said premises or any part thereof for the whole or any part of said term, or place any tenant upon said premises or any part thereof, without the consent" of the lessor, is not confined to the first year, but extends during the continuance of the lease, where the term has been extended at the election of the tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 275.]

3. SAME—BREACH OF COVENANT.

Where by such lease the premises are demised to the lessee, his executors and administrators, and upon the death of the lessee letters of administration upon his estate are granted to one of his heirs at law, a written assignment of the lease by all of the heirs at law, without the assent of the lessor, and an entry by the assignee with the knowledge and acquiescence of the administrator, constitute a breach of the covenant as to subletting.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 228.]

4. SAME—WAIVER OF BREACH.

Acceptance by the lessor of rent after the commission of such breach will not amount to a waiver of the covenant against subletting, unless at the time of receiving the rent the lessor had full knowledge of the facts. Where the rent is due and payable annually, knowledge by the lessor that there has been a breach of the covenant during the year for which the rent is received will amount to a waiver of the covenant so far as that year is concerned, but cannot be treated as an acquiescence in the assignment for the full term of the lease, when the lessor had no knowledge that such an assignment had been made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 345.]

5. SAME—PLEADING.

A waiver of a breach of covenant may be pleaded in bar to an action brought by the lessor against the lessee and his assignee to recover possession of the premises because of an alleged forfeiture of the lease growing out of such breach of covenant; but the establishment of this defense will not entitle the lessee or his assignee to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in making valuable and permanent improvements upon the premises during their occupancy of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 593.]

6. DISMISSAL—SEVERAL DEFENDANTS.

A plaintiff may, as a matter of right, strike the name of one of several defendants, where there is no relief prayed by such defendant against the plaintiff or her codefendants, taking the risk of the effect which the exercise of this right may have on his case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Dismissal and Nonsuit, § 44.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Burke County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. J. Walker against Mrs. M. J. Wadley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

On the 17th day of March, 1903, Mrs. M. J. Walker brought a complaint for land against Mrs. M. J. Wadley, as administratrix of the estate of W. M. Wadley, and Daniel Sons & Palmer, J. F. Carter, and William Warnock. Two of the defendants, Mrs. Wadley as administratrix and the firm of Daniel Sons & Palmer, filed an answer, in which they denied the right of the plaintiff to recover and set up the following special defense: On November 17, 1899, the plaintiff conveyed the land sought to be recovered to William M. Wadley for one year, with the option of four more, at and for the yearly rental of $325, with a further option of five years longer at $350 a year. Wadley took possession, remained the first year, and subsequently, on October 1, 1900, exercised his option to remain four years longer. He died on November 17, 1900, in possession of the property, after he had become bound for four years more at a yearly rental of $325 a year, with the right and privilege of keeping the premises for five years longer at an increased rental of $350 a year. After his death his administratrix continued the possession of her intestate, and expects, in behalf of his estate, to exercise the option for five years longer, at the time he was required to do so, to wit, on October 1, 1904.

Acting under the contract of rental, Wadley incurred a great deal of expense preparatory to carrying on farming operations upon the leased premises, and erected valuable improvements thereon, paid the rent when due, up to the time of his death, and his administratrix has since paid the rent as it fell due. In order to carry on the farming operations, care for the premises of the plaintiff, and protect the interest of the estate therein, the administratrix has associated with her the other defendants in the use, occupation, and cultivation of the land; and, "with full knowledge of the situation," the plaintiff has accepted payment from the defendants for the use and occupation of the property, and no rent is due the plaintiff. As she "elects to turn out these defendants, she must in equity return to defendants $1,104, the value of the permanent improvements placed by them on said property, and for which the said property is in equity chargeable, said improvements being necessary and [having] increased the value of the land, and also return to the estate of Wadley his expenditures used on the property rented from her of $1,000, and also pay his estate the further sum of $2,500, the value of said premises for the unexpired term of rental over and above the contract rate." The answer concluded with a prayer that the defendants have judgment against the plaintiff for these several amounts. The plaintiff demurred to the defendants' special plea, on the grounds (1) that the allegations of fact therein set forth presented no legal or equitable defense, and (2) that they did not present any equity for the consideration of the court, or entitle the defendants to invoke the equitable powers of the court. The court overruled the demurrer, whereupon the respective parties agreed that the presiding judge should, without the intervention of a jury, try the case upon an agreed statement of facts and certain evidence to be submitted in connection therewith. Pending the hearing before the judge the plaintiff sought to amend her petition by striking therefrom the name of Mrs. Wadley, as administratrix, as it appeared from the evidence that she was not in possession of the premises at the date of the institution of the action; but the judge declined to allow the proffered amendment to be made.

From the agreed statement of facts the following appears:

The title to the land sued for is in Mrs. Walker, the plaintiff, and was at the commencement of the action; and she was in the legal and quiet possession of the premises up to January 1, 1900. On November 17, 1899, she executed a lease to W. M. Wadley, since deceased, in which she was designated as party of the first part and he as party of the second part, and which embraced the following recitals and provisions: "That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the rents hereinafter reserved to be paid, and the covenants to be performed by the said party of the second part, hath demised, leased, and to farm let, and by these presents doth demise, lease," etc., the plantation in Burke county known as the "Walker Place," containing 900 acres, more or less, "to have and to hold said plantation unto the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, when permitted, from the 1st day of January, in the year 1900, for the full end and term of the year thence next ensuing. And the said party of the second part doth covenant and agree to pay the said party of the first part, her executors, administrators, and assigns, the sum of $825, annually during the term aforesaid, in one payment on November 1, 1900, and that without any abatement." The party of the second part also covenants to keep the premises in repair while he continues to occupy the same. "And it is further covenanted that the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall not be at liberty to assign this lease or sublet said premises, or any part thereof, for the whole or any part of said term, or place any tenant upon said premises or any part thereof, without the consent of the said party of the first part. And the party of the second part shall have the option of renting the said plantation for the further term of four years after the completion of the first term, at a yearly rental of $325, payable on the 1st day of November in each year; notice of intention to take this option to be given by October 1, 1900. And in the event of acceptance of said option, the party of the second part shall have a further option of renting the said plantation for a further term of five years, at an annual rental of $375, payable on the 1st day of November in each year; notice of intention to take this option to be given by the 1st day of October preceding the commencement of said term. And it is further covenanted that if default shall be made in the payment of the rents reserved to be paid within one month from the time the same shall become due, or if any of the covenants agreed to be kept by the said party of the second part in the foregoing indenture shall be broken, it shall and may be lawful for the said party of the first part to determine this lease by 24 hours' notice in writing; and upon giving the said notice, this lease, and every part and parcel thereof, shall become void, except to enable the party of the first part to collect all rents which may be due up to the time of said notice; and upon such notice, all right of the party of the second part shall cease and utterly determine, and it shall be lawful for the said party of the first part to resume and retake possession of said premises, either by personal entrance or by any process under the acts of the General Assembly of the state of Georgia in that behalf provided." This contract of lease was executed under seal by each of the parties thereto, and Wadley entered into possession under this lease on January 1, 1900. On or about August 29, 1900, he notified Wm. Jones Walker, agent for Mrs. Walker, that it was his intention to accept the option under the lease for an additional term of four years after the expiration of the first term. Wadley died November 17, 1900, in possession of the premises, after having paid the rent for 1900. Mrs. Wadley obtained temporary letters of administration upon his estate on November 21, 1900, and permanent letters on January 7, 1901. She made repeated efforts to induce Mrs. Walker to permit her to sublet the land or assign the lease, which Mrs. Walker declined to assent to. Neither in the appraisal of the estate of Wadley nor in the returns of his administratrix was any reference made to the lease of the Walker place.

In the year 1900, during the lifetime of Wadley, he, without the consent of Mrs. Walker, sublet portions of the plantation to certain tenants for that year, taking rent notes from them; but the remainder of the plantation was farmed by him on the cropper or wages system. In the summer or fall of 1900 he also, without the consent of Mrs. Walker, rented various farms on the place to tenants for the year 1901; but these tenants did not, as such, cultivate the land in 1901, having given up their leases upon the death of Wadley. In the month of December, 1900, Mrs. Wadley and the other heirs at law of W. M. Wadley, sold the personal property of his estate and assigned the aforesaid contract of lease to Daniel Sons & Palmer; the transfer of this lease being reduced to writing and dated to correspond with the time the sale was effected. The consideration for the assignment of the lease was the payment by the assignee of $150 over and above the annual rental provided for in the lease. The firm of Daniel Sons & Palmer took possession of the Walker place under this assignment on January 1, 1901, and remained in possession, through persons acting under authority as its representatives, up to the time the present action was filed on March 17, 1903, "relying upon the warranty of Mrs. M. J. Wadley and her promise to keep them in possession." Neither Mrs. Walker nor her agent or attorneys had knowledge of this assignment until March 31, 1905, when the writing was exhibited to them, having been impressed by correspondence had with the attorney representing the estate of Wadley that "the administratrix was undertaking to carry on the farms of the estate by Daniel Sons & Palmer and by herself," and this attorney being under the impression, at the time this correspondence was had, that the plantation would be run as stated in his letters. Nor was the plaintiff chargeable with anything more than implied notice of the fact that the firm of Daniel Sons & Palmer based its right of possession under or by virtue of the assignment mentioned. Plaintiff believed, from the apparent connection that firm had with the place, that some arrangement had been made by the administratrix with its members which it was hoped by them would have the same effect as an assignment of the lease, but that this arrangement sought nominally to preserve the lease to the estate. This belief was based on the fact that, notwithstanding the representations made in the letters received from the attorney for the Wadley estate to the effect that the administratrix proposed to carry on the farming operations on the Walker place, and notwithstanding Daniel Sons & Palmer had endeavored in the latter part of 1900 to purchase the lease and desired possession of the place, but were informed of plaintiff's refusal to consent to an assignment of the lease, yet the farming operations were apparently being conducted by that firm, though its members did not reside on the place. The plaintiff understood that the administratrix had not actually assigned the lease to Daniel Sons & Palmer, because of plaintiff's refusal to give her consent; but the circumstance above recited, coupled with the fact that under the law an administratrix cannot continue the business of an estate beyond the year of the death of her intestate, induced the plaintiff to believe that the administratrix had, "if not directly or in form, assigned to Daniel Sons & Palmer some interest in the lease and in her alleged right of possession under the same, if not her entire interest. But plaintiff had no information or knowledge as to what the arrangement was, other than a surmise from the letters * * * and the circumstances aforesaid, until the bringing of the pending action. She made the said Daniel Sons & Palmer parties defendant upon the theory that, whatever said arrangement was, it was entered into in pursuance of an attempt or scheme to evade what plaintiff claims is the law and the expressed terms of the contract, which defendants deny," and she "claims that said arrangement was in effect an assignment, either partial or total, in violation of the law and the contract."

On January 8, 1901, Mrs. Walker gave formal written notice to Mrs. Wadley, as administratrix, to vacate the premises, on the ground that there had been a "breaking of the covenants of said lease by the tenant in subletting a part of said premises and the failure to keep the said premises in repair." By a letter written on the same day by the agent of Mrs. Walker to the attorney representing the estate of Wadley, in which letter this written notice was inclosed, he was informed by the writer that he had visited the plantation and found it in a worse condition than when it was leased, and that he had information that Mr. Wadley had sublet two portions of the place without Mrs. Walker's consent; that she considered this as two distinct violations of the covenants of the lease, and had accordingly authorized the writer to give notification to this effect. In a subsequent letter, dated January 13, 1901, written in behalf of Mrs. Walker by her attorneys, and addressed to the attorney representing the estate of Wadley, he was notified that she desired them to state that, if the administratrix would keep the covenants of the lease and make the repairs stipulated therein, Mrs. Walker would not proceed to dispossess her or to terminate the tenancy; that the notice previously sent was intended to remind the tenant of the failure to perform the covenants of the lease and of the consequences that would follow a continued violation of its terms; and that Mrs. Walker would not consent to an assignment of the lease or to the subletting of the premises. On October 31, 1901, the attorney just mentioned, acting as the representative of the administratrix of the Wadley estate, sent to Mrs. Walker a check drawn in favor of Mrs. Mary J. Walker for $325, stating in a letter in which the check was inclosed that it was for rent of Walker place, due November 1st under the terms of the lease. On November 4, 1901, the agent of Mrs. Walker returned this check, with the statement in a letter accompanying it that he did so because it had not been drawn payable to the order of Margaret J. Walker, the real name of his principal. On the following day the attorneys acting for Mrs. Walker mailed to Mrs. Wadley, as administratrix, a notice to quit at the expiration of the year, because the rent had not been paid when due, stating in their letter that "under the law of Georgia the landlord has the right to say who shall occupy her premises. In this case, as the tenant is dead, and as you, his representative, do not care to occupy the premises, she does not care to have people there without her consent." They also inclosed a copy of a letter written on the same day to the attorney of the administratrix, in which they said: "Without conceding that the administratrix had any legal right to occupy the premises under the contract entered into by W. M. Wadley with Mrs. Walker, we think that, even under your construction of that contract, her failure to pay the rent when due worked a forfeiture of whatever right the administratrix may have had. We submitted the proposition that you made some time since to purchase of Mrs. Walker the right to sublet the premises, which proposition she declined, advising us that she would under no circumstances permit Mrs. Wadley to sublet the premises, even if she had the right to occupy them herself. A portion of the land was sublet last year without Mrs. Walker's consent, and we regard the transaction under which the farm was operated this year as equivalent to subletting, if not so as a matter of fact." On the same day, November 5, 1901, the attorney representing the administratrix inclosed in a letter sent to the agent of Mrs. Walker a check made payable to

"Margarett J. Walker," which check she accepted and negotiated.

Thus matters rested until the fall of 1902. On October 30th of that year, Mrs. Walker's attorneys sent to the representative of the administratrix a letter, the contents of which were as follows: "We are instructed by Mrs. M. J. Walker, through her agent, William Jones Walker, to acknowledge the receipt of $325 sent her as 'rent' for her plantation in Burke the present year. As Mrs. Walker does not recognize Mrs. Wadley, either individually or in any representative capacity, as her tenant, but as a person holding her place without her consent, but against her earnest protest, she can only credit the amount forwarded her on Mrs. Walker's demand for use and occupation. Mrs. Walker claims that the true rental value of the place for the year 1902 is $600. Representing her, we beg that you will at once present to Mrs. Wadley, in whatever capacity she assumes to act, the demand of Mrs. Walker for the balance due her for the use and occupation of the place for 1902, to wit, $275. These are our instructions." On March 14, 1903, Mrs. Walker caused a written notice to vacate the premises to be served upon Mrs. Wadley in her capacity as administratrix, therein stating that, even if she ever acquired any rights under the lease, she had forfeited the same by reason of her violations of its covenants with respect to subletting the premises and keeping the same in repair, "which violations have occurred during each of the years since January 1, 1901, and the whole of said place being practically, in contemplation of law, if not actually, sublet for the present year, and being occupied by strangers not under [her] personal supervision and guidance." On October 29, 1903, after the plaintiff had instituted the present action, she gave to Mrs. Wadley a receipt for $325, therein stating their respective contentions, and reciting that the payment was received without prejudice to either, and was to be credited accordingly as the issue between them might be ultimately determined. Counsel for Mrs. Wadley consented that the money might be retained by Mrs. Walker upon the conditions stated in this receipt, and on November 10, 1904, another payment of $325 was accepted, and a similar receipt given, upon the same understanding.

It further appeared from the agreed statement of facts that W. M. Wadley resided in Burke county at the date of his death, but at that time Mrs. Wadley lived in the county of Richmond, where she has since continuously resided. The plaintiff, her agent and attorneys, had notice prior to January, 1903, that W. M. Wadley did, in the year 1900, sublet a one-horse farm to one tenant by the name of Harris, and another one-horse farm to a tenant named Williams, but did not, prior to the fall of 1902 or the early part of 1903, have any information as to other subletting. Mrs. Wadley, the administratrix, not being allowed under the law to continue the business of her intestate longer, on November 24, 1900, sold the perishable property of the estate, together with the lease of the Walker place, to Daniel Sons & Palmer, at a private sale at Millen, Ga., for some $4,200, and that firm took possession of the personalty on the Walker place and of the plantation itself, upon an understanding with Mrs. Wadley that they would run the same in her name. Subsequently, during the year 1901, a written transfer of the personal property and of all interest in the lease was executed by all of the heirs of W. W. Wadley, including Mrs. Wadley, to Daniel Sons & Palmer, and that firm has been farming the property, through its agents, ever since, remitting each year to Mrs. Wadley $325, who, in turn, sent that amount to Mrs. Walker. On August 31, 1904, the attorney representing Mrs. Wadley as administratrix wrote a letter to Mrs. Walker, stating that the estate of Wm. M. Wadley, through its legal representative, desired to exercise the right given him under the lease to continue the same for an additional period of five years at the price stipulated in the lease. This notice was given at the request of Daniel Sons & Palmer, but this fact was unknown to the plaintiff. The other defendants to the action, J. F. Carter and William Warnock, were at the time of bringing suit in possession or occupying the land sued for under authority of Daniel Sons & Palmer.

Evidence touching the claim of the plaintiff to mesne profits was introduced in her behalf; and the defendants introduced evidence bearing on this issue, as well as evidence in regard to the value of the improvements which had been placed upon the premises subsequently to the entry under the lease. After hearing the argument of counsel, the presiding judge rendered judgment in favor of the defendants on the ground that, on the admitted facts, the plaintiff was not entitled to prevail. Exception to this judgment was taken by Mrs. Walker, who in her bill of exceptions also assigns error upon the overruling of her demurrer to the defendant's plea, and complains of the refusal of the court to allow her to strike from her petition the name of Mrs. Wadley as a codefendant.

Phil P. Johnston, H. J. Fullbright, and Saussy & Saussy, for plaintiff in error. W. K. Miller and Lamar & Callaway, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The lease, the provisions of which appear in the foregoing statement of facts, bound the lessor for the term of 10 years, at the election of the lessee. The term was absolute for the first year, and, upon the lessee giving the stipulated notice of his acceptance of the option to extend the term four years from January 1, 1901, the lease contract became binding on both parties for that period of time. If there was any irregularity in giving the notice to Wm. Jones

Walker, as agent for the lessor, instead of to the lessor herself, such irregularity was waived by the subsequent recognition on the part of the lessor of the continuance of the lease. The extended term of four years was not a new demise, but only an extension of the term of the lease from one to five years according to its express provisions.

2. Therefore the covenant against the assignment of the lease or subletting related not only to the first year's existence of the lease, but was likewise coextensive with the continuance of the lease. Manifestly it was the intention of the contracting parties that the same covenants were to be binding during the continuance of the lease, save as to the amount of rental to be paid, whether its existence continued one, five, or ten years. Corporation of the London Assurance v. Paterson, 106 Ga. 538, 32 S. E. 650; Taylor's Land. & Ten. § 332.

3. The lease being made to Wadley, his executors and administrators, it was clearly the right of his administratrix to continue in possession of the leased premises as long as, under the law, she was authorized to continue his business, which was until the expiration of the current year of his death. Civ. Code 1895, § 3436. By accepting rent paid by the administratrix under the terms of the lease for the year 1901, the lessor recognized her as a tenant lawfully in possession thereunder for the additional term of four years therein provided for. So, unless the administratrix committed a breach of the covenants upon which the lease was made, the lessor was estopped from claiming that she was a mere intruder. That she did commit a breach of the covenant against assigning the lease or subletting is evident; for, after the lessor had positively declined to give assent to the assignment of the lease to Daniel Sons & Palmer, the administratrix turned over the possession of the plantation to that firm upon the understanding that it was to be run in her name, but for its benefit, in order that effect might be given to the written assignment of the lease which she and the other heirs of the estate had executed. This transaction was colorable, was concealed from the lessor, and was in direct violation of the covenant against subletting. A violation of this covenant could only be avoided by the operation of the plantation by the administratrix in person or through authorized agents for the benefit of the estate she represented. She could not accomplish by indirection what the lease expressly forbade her to do without the assent of the lessor. Indeed, the defendants' plea practically admitted the breach of covenant, and their defense was that there had been a waiver of this breach on the part of the plaintiff.

4. The lessor was not informed or apprised of the assignment of the lease by the heirs of Wadley to Daniel Sons & Palmer until after the institution of her suit. She "believed from Daniel Sons & Palmer's apparent connection with the place that some arrangement had been made by the administratrix with them, which it was hoped by them would have the same effect as an assignment, but that such assignment sought nominally to preserve the lease to the estate," and certain facts "induced plaintiff to believe that the administratrix, if not directly or in form, had assigned to Daniel Sons & Palmer some interest in the lease, and in her alleged right of possession under the same, if not her entire interest, * * * and that it was entered into in pursuance of an attempt or scheme to evade what plaintiff claims was the law and the express terms of the contract." Entertaining such suspicions and inferences, she gave notice that the lease had become forfeited because of the violation of the covenant against subletting. The lessor admits that the facts of which she has had knowledge raised the inference that this covenant of the lease had been violated. With such knowledge, and after giving notice insisting upon a forfeiture of the lease, she in the fall of 1902 accepted rent tendered under the provisions of the contract. When the administratrix sent to the lessor the money contracted to be paid, upon the express condition that it was to be accepted as rent pursuant to the terms of the contract, if this condition was not satisfactory to the lessor, she should either have returned the money to the administratrix of Wadley, or have notified her that she held the same subject to her order. Jenkins v. National Ass'n, 111 Ga. 732, 36 S. E. 945. The lessor could not apply the money tendered in pursuance of the contract as rent to a claim which she asserted independently of the contract. Her retention of the money under these circumstances was equivalent to its acceptance under the provisions of the contract, as rent from a tenant lawfully in possession of the premises, notwithstanding the disclaimer of the tenant's right of possession made in the receipt which the lessor sent to the administratrix. Acceptance by the lessor of rent accruing after the breach of a covenant, with knowledge thereof, amounts to a waiver of a forfeiture resulting from that particular breach. Taylor's Land. & Ten. § 499. And, where rent is payable annually, the acceptance of the same with knowledge by the lessor that there has been a breach of covenant during the previous year and before the accrual of the rent which is tendered, it is to be regarded as a waiver of that breach of the covenant. But, where the lessor is ignorant of an assignment of the lease for the full term of the tenancy, acceptance of the rent with knowledge limited to inferences drawn from facts which give no information as to the existence of a written assignment of the lease for the full term will not extend the waiver to the full period of the term covered by the lease assigned. When the rent for 1902 was tendered, the admitted facts justify the inference that the lessor knew that the covenant against subletting had been violated during the years 1900, 1901, and 1902. For the violation of the covenant during these years, her acceptance of the rent with knowledge of such violation was a waiver of the forfeiture for such breaches. "When, however, there is a continuing cause of forfeiture, the landlord will not be precluded from taking advantage of it by receiving rent which accrued after the breach was originally committed." Taylor's Land. & Ten. § 500. Thus, when the lessee's administratrix continued to allow Daniel Sons & Palmer to remain in possession of the land and operate the farm under the assignment of the lease by the heirs of her intestate, there was a continuing breach, and the acceptance of rent by the lessor only waived the right to forfeit the lease for such breaches as occurred prior to the accrual of the rent of which she had knowledge. When the lessor notified the administratrix of Wadley, in March, 1903, that she claimed a forfeiture because of the violation of the covenant against assignment or subletting, then, after the expiration of the time stipulated in the contract, the lease became forfeited by reason of the violation of that covenant, and the lessor could sue for possession. This she did in a few days, and under the admitted facts she was entitled to maintain her action from that time. It was, therefore, erroneous for the court, upon the agreed statement of facts, to render judgment for the defendants.

5. A waiver of a breach of covenant may be pleaded in bar to an action brought by the lessor against the lessee and his assignee to recover possession of the premises because of an alleged forfeiture of the lease growing out of such breach of covenant. So much of the plea as set up this defense should not have been stricken. But the establishment of this defense would not entitle the lessee or his assignee to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in making valuable and permanent improvements on the land during their occupancy of the same. Hence so much of the plea as sought to recover a money judgment against the plaintiff should have been stricken on demurrer.

6. The Code provides (Civ. Code 1895, § 5104), when two or more persons are sued in the same action, either on a contract or for a tort, the plaintiff may amend his declaration by striking out one or more of such defendants, and proceed against the remaining defendant or defendants, if there is no legal difficulty in the way. The pleadings in the present case do not suggest any legal difficulty to the elimination of the administratrix of Wadley from the case. She has not prayed any relief to which she is entitled, either against the plaintiff or her codefendants; and, as the plaintiff brought her into court, the plaintiff should be allowed to discontinue the case as to her by having her name stricken from the petition, the plaintiff taking whatever risk to her case that may result to her by the exercise of this statutory right. Coston v. Coston, 66 Ga. 382. The court should have allowed the amendment striking the name of Mrs. Wadley, as administratrix, as a party defendant. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

(124 Ga. 423)

WASHINGTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. SEDUCTION — ACCOMPLICES — EVIDENCE — NECESSITY OF CORROBORATION.

The ruling made in Keller v. State, 31 S. E. 92, 102 Ga. 506, that the woman seduced is not an accomplice in the crime of her own seduction, within the meaning of the word "accomplice" as used in section 991 of the Penal Code of 1895, is, upon a review of that case approved and adhered to.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Seduction, ¶ 83-86.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—MEASURE OF PROOF.

Where, upon the trial of a criminal case, the court fully and correctly instructed the jury as to the presumption of the innocence of the accused, the burden upon the state to prove his guilt to the moral and reasonable satisfaction of the jury and beyond a reasonable doubt, and as to the meaning of a reasonable doubt, there was no error in charging the jury that, if the state had shown to their "satisfaction" the facts necessary to constitute the offense charged in the indictment, they should find the accused guilty, without informing them, in this immediate connection, "what should constitute satisfaction, or what amount of proof would create a state of mind and conscience covered by the word 'satisfaction,' or to what extent the evidence should go to bring the mind of the jury to the state of satisfaction."

3. SEDUCTION—PREVIOUS CHASTITY OF PROSECUTOR.

Upon the trial of one charged with the crime of seduction, the test by which to determine whether the woman was virtuous at the time of her alleged seduction is physical, not moral, chastity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Seduction, § 55.]

4. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

The charge of the court did not fail to differentiate the offense of fornication from the offense of seduction, and, if more specific instructions as to the nature of the lesser offense were desired by the accused, he should have made a timely and appropriate request for the same. The charge did not, in effect, instruct the jury that, if they were satisfied that the accused was guilty of the offense of fornication, they should find him guilty of seduction.

5. SAME.

The charge of the court, that the jury should arrive at their verdict "solely from the evidence and the law and by nothing else," considered in the connection in which it was given, was not erroneous.

6. SAME—STATEMENT OF PRISONER.

The fact that the instructions of the court in reference to the prisoner's statement were given at the conclusion, instead of elsewhere in the charge, is not ground for an exception.

7. WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION—USE OF PREVIOUS WRITTEN STATEMENT.

Before a written statement by a witness, contradictory of his testimony in the case, can be proved against him, it must, if in existence, be shown to him, or read in his hearing, unless it be a written statement made under oath in connection with some judicial proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 1233-1242.]

8. SEDUCTION—EVIDENCE.

There was no error in allowing the woman alleged to have been seduced to testify that her love for the accused caused her to yield to the sexual intercourse.

9. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING.

The defendant's signature to pleas in abatement which had been filed in the case by him, and which had been passed upon and disposed of by the court, could not, by mere reason of the filing of such pleas, be shown to the jury by his counsel as standards of the genuine handwriting of the accused, with which to compare the handwriting and signature of a letter introduced in evidence by the state as having been written by the accused, for the purpose of determining, by such comparison, whether he really wrote or signed such a letter.

10. SEDUCTION—TRIAL.

The fact that the woman alleged to have been seduced sat in the presence of the jury and wept during the argument of counsel for the state is not cause for a new trial, when no objection was made to this at the time it occurred, and the court was not requested to take any action whatever in reference to the matter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2136.]

11. CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL.

Evidence as to the good character of the accused, offered after verdict to support a motion for a new trial, is not cause for granting such motion.

12. SAME—AFFIDAVITS.

Affidavits introduced upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, purporting to contain newly discovered evidence which is nowhere referred to in such motion, cannot be considered by the court.

13. SAME — CUMULATIVE AND IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

There is no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a new trial because of alleged newly discovered evidence, introduced upon the hearing of the motion, when such evidence is merely cumulative of evidence introduced upon the trial of the case, or impeaching in its nature, and all of it is contradicted by affidavits introduced by the opposite party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2306-2336.]

14. SAME.

A letter received by the accused since the trial, purporting to have been written to him by the woman alleged to have been seduced, in which it was stated that he was not guilty of having seduced her, but another named person was, even if proved to have been written by her, would afford no cause for granting a new trial.

15. SEDUCTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Jessie Washington was convicted of seduction, and brings error. Affirmed.

See 50 S. E. 920.

T. J. Dempsey and R. L. Berner, for plaintiff in error. O. H. B. Bloodworth, Sol. Gen., for the State.

FISH, C. J. Jessie Washington was convicted of the crime of seduction, and brought the case here for review by excepting to the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

1. "The victim of a seduction is not an 'accomplice' to the offense committed, in the sense in which the word just quoted is used in section 991 of the Penal Code of 1895, requiring the testimony of at least two witnesses to convict of a felony, or corroborating circumstances, 'where the only witness is an accomplice.'" This ruling was made by a full bench in Keller v. State, 102 Ga. 506, 31 S. E. 92. In the present case leave was granted to review that decision, but upon a careful re-examination of the question we are thoroughly satisfied of the correctness of the ruling then made, and now adhere to the same. In addition to what was said on the subject in the Keller Case, it is very clear to our minds that, when the crime of seduction is committed, the woman who is seduced and induced to yield to the lustful embraces of the man, by his persuasions and promises of marriage or other false and fraudulent means employed by him, is not an accomplice to the crime, but obviously a victim of the seducer. We do not see how she can be an accomplice in a crime the very gist of which consists in persuasions and promises, or other false and fraudulent means, directed against herself. Can she plot and plan, persuade and promise, for the purpose of overcoming her own will and accomplishing her own ruin? Can she employ false and fraudulent means upon herself? Clearly, as to the crime of seduction, she cannot be an accomplice. The statutes of some of the states in reference to the crime of seduction contain a provision that a person cannot be convicted of this offense upon the uncorroborated testimony of the woman who is claimed to have been seduced. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 243. The authority cited by the plaintiff in error, to the effect that the testimony of the woman alleged to have been seduced must be corroborated, is the decision of a court in a state where the statute so requires. There is no such statute in this state.

2. The court instructed the jury as follows: "The state is not confined to the day named in the indictment, necessarily; but if the state has shown to your satisfaction that he seduced her, that she was a virtuous unmarried female, and that it was in this county within four years prior to the finding of the indictment, and that he seduced her by persuasions and promises of marriage to yield to his lustful embraces and let him have carnal knowledge of her—if the state has shown this to your satisfaction, you should find him guilty of seduction." The error assigned upon this instruction is that it did not inform the jury "what should constitute satisfaction, or what amount of proof would create a state of mind and conscience covered by the word 'satisfaction,' or to what extent the evidence should go to bring the mind of the jury to the state of satisfaction." There is no merit in this exception. It appears from the charge of the court in the record that the jury were fully and correctly instructed as to the presumption of the innocence of the accused, the burden upon the state to prove his guilt to the moral and reasonable satisfaction of the jury and beyond a reasonable doubt, and as to the meaning of a reasonable doubt. In view of these instructions, the jury evidently must have understood the court's use of the words "to your satisfaction" to mean to their satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt. The court having fully instructed the jury as to the degree of conviction of the guilt of the accused which the evidence must produce in their minds before they would be authorized to convict him, the jury were obliged to understand, when the court charged them that certain things must be shown to their satisfaction before they could convict, that the proof in reference thereto must produce this requisite degree of mental conviction before a verdict of guilty could be rendered.

3. The court instructed the jury that it was a question for them to determine, from the evidence submitted, whether the woman alleged to have been seduced was virtuous at the time of the alleged seduction; "that is, had she at that time had sexual intercourse with another man? If she had, she was not a virtuous woman; if she had not, she was a virtuous woman." This charge was excepted to on the ground that it confined the jury to a consideration of her physical chastity, and eliminated all consideration by the jury of any fact or circumstance tending to show her want of moral chastity. This exception was not well taken. The court, in this instruction, was giving to the jury the legal meaning of the expression "a virtuous * * * female," as applied to a woman who had never married, in reference to the crime of seduction; and the definition given was substantially correct. The general rule is that "unmarried females who are virgins are virtuous; and those who, by their own consent, have ceased to be virgins, are not virtuous." O'Neill v. State, 85 Ga. 383, 407-408, 11 S. E. 856, 857. "The jury should treat [the woman alleged to have been seduced] as virtuous unless the evidence, direct or circumstantial, should satisfy them that she had lost her virtue, by having illicit intercourse." McTyler v. State, 91 Ga. 254, 18 S. E. 140. The court charged the jury that they were to determine the question whether the woman was virtuous at the time of the alleged seduction from the evidence submitted. This included the evidence of want of moral chastity, if, indeed, there was such evidence, as well as all other evidence submitted. It is true that, if there be evidence of want of moral chastity of the female alleged to have been seduced, it may be considered by the jury on the question whether she, though a virgin, was really seduced, or whether she shared the illicit intercourse for the gratification of lascivious propensities, not inflamed by the arts or importunities of the accused (O'Neill v. State, supra); but if the court, in such a case, should fail to instruct the jury that they might consider such evidence for the purpose indicated, the accused should make a timely and appropriate request that such instructions be given.

4. Another instruction to the jury which is excepted to was: "If you should not be satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the offense of seduction, but are that he was guilty of sexual intercourse with the woman, you could then find him guilty of fornication if both were unmarried at the time the intercourse took place, if you find it took place at all. If you are satisfied he is guilty of fornication, you should find him guilty. If you are not satisfied he is guilty of fornication, you should acquit him." One error assigned upon this charge was that it failed to differentiate fornication from seduction, and that "the court should have charged the jury that if the woman yielded to defendant in response to her lustful desire, or if she did so simply because defendant promised to marry her, without more, it would have been fornication." Another error assigned is that the effect of this charge was to instruct the jury that if they were satisfied that the accused was guilty of fornication, they should find him guilty of seduction. The court had, more than once, in the charge to the jury fully and correctly instructed them as to the essential elements of the offense of seduction, and the charge now under consideration, in effect, defined the offense of fornication. If the accused desired a more specific charge as to the offense of fornication, it should have been properly requested. The instruction that, if the jury were satisfied that the accused was guilty of fornication, they should find him guilty, could not have been understood by the jury as meaning that if they were thus satisfied they should find him guilty of seduction, for this instruction immediately followed the charge: "If you should not be satisfied that the accused is guilty of the offense of seduction, but are that he is guilty of sexual intercourse with the woman, you could then find him guilty of fornication, if both were unmarried at the time the intercourse took place." The meaning of the instruction excepted to in this assignment of error was clear from the connection in which it was given, and the jury could not have been misled by it.

5. Error was assigned upon the following excerpt from the charge of the court: "Arrive at your verdict solely from the evidence and the law, and by nothing else." The exception was that this excluded from the jury all consideration of the defendant's statement, especially as no instructions were given as to the statement of the accused until at the close of the judge's charge. This excerpt from the charge should be considered in the connection in which it was given. The court instructed the jury to "take the evidence in the case and find what the truth of this transaction is, and when you find it let your verdict speak the truth. Arrive at your verdict solely from the evidence and the law, and by nothing else. Let no outside circumstances influence you in the least, but take the case and consider it as honest, conscientious jurors, and find the truth." So considered, the excerpt was not erroneous, especially in view of the oft-repeated rule that "the general tenor of the charge of the court on the trial of a criminal case should be shaped by the evidence alone and the law applicable thereto, adding, or at some stage of the charge incorporating, the statutory provisions touching the prisoner's statement." Hays v. State, 114 Ga. 25, 40 S. E. 13, and citations; Foskey v. State, 119 Ga. 72, 45 S. E. 967.

6. There was no merit in an exception that the judge did not instruct the jury in reference to the prisoner's statement until after the rest of the charge had been given. The fact that these instructions were given at the conclusion, instead of elsewhere in the charge, is not ground for an exception.

7. On the cross-examination of the woman alleged to have been seduced, counsel for the accused asked the following question: "Don't you remember writing a letter in which you stated he had not given you the ring?" She answered, "No sir." Upon objection by the solicitor general, this answer was excluded, unless the letter should be exhibited. No letter was shown to the witness. She, on direct examination, had testified that the accused had given her a ring. The evident purpose of defendant's counsel was to lay the foundation for impeaching the witness by proof of a contradictory statement made in writing. The rule is that before a contradictory written statement can be proved against a witness, unless it be a written statement made under oath in connection with some judicial proceeding, it must be shown to him, or read in his hearing, if in existence. Pen. Code 1895, § 1026. The ruling of the court was, therefore, not erroneous.

8. Nor did the court err in allowing, over the objection of the accused, the woman alleged to have been seduced to testify that her love for the accused caused her to yield to the intercourse. The objection urged was that it was for the jury to determine from the facts why she so yielded.

9. Prior to the trial of the case on its merits, the accused filed an original and an amended plea in abatement, to which his signatures were attached. The court passed on these pleas. During the trial of the case on its merits, counsel for the accused, during his argument to the jury, undertook to use the signatures to such pleas for the purpose of comparing them with a letter which had been introduced by the state, purporting to have been written and signed by the accused, and to show by such comparison that the letter and signature thereto were not in his handwriting. The court refused to allow defendant's counsel to make such use of the signatures to these pleas, because they were not such parts of the pleadings as could be so used without being introduced in evidence. There was no error in this ruling. The issue raised by these special pleas had been disposed of, and they were no part of the pleadings in the issue before the jury. They were in no sense before the jury, and could not be unless they had been introduced as evidence.

10. Another ground of the motion for a new trial was that during the argument for the state the woman alleged to have been seduced sat in the presence of the jury and wept. The court certifies that counsel for the accused saw and heard this, but raised no objection to it. We do not think such conduct of the woman cause for a new trial, especially as counsel for the accused made no objection to the same, and did not request the court to take any action in reference to the matter. This court has frequently held that, where counsel make unauthorized and improper remarks in their arguments before juries, opposing counsel should call attention to the same and either move for a mistrial or request the court to instruct the jury to disregard such statements. Bowens v. State, 106 Ga. 764, 32 S. E. 666, and citations. "The failure of the court to interpose of its own motion in a case of impropriety in its presence will not generally be a sufficient reason to set aside a verdict at the instance of a party, when no objection to the impropriety was made pending the trial, and no ruling in reference thereto was invoked from the court." O'Dell v. State, 120 Ga. 152, 47 S. E. 577 (5). So where the disqualification of a juror was known to the accused before the jury was sworn, it is no cause for a new trial. Keener v. State, 18 Ga. 194, 63 Am. Dec. 269; Cohron v. State, 20 Ga. 752. So where one of the jurors was asleep during a portion of the trial, this was held not to be ground for a new trial, unless it affirmatively appeared that the accused and his counsel did not know of this circumstance before the jury retired to make a verdict. Cogswell v. State, 49 Ga. 103. In State v. Laxton, 78 N. C. 564, it appeared that during the trial of one accused of rape certain members of the family of the prosecutrix sat within the bar of the court and occasionally wept during the argument of the State's counsel, and withdrew when the prisoner's counsel began to address the jury. No complaint was made or objection offered during the trial. It was held that the failure of the judge to restrain such conduct was not cause for a new trial.

11. Evidence as to the good character of the accused, offered after verdict to support a motion for a new trial, is not cause for granting such motion.

12. On the hearing of the motion for a new trial, movant put in evidence the affidavits of certain persons to the effect that they knew the handwriting of the accused, and that since the trial they had examined a letter introduced by the state on the trial, purporting to have been written by him to the woman alleged to have been seduced, and that such letter and the signature thereto were not, in their opinion, in his handwriting. The evidence of such witnesses was nowhere referred to in the motion for a new trial, and therefore could not be considered by the court.

13. On the hearing of the motion, the movant submitted other affidavits containing alleged newly discovered evidence, which, however, were merely cumulative or impeaching in their character, and all of which were contradicted by affidavits introduced by the state. The trial judge passed upon this alleged newly discovered evidence in view of the contradicting affidavits submitted by the state, and either considered it unworthy of belief, or as not of such a character as would likely produce a different result on another trial. It is well settled that alleged newly discovered evidence of this character is not generally cause for a new trial, even where it is uncontradicted; and it is perfectly clear that, where it is contradicted by evidence introduced by the state on the hearing of the motion, there is no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a new trial upon the ground of the existence of such evidence and its discovery since the rendition of the verdict.

14. The motion for a new trial alleged that since the conviction of the accused he had received, by due course of mail, a letter, purporting to have been written and signed by the woman alleged to have been seduced, in which it was stated that he was not guilty of seducing her, but another named person was; that she had heard that the accused had been granted a new trial, and if he would send her $100 she would leave the country and stop the trouble. Affidavits of several persons were submitted by the movant to the effect that the affiants saw him receive this letter, that they were acquainted with the handwriting of the woman, and the letter and signature thereto were in her handwriting. The state submitted the affidavits of several persons to the effect that they knew her handwriting, and that she did not write and sign this letter; also her affidavit that she did not write the letter. Even granting that she wrote such a letter, it was not cause for a new trial. Evidence that a state's witness, since the trial, has made declaration, even under oath, that his testimony given upon the trial was false, was not cause for a new trial. Jordan v. State (this day decided) 52 S. E. 768 and cases cited; Civ. Code 1895, § 5363.

15. We have carefully scrutinized the evidence submitted by the state on the trial, and, while the testimony of the woman alleged to have been seduced was self-contradictory as to the month when she claimed to have been seduced, she was at all times positive as to the place where the seduction occurred, and that the offense was committed in the summer of a given year. The jury were the judges of her credibility, the trial judge approved the verdict, and this court cannot say that he committed error in so doing.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except BECK, J., disqualified.

(124 Ga. 433)

CAMPBELL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.
A general objection to evidence consisting of a series of questions and answers is not well taken, if some of the evidence is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1637.]

2. HOMICIDE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

The fact that in a trial for murder circumstantial evidence is relied on to prove both the corpus delicti and the connection of the accused with the killing does not render inapplicable a charge that "upon the unlawful killing of a human being malice is presumed by law, and that presumption remains unless it is rebutted by satisfactory testimony."

3. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

Where, after the completion of the judge's charge, counsel for the accused requested the court to charge on the law of impeachment of witnesses, stating that it was his contention that a named witness had been impeached, it was not an expression of opinion as to what had been proved for the court to state in the presence and hearing of the jury: "I do not think, under the evidence as the court understands it, that it is necessary to give that in the charge."

4. SAME.

It was not error to refuse an oral request to charge on the subject of impeachment of witnesses; and the fact that the judge had previously been accustomed to granting such oral requests when he regarded them pertinent did not relieve counsel of the necessity to put his request for instructions on this subject in writing.

5. HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—MOTIVE.

In a trial for murder, it is not necessary for the state to prove a motive for the crime in order to support the presumption of malice which arises from proof of an unlawful killing.

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—APPEAL—REVIEW.

The conviction rested on circumstantial evidence, much of which was not as strong as is desirable in capital cases. Its probative value, however, was for the jury; and as this is the second verdict of guilty, and as the trial judge has twice expressed his approval of the verdict by overruling the motion for a new trial, this court will not interfere.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 703.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Nancy Campbell was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

See 51 S. E. 644.

Hendricks, Smith & Christian, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Thomas, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CANDLER, J. Nancy Campbell was convicted of the murder of her husband, Alex. Campbell; and, her motion for a new trial having been overruled, she excepted.

1. Error is assigned upon the refusal by the court to rule out certain specified evidence of a witness for the state. The evidence as set out in the motion consists of numerous questions and answers, many of which, at least, were entirely legitimate and admissible. Under the repeated rulings of this court, therefore, the assignment of error upon the refusal to rule out the entire evidence objected to is without merit. See Hixon v. Asbury, 120 Ga. 385, 47 S. E. 901, and cases cited; 5 Enc. Dig. Ga. Rep. 305.

2. It is also complained that the court erred in charging the familiar principle of law that, "upon the unlawful killing of a human being, malice is presumed by law, and that presumption remains, unless it is rebutted by satisfactory testimony." The error assigned upon this charge is that it was not adjusted to the evidence, and that "this principle of law is only applicable, and should only be given, in charge where the killing of the deceased was shown to have been done by the accused by an eyewitness, by confession, or a dying declaration; and especially is this true where the defendant disclaims all knowledge of the killing and explains her presence upon the scene of the homicide, and this is further true when the state has failed to prove the corpus delicti, and where the contention of the defendant was that the homicide was a suicide, or the act of some other person than herself and unknown to her." We find no error in this charge. While it is true that it would not be applicable in the absence of proof of the corpus delicti or that the accused had done the killing, it must be borne in mind that it is for the jury to say whether these essential elements of the crime of murder have been proved; and, in the event either question were decided in the negative, the charge would be harmless because the jury would never get to the point of considering it, as a finding that no crime had been committed, or that the accused had no part in the killing, would necessarily lead to an acquittal without an inquiry into the question of malice. If, however, the jury should find that a crime has been committed, and that the accused killed the deceased (both of which questions are solely for their determination), it is then their duty to take the additional step and inquire into the existence or absence of malice, without which there can be no murder; and consequently it is entirely proper in such a case as the present for the trial judge to give appropriate instructions to guide them in the prosecution of this inquiry.

3. It appears that after the court had finished charging the jury, and before the jury had retired, counsel for the accused addressed the court as follows: "We would ask your honor to charge the jury on impeachment of witnesses. We are contending that we impeached the witness Ben Ford." To this request the court, in the presence and hearing of the jury, replied: "I do not think, under the evidence as the court understands it, that it is necessary to give that in charge." It is urged that this was "a direct and positive expression of opinion that no contradictory evidence was in the case, and that the jury should, as a matter of law and fact, believe everything that had been testified to by all the witnesses sworn upon the trial," and the refusal of the trial judge to grant a new trial on this ground is assigned as error. The criticism of the charge which we have quoted is, we think, hardly just. There was no intimation by the court of what had been proved, merely an expression as to the necessity of a charge which had been requested; and it was entirely permissible for the court, when called upon, to state what evidence had or had not been introduced. Such a statement is in no sense an expression of opinion, as to the probative value of the evidence. Had the court, without any comment whatever, bluntly refused to give the charge requested, his course would have been no less an expression of opinion as to what had been proved than was the statement that under the evidence as he understood it the charge was not necessary; for the one carried the other with it by necessary implication. The remark appears to have been addressed to counsel, and not to the jury, and was in direct reply to a request made by counsel. While this court has been strict in the limitations placed upon judges as to remarks made in the presence and hearing of the jury, we are clear that the question now under review presents no such improper conduct as to require the grant of a new trial. See McLendon v. Frost, 57 Ga. 449 (3); Marion v. State, 68 Ga. 290. Of course, what is here said has reference entirely to the propriety of the judge's remark, and not to the accuracy of his conclusion as to whether, in fact, a charge on the subject of impeachment of witnesses was required.

4. We do not hesitate, however, to hold that the trial judge was right in refusing to give this charge. There was no evidence whatever upon which to base it, which was a sufficient reason for refusing the request, and the request was not in writing, which was an additional reason. See cases cited in 7 Enc. Dig. Ga. Rep. 624, 625. The custom of the judge to grant oral requests where he considered them pertinent cannot dispense with the legal requirement that such requests should be in writing.

5. The written request to charge that "there can be no murder without malice, and no malice without motive," was properly refused. Common experience proclaims that many murders are committed where there is no apparent motive other than that which springs from an abandoned and malignant heart. Courts need not subscribe to the doctrine of original sin or innate depravity, but they are compelled to recognize many evidences which tend to support such views; and, if it were indeed the law, as contended by counsel for the accused, that there can be no malice in a legal sense without a motive, and if it were necessary to prove a motive in order to convict of murder, very many red-handed murderers would go unwhipped of justice. The law presumes malice from an unlawful killing, and dispenses with the necessity of a motive to support the presumption.

6. It appeared from the evidence that the accused and her husband lived alone together; that about 10 o'clock on the night of the homicide several shots were heard, apparently in their house; and that immediately thereafter the deceased ran out of the house, went a short distance, and fell dead. About this time the accused also ran out of the house in her night clothes and went to the house of a neighbor near by. She was very much agitated, and said that Alex (the deceased) was at home shooting, and she believed he was shooting himself. The neighbor to whose house she went was in bed at the time, but he got up and went to the scene of the shooting; afterwards returning with the information that the husband of the accused was dead. This witness testified: "She [the accused] stayed excited from the time she came in there until she found out the man was dead, and then, after I went there and come back and brought the report that he was dead, she seemed to get satisfied then." Immediately after the shooting the house in which it occurred caught fire and was burned to the ground; there being no direct evidence as to the cause of the fire. It appeared that the accused had made statements relative to the positions in the bed that she and her husband occupied just prior to the shooting, and that after the house had burned down the ashes were examined and a pistol was found on the side of the bed on which, according to her statement, she had lain. There was no evidence that any other person than the accused and the deceased had been at the house on the night of the shooting. The testimony of the physician who examined the body of the deceased after the shooting, relative to the position of the wounds, tended to discredit the theory of suicide. There was no evidence of any previous state of bad feeling between the deceased and the accused. The statement of the accused was to the effect that on the night in question she had been asleep, and was awakened by the sound of pistol firing, and that she was badly frightened thereby, and without investigating the cause of the firing fled from the house. She did not undertake to say whether her husband killed himself or was assassinated by an unknown person who had entered the house while she was asleep; but she denied having any participation in the act herself.

It will be seen that the conviction rests on purely circumstantial evidence; and it must be confessed that the circumstances are not of that clear and convincing character which is desirable to support a verdict of guilty in a capital case. At the same time, we cannot say as matter of law that the jury were not justified in finding that the proved facts were such as to exclude every reasonable theory other than that of guilt. The opportunity of the accused to commit the crime, the entire lack of evidence that any one else had such opportunity, and the improbability of the theory of suicide, were circumstances which, when taken in connection with the other circumstances which have been mentioned, might well authorize the jury to find the accused guilty as charged. This is the second verdict of guilty which has been returned against her. See Campbell v. State, 123 Ga. 533, 51 S. E. 644. Two juries have heard the evidence, have looked upon the witnesses and the accused, have observed their demeanor in the courtroom, and have, under circumstances the most favorable for arriving at a correct solution of the difficulties presented by the evidence, pronounced the accused guilty. The trial judge, upon whom the law places the responsibility of correcting the mistakes of juries, has twice, by his refusal to grant a new trial, placed upon the conviction the seal of his approval. Under the settled rules of this court, therefore, this court will not disturb the judgment of which complaint is made.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

GEORGIA R. & BANKING CO. v. TICE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. ACTION—JOINDER OF CAUSES—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—SPECIAL DEMURRER.

A petition which contains two distinct causes of action in favor of different plaintiffs against the same defendant is defective; but the defect may be cured by an amendment eliminating one of the plaintiffs and one of the causes of action. Such a defect is one of form, and not of substance, and must be taken advantage of by special demurrer filed at the first term.

2. NEW TRIAL—IRREGULAR VERDICT—PAYMENT—DISCHARGE OF DEFENDANT.

When two causes of action against a defendant in favor of different plaintiffs are tried at one time as a result of the failure of the defendant to raise the objection to the misjoinder of the causes of action at a proper time, and a verdict for one sum in favor of both plaintiffs is rendered, and no objection is raised at the time the verdict is received to the form in which the verdict is rendered, the irregularity in the form of the verdict is no sufficient reason for granting a new trial. The payment of the verdict as rendered to the parties jointly, or to their attorney of record, will discharge the defendant from liability to both of them on account of all matters alleged in the petition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 120-123.]

3. TRIAL—SEQUESTRATION OF WITNESSES.

The rule in reference to the sequestration of witnesses does not apply to a witness who is a party to the case, even though there may be several parties on the same side who are all to be examined as witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 103.]

4. JURY—DISQUALIFICATION—INTEREST.

The operation of a railroad by a lessee, in the absence of express statutory authority exempting the lessor from liability for the acts of the lessee, does not change the relation of the lessor company to the public, and the servants of the lessee company are, as to the acts for which the lessor company may be held liable, in legal contemplation as much the servants of the lessor as of the lessee, and are therefore not competent to serve as jurors in an action by a passenger for damages against the lessor, based upon an injury received as a result of the negligence of the servants of the lessee company.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE—EARNINGS OF WIFE.

In the absence of any consent or agreement, either expressed or implied, on the part of the husband, that the earnings of the wife shall be retained by her as her separate estate, they belong to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, §§ 459-464.]

6. SAME—INJURIES TO WIFE—RIGHTS OF HUSBAND.

The damages that may be recovered by the husband for the loss of the services of his wife by reason of personal injuries are not confined to the value of her services in the household, but may include the value of her services rendered in her husband's business, where she was thus engaged at the time of the injury without any contract or expectation of pay for the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, §§ 767, 768.]

7. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

The charge of the court, when considered as a whole, was free from any substantial error of which the defendant was entitled to complain. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the discretion exercised by the trial judge in refusing a new trial will not be controlled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Mahala J. Tice and others against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mahala J. Tice and her husband, Charles Tice, jointly brought suit against the railroad company for injuries received by Mahala J. Tice while a passenger on a car operated on its railroad. The petition alleged that she boarded the train at a regular station, and entered a car made up of two compartments, and the car started before she reached the apartment provided for ladies, and just as she reached the nearest vacant seat therein a sudden jerk of the train threw her violently to the floor. In falling she struck a drummer's iron-bound sample case, which was leaning against the seat, injuring her leg and back, and received permanent injuries, for which she claims damages in the sum of $5,000. Charles J. Tice sues for the expense of doctors' bills, medicines, and nursing, etc., to which he has been put, and for such future expenses as he will likely incur, and for the loss of her domestic services, as well as her services as a clerk in a business in which he was engaged at the time of her injury. At the trial term the defendant interposed a written demurrer and an oral motion to dismiss the case upon the ground that there was a misjoinder of causes of action. Each was overruled, and the defendant excepted. When the panel of jurors was presented, upon the request of plaintiff's counsel, the court ascertained by inquiry that two of the jurors were employes of the operating company, a lessee of the defendant; whereupon the court ordered these two jurors to stand aside and that their places be filled. To the propounding of the question, and to the setting aside of the jurors, the defendant objected; and, the objection being overruled, the defendant excepted. A verdict for the plaintiffs of $5,000 was rendered by the jury. At the same term of court the defendant filed a motion in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that there was a misjoinder of causes of action. This motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted. A motion for a new trial was filed by the defendant, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and G. M. Beasley, for plaintiff in error. Henry C. Roney, for defendants in error.

OOBB, P. J. When a married woman is injured by the wrongful conduct of another, two different causes of action may arise—the one in her favor for her own pain and suffering, and the other in favor of the husband for the loss of his wife's services and for expenses incurred as a consequence of the injuries to her. These causes of action are separate and distinct, and in favor of different parties. Therefore they cannot be properly joined in one suit. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4938-4946. A petition by a husband and wife which sets forth a cause of action in favor of the wife and one in favor of the husband, although both arise out of the same transaction, is subject to the objection that there is in such petition a misjoinder of causes of action. Can this defect be cured by amendment eliminating one of the causes of action? The right to amend is exceedingly broad. Even where a cause of action is very defectively set forth, and parties are joined either as plaintiffs or defendants who have no concern with the cause of action, the defect as to the manner in which the cause of action is set forth may be cured by amendment, and the unnecessary parties may be eliminated in the same way. When a petition sets forth two complete causes of action in favor of different parties, but against the same defendant, there seems to be no good reason why an amendment should not be allowed striking therefrom one of the causes of action and one of the plaintiffs. The statute expressly authorizes the striking of a plaintiff improperly joined. Civ. Code 1895, § 5105. If one of the plaintiffs can be eliminated by amendment, which would leave the petition standing in favor of the other plaintiff, we see no reason why the cause of action peculiar to the plaintiff stricken might not be eliminated at the same time. Of course, it is, in such a case, for the two plaintiffs who have improperly joined their causes of action to determine between themselves which cause of action shall stand and which shall be eliminated. If, however, they do not voluntarily relieve the petition from the defect resulting from the misjoinder of the causes of action, upon objection raised at the proper time the defendant would be entitled to have the entire case dismissed.

As a general rule a defect in a petition which is amendable is cured by verdict. As under our system a misjoinder of causes of action could be eliminated before verdict by appropriate amendment, under the operation of the rule just referred to, such a defect, unobjected to at the proper time before verdict, would be cured by the verdict. The defect, therefore, must be taken advantage of before verdict; but at what stage of the cause? Is it a defect of form, or a defect of substance? A petition might contain two causes of action in favor of different plaintiffs, each set forth with all the particularity and formality that could be required. In such a case there would be no defect of substance in the allegations of the petition, and the misjoinder of the two perfect and complete causes of action must, therefore, be merely a defect of form; that is, a defect in the manner in which the different plaintiffs have seen fit to bring into court that which each would have had the right to bring in a separate suit. Being a defect merely in the form in which the suit is brought, it must be taken advantage of by special demurrer filed at the first term, and the failure to file such demurrer at such term would be a waiver of the defect. See Lippincott v. Behre, 122 Ga. 546, 50 S. E. 467. We are aware that in the case of Governor v. Hicks, 12 Ga. 189, it was held that a misjoinder of improper parties plaintiff, as well as distinct causes of action, would be a good reason for dismissing the case on general demurrer, and for arresting the judgment after verdict. We are also aware that this decision is in accord with the rule at common law. But we think since the decision was rendered such radical changes have taken place in the practice and procedure in this state that under the existing law a misjoinder of causes of action between separate and distinct parties would only be ground for a special demurrer filed at the appearance term. The uniform procedure act of 1887 entirely obliterated the distinction between courts of law and courts of equity, so far as the form to be followed in bringing an action was concerned. The compilers of the Code of 1895 have merged into one general subject, dealing with petitions, demurrers, answers, etc., all that which prior to 1887 was dealt with in the Code under the distinct heads of "Procedure at Law" and "Procedure in Equity." The more liberal rules of the equity court have become in many respects a part of the procedure in all cases, whether the cause of action be legal or equitable. The Code distinctly recognizes a misjoinder of parties or causes of action as a ground of demurrer in any case, and the same section in which this is recognized declares that special defects in the petition may always be taken advantage of by demurrer, "and unless cured by amendment the petition shall be dismissed." Civ. Code 1895, § 5048. A court of equity looked with little favor upon a demurrer which raised the question that the bill was multifarious, and, even in those cases where the court was compelled to hold that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, the complainant was generally allowed the right to amend his bill so as to eliminate one or the other of his grounds of complaint. See Morgan v. Shepherd, 69 Ga. 308.

2. Error is assigned in the motion for a new trial upon the failure of the judge to instruct the jury, if they found in favor of the plaintiffs, to bring in a verdict for each plaintiff for a given amount, and also error is assigned upon the verdict upon the ground that it is for one sum, not specifying how much is found for the husband and how much for the wife, the manner in which the verdict was rendered thus preventing the court from determining whether a proper or excessive amount had been allowed in each instance. The petition contains two causes of action in favor of different plaintiffs, and properly there should have been a verdict in favor of each plaintiff for a given amount. The judge charged the jury to return one amount to cover the claims of both plaintiffs. There is no assignment of error upon this part of the charge, but error is assigned upon the failure of the jury to find two separate amounts. There should have been a request for the judge to instruct the jury in reference to the form of the verdict rendered by them, or an objection at the time the verdict was received, and a request that the jury should retire and separate the amount found into two amounts, one for each party. There being no request during the progress of the trial for an instruction to the jury on the subject, and the record not showing that there was any objection to the verdict at the time it was rendered, and as a payment of the amount recovered by the plaintiffs to them or their counsel of record would completely protect the defendant from all liability to each of the plaintiffs on account of both of the causes of action set forth in the petition, the irregularity in the verdict is not sufficient to require the granting of a new trial. The fact that the defendant is by the form of the verdict precluded from entering into the question whether the amount really assessed by the jury to each of the plaintiffs might or might not be excessive as to one or the other was brought about at last by the failure to object to the form of verdict at the time it was rendered. The failure to raise, by special demurrer at the first term, an objection to the petition on account of the misjoinder of the two causes of action therein, renders the entire trial one that is anomalous, and the failure to object to the verdict in the case only adds to the peculiarity of the situation first rendered anomalous by the failure to demur. The defendant lost the right to have the two cases tried separately, by failure to demur, and also lost the right to have a separate verdict rendered in favor of each plaintiff by failure to object to its form when it was received.

3. At the request of counsel each party, all witnesses in the case were sequestered, and Mrs. Tice was called to the stand to testify. Counsel for defendant asked that her husband be sequestered during the examination of Mrs. Tice. The court refused the request, and this ruling is assigned as error. Tice was a party to the cause on trial. He had a right to remain in court during the entire trial. The rule in reference to the sequestration of witnesses does not apply where the witness is a party, although there may be several parties on one side of the case.

4. It appears from the record that the defendant is a railroad corporation, but that it was not operating the cars at the time the plaintiff was injured, but the same were being operated by a lessee. Plaintiff's counsel requested the judge to inquire of the jurors who had been impaneled to try the case whether any of them were employes of the lessee company, and, it appearing that two of the panel occupied this relation to the lessee company, the court required them to stand aside, and other jurors to be summoned. To the ruling holding that such jurors were incompetent the defendant excepted. It cannot be laid down as a general rule that the servants of a lessee are disqualified from service as jurors in a case where the lessor is a party. But the relation existing between two railroad companies, brought about by a lease of one to the other, is different from the relation which exists between an ordinary lessor and lessee. A railroad company, in the absence of express legislative authority, cannot exempt itself from liability for a failure on the part of its lessee, its servants, and agents to discharge the public duties required of those who operate railroad trains, and, though a passenger may be injured by the negligence of the servants of the lessee, he may still look to the lessor for compensation in damages. The servants of the lessee are therefore, as to duties imposed upon the lessor concerning the responsibility which it can not throw off, the servants of the lessor. The operation of the road by the lessee does not change the relation of the original company to the public; for the servants in its employment in legal contemplation are as much the servants of the lessor as of the lessee. See Singleton v. Southwestern Railroad, 70 Ga. 469, 48 Am. Rep. 574; Central Railroad v. Mitchell, 63 Ga. 173. If such were not the rule, it would be possible for the question of the liability of the lessor company to be submitted to the determination of a jury composed of the very employes of the lessee who were charged with the wrongful acts bringing about the injury to the plaintiff. A trial before a jury thus made up would, of course, be a travesty upon justice.

5, 6. The petition alleged that Mrs. Tice, before her injury, was "a strong, healthy woman, attending to all her own domestic duties, and by reason of his incapacity, because of his being infirm, she assisted him in the merchandise and other business, and by reason of her injury she is wholly unable to render him any service whatever." There was no demurrer to the petition, other than the demurrer above referred to upon the ground of misjoinder of causes of action. Mrs. Tice testified that her husband would be sick and often have to take to his bed, and that then she would have to attend to the store for him, and often customers would want them to get things down town for them, and she would attend to those matters for her husband, that she collected for him, that she made purchases, and that, in addition to attending to her domestic affairs at home, she was really a clerk in the store. Charles Tice testified substantially to the same facts, and stated that the services which his wife rendered were worth at least $50 per month. The defendant objected to this testimony, on the ground that it is not in the contemplation of the law that a husband can recover for the value of services of the wife as a manager of a mercantile business for him. This objection was overruled, and the evidence was admitted. The court also refused to charge a written request presented by the defendant in the following language: "While a husband is entitled to recover the value of his wife's services, where another has negligently injured her, this means the usual services rendered by a wife in the household, and it does not embrace the value of her services in running a mercantile business, going out drumming for business, and purchasing and collecting for the mercantile business." The question presented by the objection to this evidence and by the refusal of the request is whether in an action of the character now under consideration the husband can recover for the loss of the services of the wife other than such services as are rendered by the wife to the husband as a legal consequence of the marriage relation.

Prior to the enactment of the married women's act of 1866, the earning of the wife belonged to the husband, unless they were living separate and apart, or she had been declared a free trader in conformity to law, or unless the husband expressly relinquished his right to such earnings in her favor. Oglesby v. Hall, 30 Ga. 386; Cavenaugh v. Ainchbacker, 36 Ga. 500, 91 Am. Dec. 778; Gorman v. Wood, 73 Ga. 370; Wood v. Wilson Sewing Machine Co., 76 Ga. 104. In Dumas v. Neal, 51 Ga. 566, Judge McCay expressed a doubt as to whether a wife was entitled to compensation from her husband for services rendered for keeping a boarding house. This case involved services rendered both before and after the act of 1866. In the opinion Judge McCay said "It was her duty to her husband while she lived with him to do these things. She is not to be a drone in the hive." In Sasser v. Sasser, 73 Ga. 276, Mr. Justice Hall intimated that while the husband was, notwithstanding the act of 1866, still entitled to the domestic services of his wife, her earnings resulting from labor performed in other ways were her own, saying, however, that his remarks were made out of abundant caution, and solely for the reason that he did not desire at that time to be committed even by implication to a contrary view. In Eichberg v. Brandman, 74 Ga. 834, it was held that where a married woman living with her husband owned a separate estate which consisted in part of a house and lot where they resided, and carried on therein the business of keeping a boarding house since 1866, her earnings in that enterprise belonged to her, and she could bring suit for the same in her own name. While it does not appear from the headnote, it does appear from the reporter's statement, that she engaged in this business with the husband's consent, and with the agreement on his part that she might have the proceeds resulting from such business. In Brunswick Light Co. v. Gale, 91 Ga. 813, 18 S. E. 11, which was an action by a husband and wife for personal injuries to the wife, it was held that, "inasmuch as the earnings of a wife belonged to her husband, her individual and personal damages could be measured only by the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors." In the opinion Mr. Justice Simmons said: "But where, as in this case, a married woman sues for physical injuries and the pain and suffering resulting therefrom, and cannot recover for loss of earnings, medical attention, etc., the principle of the section [Code 1882, § 3067; Civ. Code 1895, § 3907] is applicable, inasmuch as her damages can be measured only by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury." This was a distinct ruling that since the act of 1866 the husband was entitled to the earnings of the wife, in the absence of evidence showing his consent to the appropriation of her earnings to her own use, or that she was living separate from him. In Lee v. Savannah Guano Co., 99 Ga. 572, 27 S. E. 159, 59 Am. St. Rep. 243, Mr. Justice Lumpkin said that the earnings of the wife are "oftentimes exclusively her own, certainly so when her husband expressly consents to her engaging in the occupation or business from which they arise." In Sams v. Thompson Hiles Co., 110 Ga. 648, 36 S. E. 104, while the language in the opinion is very broad, still, in the light of the facts, the ruling there is simply to the extent that the wife is entitled to her own earnings when her husband consents that she should receive the same. In Roberts v. Haines, 112 Ga. 842, 38 S. E. 109, it was held that "in the absence of any consent or agreement, either express or implied, on the part of a husband, that the earnings of his wife shall be retained by her as her separate estate, they belong to him." Mr. Justice Lewis in the opinion said: "While it is true that the act of 1866 has wrought many changes in the law with reference to the separate estate of a married woman, there is still imposed upon the husband the obligation to support his wife, with the corresponding right to her services and earnings during coverture." Mr. Justice Lewis remarked that this principle is recognized in Brunswick Light Co. v. Gale, supra. See, also, cases cited in 7 Enc. Dig. Ga. Rep. 132 et seq.

It must be treated, then, as the settled law of this state that even since the act of 1866, where a husband and wife are living together, the husband is entitled to her earnings, unless he consents that she may receive them as her own. If a wife who is living with her husband and is engaged in a business or avocation from which earnings result receives an injury at the hands of a wrongdoer which incapacitates her either in whole or in part from performing the work of such business or avocation, she is not entitled to recover on account of the loss thus occasioned, unless the husband has given his consent to her engaging in this business and receiving her earnings therefrom as her own. If the husband did not consent, and the wife is therefore not entitled to recover, and the husband should not be allowed to recover, the wrongdoer would be under a legal obligation to compensate no one on account of his tortious act. There are instances, probably many of them, where the wife has a peculiar talent which, if exercised, results in large earnings, and she is willingly exercising this talent, and allowing her husband to receive the benefit by appropriating the earnings. It certainly cannot be the law that in such a case the wrongdoer whose act entirely destroys the power of the wife to exercise the talent would be liable to no one for such damages resulting from his conduct. Such an injury to such a wife results in damages to somebody which must be compensated in money, and, if the wife is not allowed to recover, the husband should be. But it is said that in such a case the wife is under no legal obligation to use her talent for the benefit of her husband. Let this be granted. At the time of the injury she was using it, and it was lawful for her to do so, and it does not lie in the mouth of a wrongdoer to say that a wife actually engaged in a business or avocation which results in earnings to the husband may at some time in the future decline to further engage in such occupation. We do not think that merely because a wife can earn money for her husband by engaging in business he would be entitled to recover from a wrongdoer; but, when at the time of the injury she is actually engaged in a business or calling or avocation which results in earnings for the husband, and there is nothing to indicate that there was any agreement between the husband and wife that this should terminate at any time in the future, we think that as against a wrongdoer the inference is to be indulged that the wife will continue the work for the benefit of her husband during that period of her life in which she is able to perform the services. While in the case of Metropolitan St. R. Co. v. Johnson, 91 Ga. 466, 18 S. E. 816, the services rendered were those of an ordinary domestic nature, the language is very broad.

While this ruling is authoritative only as to domestic services, the reasoning in the opinion is of such a character as to support a right to recover for earnings of any character that were actually being made by the wife at the time she suffered the injury. Mr. Sutherland in his work on Damages says: "If she is voluntarily rendering services for her husband by carrying on his business, he is entitled to recover for the loss of her services therein, if the facts are properly alleged." 4 Suth. Dam. (3d Ed.) § 1252. The authority cited by this author to sustain this proposition is the case of Citizens' St. Ry. v. Twiname, 121 Ind. 375, 23 N. E. 159, 7 L. R. A. 352. It was there held that damages for the loss of services of plaintiff's wife by reason of personal injuries are not confined to her services within the household, but may include the value of her services as manager of her husband's business, where she was engaged at the time of the injury without any contract to pay for such services. This was held notwithstanding a statute of Indiana which declares that the earnings and profits of a married woman accruing from a trade or business, or her services or labor, other than those for her husband and family, shall be her sole and separate estate. The husband there was engaged in a millinery business, and his wife, by reason of their marital relations, devoted her energy and services to the business for the benefit of her husband, without any contract or expectation of pay. In the opinion, Olds, J., says: "There might be circumstances existing which would entitle the wife, in an action for damages, to recover for the value of her own services, but prima facie the husband is entitled to recover for the value of such services, and especially is this true when the wife is not engaged in carrying on a business or trade on her own account, or performing labor for persons other than her husband, and, on the contrary, is voluntarily rendering services for the benefit of the husband; and he is entitled to recover for one class as well as another. In other words, the husband is entitled to recover for the damages sustained on account of the loss of the services of the wife; and the value of her services, and loss sustained by reason of her inability to perform them, must necessarily depend on the character and value of the services which she is capable to perform, and is accustomed to perform for her husband." There was a ruling to the same effect in Blair v. Chicago R. R., 89 Mo. 334, 1 S. W. 367. See, also, in this connection, Holcomb v. Harris, 166 N. Y. 257, 59 N. E. 820. In case of an injury resulting in disability which would prevent the wife from rendering domestic services, which the wife is legally bound to render, the husband may recover for the loss of such services, even though such services had not been performed in the past, and the husband had never realized anything from the wife's services before she was injured. 4 Suth. Dam. (3d Ed.) § 1252. In regard to those services which the wife is not legally bound to render, but which she is capable of rendering and which she is actually rendering at the time of the injury, the husband is also entitled to recover. There was no error in admitting the evidence, nor in refusing to charge as requested.

7. There is only one other special assignment of error which need be referred to. It is claimed that the court erred in charging the jury "that the declaration sets out the claims of the plaintiffs, and states the ground of negligence of the railroad company. If the evidence sustains any or all of the grounds, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover." It is claimed that, as one of the allegations of negligence was that the defendant was negligent "in starting train of cars before she had opportunity to reach her seat," the effect of the charge would be to render defendant liable merely because the cars started before the plaintiff had opportunity to reach her seat, and that this might or might not be negligence, according to the circumstances of the case. By reference to the charge, it appears that immediately following the language quoted in the assignment of error, the court added: "If you think that the railroad company was not in the exercise of extraordinary care and diligence." This qualification relieves the extract of the charge complained of from any error. The effect of the charge with the qualification was to inform the jury that plaintiff could recover upon the allegation that the defendant was negligent in starting the train of cars before she had opportunity to reach her seat and be seated, provided that at the time of the injury the defendant was not in the exercise of extraordinary care and diligence. When the charge is considered as a whole, we do not think there is anything therein calculated to impress the jury with the fact that the mere starting of the train before the plaintiff reached her seat could be used as a basis for recovery; but, if the train was started in a negligent manner, and as a result of such negligence the plaintiff was injured before she reached her seat, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. Such is the claim of the plaintiff when her petition is considered as a whole, and such is the effect of the charge when it is considered in a like manner.

It was further claimed that the charge was erroneous because it in effect instructed the jury as to what was negligence. We do not think it was subject to this criticism. Of course, we cannot tell how much the jury allowed the wife for pain and suffering, and how much was allowed the husband for loss of services. But the evidence was of such a character that the aggregate sum of $5,000 for both items was not excessive. The evidence as to the negligence of the defendant was conflicting, but there was evidence upon which the jury could base a finding in favor of the plaintiff. The discretion of the trial judge, exercised in refusing a new trial, will not be controlled.

RABURN v. BRADSHAW.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — PERSONS ENTITLED TO ADMINISTRATION.

In the granting of letters of administration, where there is no surviving husband or wife, the next of kin of the intestate at the time of his death, according to the laws declaring relationship and distribution, is entitled to such letters. Civ. Code 1895, § 3367, subd. 2. In such a case, the law of relationship should not be relied on to the exclusion of that of distribution. Murdock v. Hunt, 68 Ga. 164.

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — HEIRS OF THE HALF BLOOD.

When there is no surviving husband, wife, child, or lineal descendant, the brothers and sisters of the intestate inherit; the half blood on the paternal side inheriting equally with the whole blood, and the father, if living, inheriting equally with the brothers and sisters. Civ. Code 1895, § 3355, subds. 5, 6.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — SELECTION OF ADMINISTRATOR.

"If there be several of the next of kin equally near in degree, the person selected in writing by a majority of those interested as distributees of the estate and who are capable of expressing a choice shall be appointed" administrator. Civ. Code 1895, § 3367, subd. 3.

4. SAME.

Accordingly, in a contest for letters of administration between a sister of the whole blood and a brother of the half blood, on the paternal side of the intestate, when such sister was selected in writing by another sister of the whole blood, and such brother of the half blood was so selected by the father of himself and of the intestate, and also by four sisters of the half blood on the paternal side of the intestate, all of the distributees so making selections being capable of making a choice, the ordinary did not err in appointing the brother of the half blood administrator.

HAWES v. BANK OF ELBERTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. BANKRUPTCY—APPEAL BY TRUSTEE—COSTS —PROCEEDINGS IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

A trustee in bankruptcy may take a case to the Supreme Court of this state in forma pauperis by filing an affidavit which discloses his inability, as the representative of the bankrupt estate, to pay the costs.

2. SAME—PREFERENCES—BELIEF OF CREDITOR.

Under the express provisions of the bankrupt act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]), a transfer of property by an insolvent debtor, which operates as a preference in favor of one of his creditors, is not, though made within four months next preceding the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, voidable at the election of the trustee, unless such creditor, or persons acting in his behalf, "had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference."

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In the present case the plaintiff failed to establish his contention that the creditor alleged to have been given a preference had implied notice of the debtor's insolvency and purpose in making the transfer.

4. SAME—SECURITY TAKEN IN GOOD FAITH—ENFORCEMENT.

When a creditor in good faith takes collateral security for a debt at a time when his debtor is solvent, and more than a year before a petition in bankruptcy is filed, the creditor is entitled to realize on the security, notwithstanding he may, before undertaking to do so, learn that his debtor has become insolvent.

5. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—CURING OF ERROR.

Though error may have been committed in excluding certain evidence offered to show the debtor's insolvency, yet this affords no ground for ordering a new trial; the plaintiff, after being allowed to establish the fact by other evidence, having failed in other respects to prove his case as laid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4194-4196.]

6. EVIDENCE—OPINIONS—INSOLVENCY.

It is not within the province of a witness to inform the court or jury whether a hypothetical state of facts would or would not, in his opinion as a business man, constitute implied notice to a creditor of his debtor's insolvency.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County;
H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by A. S. Hawes, as trustee in bankruptcy of J. J. Stephenson, against the Bank of Elberton. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A petition was filed in the superior court of Elbert county by A. S. Hawes, as trustee in bankruptcy of J. J. Stephenson, against the Bank of Elberton, to set aside an alleged preference in favor of the bank, made by the bankrupt within four months next preceding the filing of the proceedings in bankruptcy. The case made by the petition was substantially as follows: Stephenson had been conducting business as a wholesale grocer in Elberton, Ga. On or about July 15, 1902, he sold out his business to D. C. Smith, J. R. Mattox, and D. H. Arnold for approximately $12,000, accepting in payment three notes given by the purchasers, one for $4,500, one for $5,000, and the other for $1,461.72, due December 1, 1902. He was at the time indebted to the bank of Elberton in the sum of $6,000, and transferred to the bank the note for $4,500, receiving a credit for that amount upon his indebtedness to it. Stephenson also had an equity in a house and lot in Elberton, being the holder of a bond for titles from the owner, Mrs. N. E. Hudson; and after disposing of his interest in the premises, he paid to the bank $1,000 of the amount realized therefrom, this payment, as well as that above mentioned, being made within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. When these payments were made, Stephenson was hopelessly insolvent, and they constituted a preference in favor of the bank over other creditors, and enabled the bank to obtain a greater per cent. of its debt than was received by other creditors of the same class. This debt was then in existence, being an antecedent debt of some length of standing, and it was the intention of Stephenson to prefer the bank over his other creditors. The bank knew, had notice of, or had reasonable grounds to suspect, the intention of Stephenson to prefer it, as well as notice of his insolvency; and the preference was made with the intent and purpose on his part to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and such was his practical effect. The bank knew or was chargeable with knowledge of this intention on his part. Plaintiff has no property of the bankrupt estate in his hands out of which to pay the debts against it, and has not received any. The action was in renewal of one commenced

August 25, 1903, in which a judgment of nonsuit was rendered at the March term, 1904, of the court; the petition having been filed within six months from the date of that judgment. On the trial under review the court, after the close of the plaintiff's evidence, again granted a nonsuit. Exception is taken to the disposition thus made of the case, as well as to various rulings of the court touching the admissibility of evidence which the plaintiff sought to introduce, but which was excluded.

Z. B. Rogers and C. D. Maddox, for plaintiff in error. L. C. Van Duzen, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). 1. On the call of the case in this court a motion to dismiss the writ of error was made on the grounds (1) that Civ. Code 1895, § 5553, allowing a "plaintiff in error" to carry a case to the Supreme Court in forma pauperis, does not apply to a trustee in bankruptcy; and (2) even were this otherwise, the pauper affidavit filed by the trustee is insufficient, inasmuch as he does not swear that because of his poverty he is unable to pay the costs, but merely that the estate he represents is unable to do so, notwithstanding "the contemplation of this section is that, if the actual party litigant is able to pay the cost, he must do so." Neither of these positions is well taken. Barfield v. Hartley, 108 Ga. 435, 33 S. E. 1010, and citations. The pauper affidavit filed in this case is in the correct form, since it discloses that the plaintiff in error, A. S. Hawes, as the "trustee in bankruptcy of J. J. Stephenson, is, because of the poverty of said bankruptcy estate, unable to pay the costs."

2. The petition was framed under chapter 6, § 60b, of the bankrupt act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445]), which provides that "if a bankrupt shall have given a preference within four months before the filing of" bankruptcy proceedings, "and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person." On the trial the plaintiff did not contend that any of the officials or agents of the bank had any actual knowledge either that Stephenson was insolvent when he transferred to it the note for $4,500, or that he intended thereby to prefer the bank. As a witness in the plaintiff's behalf, Stephenson himself swore he did not at that time know he was insolvent, and that he had no intention whatever to give to the bank a preference. There was, however, testimony from which the jury might have found, not only that Stephenson was in point of fact insolvent, but that he realized his financial condition and sought to protect his brother, who had indorsed notes held by the bank, by discharging this indebtedness to it in part before the crash came. The most the plaintiff sought to establish concerning notice to the bank of the alleged preference was that its officers had reason to suspect that Stephenson had become financially involved, and had reasonable cause to believe that the transfer of the $4,500 note was intended by him to operate as a preference to it over other creditors. They testified, in behalf of the plaintiff, that they did not suspect anything of the sort, and dealt with Stephenson in good faith in the usual course of business, believing his solvency was beyond question. The plaintiff, nevertheless, insists that the officials of the bank could and ought to have known of Stephenson's real financial standing, and of his motive in transferring the note.

The facts relied on as authorizing this conclusion are substantially as follows: At the time of the transfer, in July, 1902, there were outstanding against Stephenson, as shown by the court records, justice's court execution, issued in February, 1898, for $6.98 principal, besides interest and costs, and another execution, for the principal sum of $36.30, issued from a different justice's court on June 23, 1902. The bank had, during that year, made various loans to Stephenson, and he owed the bank a considerable amount. He was frequently permitted to overdraw his account temporarily, and sometimes had no money in the bank to his credit. The records of the bank showed that between June 1, and July 18, 1902, 23 drafts drawn by various parties upon Stephenson had been returned unpaid. One was for $1,042.93; another for $606.76; four were for $185.42 each; and still another was for $120. The others ranged in amount from $5.70 to $93, and aggregated $924.30. From the 1st to the 18th of July, 10 of these drafts were dishonored, while during the corresponding period in 1901, 14 drafts were returned unpaid. The bank's records did not disclose for what reasons any of the drafts were dishonored, though two of them were returned with the statement that the drawee said he would send check, one with the statement that he said he had sent a check, and another with the explanation that he would write in regard thereto. Another draft for $47.50, sent to the bank for collection in April, 1902, was by it turned over to an attorney, upon direction from the drawer to do so in the event it was not paid. The cashier of the bank was informed, when the $4,500 note was transferred to the bank, that it was given in part payment of the stock of goods sold by Stephenson, and that he had disposed of them in bulk. He then owed the bank between $7,000 and $9,000, which at that time held a note for $5,600, signed by him and indorsed by his brother, L. L. Stephenson. The cashier knew, before the sale of the stock of goods, that J. J. Stephenson was negotiating with several parties; had "heard in a business way that he was trying to sell out." The reason he assigned for wishing to sell out was that he intended to go to Birmingham and engage in business with his brother. Stephenson and his family lived well while in Elberton. He dressed as neatly as anybody, and owned a horse and buggy; the horse alone costing some $220. He conducted a wholesale grocery store, had a large volume of business, and required a good deal of money in connection therewith. It is not unusual, but customary, for a large number of drafts to be drawn upon one conducting a grocery business of such magnitude.

The two justice's court fi. fas., each for a trivial amount, were not calculated to furnish an index to the financial stability of Stephenson, and would not suggest to even an unusually apprehensive man a doubt as to his solvency. The testimony, viewed as a whole, shows that the dealings of the bank with Stephenson were in due course of business, and that the officers of the bank, acting as reasonably cautious men, had no reason to suspect that he had become involved in debt and would soon have to suspend business, if pressed by his creditors. He was apparently successfully conducting a large mercantile business, in the course of which he was to be expected to deal with numerous supply houses, not only for cash but on credit. There seems to have been not even a rumor that he was financially embarrassed, or that he had creditors who were pressing him for payment. He made no secret of his purpose to sell out his stock of goods and remove from the state. Not until some time after he had sold out and transferred one of the purchase-money notes to the bank did the true state of his affairs come to light. The only circumstance from which the officials of the bank could have inferred that Stephenson was not promptly meeting his obligations was that during the period between June 1 and July 18, 1902, he had declined to honor 23 drafts drawn upon him and presented to him for payment by the bank. It appears that in no instance did he assign as a reason for non-payment that he was without ready funds to meet just demands made upon him. These drafts did not represent the demands of 23 different creditors; some of them being drawn by the same persons for the identical amounts for which two or more demands for payment had been made during that period. With but few exceptions the drafts were for inconsiderable amounts, and the sum total of them was not out of proportion to the volume of business Stephenson was conducting. Even a prudent man, it would seem, could not be alarmed by the number of drafts returned dishonored, taking into consideration the amounts for which they were drawn, and assuming as a fact that all were just demands against which he failed to satisfy when due, and which he allowed to remain outstanding against him up to July 18, 1902. We are therefore of the opinion that a jury would not have been justified in finding, as matter of fact, that the failure to pay these drafts upon presentation was a circumstance from which the officials of the bank were bound to assume, not only that Stephenson was pressed for ready money, but that, despite all outward appearances of prosperity, he was insolvent and had formed an intention to give the bank a preference over other creditors. The doctrine of implied notice, relied on by the plaintiff in error, should not be given a harsh and unreasonable interpretation. The ends of justice often require its recognition and a strict adherence thereto. See, in this connection, Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 157, 158; Bryant v. Booze, 55 Ga. 438; Hunt v. Dunn, 74 Ga. 120; Clarke v. Ingram, 107 Ga. 570, 33 S. E. 802, et seq. But this doctrine cannot justly be invoked against one who has neither studiously avoided knowledge of facts which he might readily have ascertained, nor is chargeable with a lack of that ordinary diligence which a reasonably prudent man would observe in making inquiries and keeping himself informed as to matters which may affect his interest. So far as the transfer to the bank of the note for $4,500 is concerned, the plaintiff failed, we think, to show that the transaction amounted to a preference, within the meaning of the above-cited section of the bankrupt act.

As to the alleged fraudulent payment by Stephenson to the bank of $1,000, within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy on September 20, 1902, the following undisputed facts were brought to light on the trial: Stephenson had purchased from Mrs. Hudson a house and lot in Elberton on credit, and had received from her a bond for title. On February 12, 1901, he transferred this bond for title to the bank as security for his indebtedness to it, and the bank held the bond as collateral security up to September 5, 1902, when Stephenson closed a trade with one Almand, whereby Almand was to pay $2,000 for the house and lot, assuming the indebtedness of $1,000 thereon, and allowing Stephenson $1,000 for his equity in the premises. In pursuance of this agreement Almand, on the date last named, paid to the bank $1,000, and procured from it a transfer of the bond for title. The bank gave Stephenson credit for this payment upon his indebtedness to it. At the time of this transaction the officials of the bank had knowledge of Stephenson's insolvency. The fact last mentioned did not affect the vested right of the bank to realize on the security which it in good faith took from Stephenson in February of the preceding year. In no sense did the original transfer of the bond for title constitute a preference in favor of the bank over other creditors, nor was the payment received by the bank after Stephenson's insolvency became known a fraud upon them. Upon this branch of the case the plaintiff signally failed to show any right to a recovery.

8. The evidence which the court excluded was offered by the plaintiff to establish the insolvency of Stephenson at the time of the alleged preference. With all of it admitted, the case would be no stronger; and, this being so, we shall not undertake to pass upon its admissibility. We have dealt with the case upon the assumption that the insolvency of Stephenson at the time of the transfer was shown beyond question, and we uphold the judgment of nonsuit for the sole reason that the plaintiff was unable to go further and show that the bank was chargeable with implied notice of Stephenson's financial condition and of his intention to create a preference in favor of the bank.

4. Exception is taken to the refusal of the court to allow a witness to answer the following hypothetical question: "Where a man is in business and allows drafts after drafts every occasionally to be drawn on him and returned unpaid, giving first one reason, then another, allows himself to be sued for little amounts, and judgments to stand open against him on the record, and does not keep up with his financial affairs, would he or not, in the business world, in your opinion as a business man, or rather, would these facts be sufficient to put a prudent business man on notice or inquiry that something was wrong with the man financially—that he wasn't in the proper financial condition?" The answer was excluded, and properly so, on objection that the plaintiff sought to make the witness draw a bare conclusion from an assumed state of facts. The witness was not competent to express his opinion in regard thereto. In view of the evidence introduced the effort was really to call on the witness to decide a question of law. Had there been an issue of fact involved, the jurors were the chemists, and the witness could not properly have been allowed to invade their province.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

ALFRIEND et al. v. FOX et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

When a charge correctly sets forth a rule of law, it is not rendered erroneous merely for the reason that the rule is not stated in the exact language of the Code.

2. APPEAL — REVIEW — REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The evidence not being of such a character as to demand a finding in favor of the plaintiff, and there being some evidence to authorize a finding in favor of the defendant, the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial will not be interfered with.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hancock County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by B. A. Alfriend and others against E. R. Fox and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The land which is the subject-matter of this suit was originally owned by James Hall. He died testate, devising the land to his two children, Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts, wife of William Watts, jointly. William Watts and Sarah Hall were named in the will of James Hall as coexecutors. It was the contention of plaintiffs that the land was divided by agreement, or otherwise, between Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts, and the property sued for came into the possession of the latter, and that William Watts reduced the property into his possession (this being prior to 1866), and at his death it passed to his devisees under the terms of his will. By the will of William Watts the portion of his property inherited by Mary Watts, afterwards Mrs. Alfriend, was to be conveyed to a trustee for her separate use during coverture, and at her death to go to her children. The plaintiffs are the only sons and heirs of Mrs. Mary Alfriend. It was denied by the defendants that there had been a division of the estate of James Hall by his two heirs, Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts. The property, they claimed, was partitioned after the death of William Watts, and the land sued for was set apart to Sarah Hall. She died intestate, and Nancy Watts was appointed her administratrix. The land was sold under proper order of court, and Nancy Watts, presumably by purchase, went into possession of it. It was the contention of the defendants that the land so owned by Nancy Watts was never reduced to possession by William Watts, and that their daughter, Mary Watts, afterwards Mrs. Alfriend, mother of petitioners, inherited the property as the heir at law of Mrs. Watts. Mrs. Alfriend deeded the property to the vendors of the defendants. Mrs. Alfriend died in 1881. Her four sons, and only heirs, brought suit for the property and mesne profits against the present occupants, the vendees of the purchasers from Mrs. Alfriend, the plaintiffs claiming that under the will of William Watts, whereunder Mrs. Alfriend came into possession of the land, she had only a life estate in the land; the remainder being in the plaintiffs. After a trial the jury found a verdict for the defendants. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon the general grounds, and excepted to certain portions of the charge of the court. The motion was overruled, and to this judgment the plaintiffs excepted.

R. L. Merritt, T. M. Hunt, and Seaborn Reese, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. H. Burwell and Saml. H. Sibley, for defendants in error.

COBB, P. J. The motion for a new trial contains three special grounds. One complaints that the verdict is contrary to a specified portion of the charge. This need not be considered. This raises no other question than those raised by the general grounds of the motion. Another ground complained that the court failed to charge that, there being no debts shown after 10 years have elapsed, the law presumes the assent of the executor to the legacy. We know of no law which declares that in the absence of proof of debts the presumption of the assent of the executor to a legacy arises after 10 years. The counsel for plaintiff in error cited no authority to sustain this contention. In addition to this, if such is the law, it should have been made the subject of a timely appropriate written request. In the other ground complaint is made of a certain specified portion of the charge. The charge correctly sets forth the rule of law in reference to an executor's assent to a legacy. The assignment of error was that he did not charge in the exact language of the Code. Of course, this assignment is without merit. If the charge set forth the rule of law, it is immaterial what language is used by the judge, so long as it is of such a character that it is intelligible to the jury.

2. The counsel for plaintiff in error candidly state in their brief that their case depends upon two facts being established: (1) That there was a division of the land of the estate of James Hall between his two heirs, Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts; and (2) that during the lifetime of William Watts, the husband of Nancy Watts, he reduced to his possession the land received by his wife under this division. It is claimed by the plaintiffs in error that the evidence demands a finding in their favor on both of these questions. There is evidence authorizing a finding in favor of the plaintiffs in error on both of these questions, but the jury having found to the contrary, and the court having approved the finding of the jury, the judgment refusing a new trial must be affirmed, unless the evidence demanded a finding in favor of the plaintiffs in error on both of these questions. That is the question to be determined by this court—whether there is any evidence which would authorize a jury to find there was no division, or, if there was a division, that William Watts did not, during his lifetime, reduce to possession that portion of the land which his wife received under the division. William Watts and Sarah Hall were coexecutors of the will of James Hall. All of his land was devised to Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts jointly. There was no provision in the will which defeated the marital rights of William Watts. After the death of James Hall Sarah Hall took possession of a portion of the land, and she continued in possession of this portion until her death, which occurred in 1866, working the same with her own slaves during the existence of slavery, and with hands employed by her thereafter, and, so far as the record discloses, appropriating to her own use the crops made thereon. The other portion of the land, which is the land now in dispute, was worked by William Watts with his own slaves up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1852; James Hall having died in 1840. Neither William Watts nor Sarah Hall, the coexecutors of the estate of James Hall, was ever discharged from the trust. The records of the court of ordinary showing an account of the sale of the perishable property of the estate of James Hall and a tract of land in Lee county, and one return setting forth the receipts and disbursements, were introduced in evidence. There is nothing in the record of the court of ordinary disclosing either a division of the lands in Hancock county, where the land in dispute is situated, or a sale of the same by the executors. The evidence relied upon to establish a division of the land between Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts, as legatees under the will of James Hall, is that Sarah Hall was in possession of one part of it and William Watts in possession of another part of it. Each of these parties had a right to possession in the capacity of legal representative of the estate of James Hall. They could jointly possess the land as executors, or one could take possession of a part as executor and the other of another part. The mere fact of possession would not be conclusive of the right in which the possession was held. The presumption would be, until the contrary appeared, that they were in possession in their representative capacity; and the burden is upon the plaintiff in the present case to show that the possession was not in such a capacity, which would be legal and regular, in the absence of proof of a division of the estate between the legatees.

The evidence as to a division of the land between the legatees depends upon the testimony of aged negroes, who were the slaves of William Watts. While a reading of the testimony of these negroes impresses one with the fact that they are endeavoring to tell the truth as they recall it, the testimony at best simply establishes the fact that the crops raised upon one part of the land were appropriated by Sarah Hall, and the crops raised upon another part were appropriated by William Watts. This would probably be sufficient to show that William Watts had reduced the crops to possession, and to that extent had taken advantage of his marital rights; but as it was possible for him to be in possession of the land as executor, and assert his right to reduce the property of his wife to possession simply as to the crops, the burden is upon the plaintiffs to show by satisfactory evidence that the land was actually divided between the legatees, and that the possession was in his own right, and not in his right as executor of the will of James Hall. The evidence might possibly be sufficient to authorize a finding that there was a division between Sarah Hall and Nancy Watts, as legatees under the will of James Hall, and that the executor had assented to this division, and took possession of the land in dispute by virtue of his marital rights. But the evidence is not of such a character as to authorize us to say that the jury was constrained to find that this was the fact. It is more than possible—is is even probable—that there was an agreement between the two executors that each should hold a portion of the land in their representative capacity, and that each should not be accountable to the other for the crops raised upon the land. The burden being upon the plaintiff to show the fact of a division, and the evidence upon this point being altogether unsatisfactory, and the jury having found that there was no division, and this finding having been approved by the trial court, we do not feel authorized to control his discretion in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

BURNETT v. W. A. DAVIS & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. USURY—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

The essential requirements of a plea of usury, where the usury is sought to be recovered back or set off, being prescribed by statute, any defect in such a plea which results in a failure to comply with the statutory requirements is a defect in substance, and may be taken advantage of by a general demurrer in writing or an oral motion to strike.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Usury, § 280.]

2. BILLS AND NOTES—PLEA—SUFFICIENCY.

The plea which set forth that the amount sued for was larger than that really due, as a result of a mutual mistake of the parties, was sufficient, as against the demurrer filed thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 504.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robert Hodges, Judge.

Action by W. A. Davis & Company against J. R. Burnett and one Brown. Judgment for plaintiff, and Burnett brings error. Reversed.

W. A. Davis & Co. brought suit upon a promissory note against Burnett and Brown. Burnett filed an answer at the appearance term, in which he admitted the execution of the note, but alleged that he had executed it under a mistake, and that the amount of his indebtedness was less than the amount of the note. Plaintiff demurred to the answer on the ground that it set out no legal defense, and demurred specially to various paragraphs therein. Burnett then filed an amendment to his answer, more specifically setting out his plea of mistake. During the trial term the defendant further amended his answer by a plea of usury as to a part of the indebtedness sued on. The demurrer was sustained, and the answer and amendnments were stricken, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. Burnett excepted.

J. P. Burnett and Steed & Ryals, for plaintiff in error. Hardeman & Jones, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. The first amendment filed by the defendant was verified as to the facts therein set forth, but the affidavit did not conform to the other requirements of the act of 1897. Acts 1897, p. 35. The second amendment was verified in strict conformity to the act above referred to. It does not appear from the record that the judge disallowed either of the amendments, but it would seem that he allowed the amendments and then struck the plea as amended, as insufficient in law. The order, after reciting that the defendant had offered two amendments to his plea, and that the plaintiff insisted "upon his demurrer thereto," proceeded to declare that the demurrers were sustained, and that the plea and amendments "are all hereby stricken." The only demurrer contained in the record is a demurrer filed to the original plea, which is broad enough in its terms to raise objections to the plea as amended. In addition to this, the original plea put the plaintiff upon notice that the defendant relied upon a mistake, but the plea was defective, in that it did not allege that the mistake was mutual, and in other respects. The first amendment merely amplified the plea, and cured some of the defects therein, and was therefore not an amendment which is required to be verified in the manner prescribed by the act of 1897. See Conant v. Jones, 120 Ga. 568, 48 S. E. 234 (2). We will therefore deal with the case as the judge seems to have dealt with it, by determining whether the pleas were good in substance. The requirements of a plea of usury, where the purpose of the plea is either to recover back usury paid or set off the same against the plaintiff's demand, are fixed by statute. Civ. Code 1895, § 5090. The purpose of this statute is to require the defense of usury to be so pleaded that the amount that is sought to be recovered or set off may be determined accurately from the allegations in the plea, without aid from extraneous sources. Any defect, therefore, in such a plea, which would prevent the determination of the amount, would be a defect in substance, and can be taken advantage of by a general demurrer in writing or an oral motion to strike. When this test is applied to that portion of the plea which is relied upon as a plea of usury, it is at once seen that the plea is defective, if for no other reason than that there were in the plea blanks as to the date and maturity of some of the notes. Without these blanks being filled, of course, the amount of usury could not be calculated. As to the effect of blanks in a plea of usury, see the remarks of Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley in Odom v. New England Mortgage Co., 91 Ga. 508, 18 S. E. 131 (2). The plea of usury was, therefore, properly stricken.

2. As to the other plea, the facts alleged are sufficient to show that there was a mutual mistake between the parties as to the amount due at the time that the note sued on was given, and the plea was good in substance. Even if, as contended, the plea is contradictory as to the sum represented by the mistake, this would not make the plea bad, in the absence of a special demurrer raising that objection. If no amendment were made to such a plea, the defendant might be held to the least amount set forth. Counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief state that the plea was really stricken upon the ground that, being an equitable plea in its nature calling for affirmative relief, the city court had no jurisdiction to entertain it. There is nothing in the record to indicate that this point was made in the court below, nor does it appear that the judge struck the plea of mistake for this reason, nor does counsel for defendant in error seek to uphold the judgment on this ground. Of course, if this is true, the court would have no jurisdiction, and the judgment would be affirmed without reference to the ground upon which the judge based it. But we think the city court has jurisdiction of such a plea. A city court has jurisdiction to entertain an equitable plea which is purely defensive in its nature, and which, if sustained, would result simply in a verdict finding generally in favor of the defendant, or reducing the amount of plaintiff's recovery, when such reduction is not brought about by the exercise of any of the extraordinary powers of a court of equity, such as cancellation, reformation, equitable set-off, and the like. See Hecht v. Snook & Austin Co., 114 Ga. 927, 41 S. E. 74; House v. Oliver, 123 Ga. 784, 51 S. E. 722.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

(140 N. C. 381)

BOND et al. v. BRANNING MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 27, 1906.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—INSTRUCTIONS—INAPPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

In an action to vacate and void a deed, a charge "that it requires more mental capacity to execute a deed than a will," and defining the capacity necessary to execute a will, suggests an abstract and collateral question not involved in the issues on trial, and may be refused without error.

2. DEED—VALIDITY—MENTAL CAPACITY OF GRANTOR.

To execute either a will or a deed the party must have sufficient mental capacity to understand what property he is disposing of, the person to whom he is giving or selling it, and the purpose for which he is disposing of it, the question involved in either case being one of fact, and it cannot be affirmed as a proposition of law that it requires more mental capacity to execute a deed than a will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 144, 155; vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 66-68.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Long, Judge.

Action by Stewart Bond and others against the Branning Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Action to vacate and avoid a deed made by the ancestor of plaintiffs to defendant John Darden, who thereafter conveyed the land and timber on the land to defendant, Branning Manufacturing Company. Plaintiffs urged mental incapacity on the part of the grantor and undue influence by the defendant grantee. By consent the issue in regard to the second cause of action was answered in the negative. The jury answered the other issues for the defendant. Judgment and appeal by plaintiffs.

St. Leon Scull, for appellants. Winston & Matthews, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. But two exceptions were urged in this court. The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury: "It requires more mental capacity to execute a deed than a will, and while it is sufficient proof to show that a person knows the nature of the property he undertakes to will away, and to whom he wills it, that amount of mental capacity alone will not be sufficient in a person undertaking to execute a deed." His honor declined to give the instruction, and the plaintiff excepted.

There are several objections to the instruction. There was no issue involving the several degrees of mental capacity suggested. No will had been made, nor was there any effort to set up a will by setting aside a deed. It would not aid a jury who were inquiring in respect to the capacity to make the deed in controversy to inquire into an entirely collateral question. It is true, as contended by defendant's counsel in his well-prepared brief, that courts have used the expression that it required less mental capacity to make a valid will than a deed. We find, however, by a careful examination of the cases cited, that the expression has been used upon trials of an issue devisavit vel non, and as illustrative of the capacity requisite to the execution of a will, rather than the announcement of a principal of law. In the cases cited from West Virginia the instruction was given and sustained. We find no case in which it has been held error to refuse to give it. It was entirely competent for counsel to argue the proposition as illustrative of the degree of capacity necessary to the execution of a will, but we cannot see how it would, if established and accepted by the jury as correct, aid them in answering the question propounded, whether the grantor had sufficient capacity to execute the deed to the defendant. It is elementary that instructions involving abstract propositions of law, having no reasonable connection with or bearing upon the testimony, should not be given, and that it is not error to refuse such instruction. It is by no means clear that the expression, carefully considered, is correct. To execute either a will or a deed, it is abundantly established that the party must have sufficient mental capacity to understand what property he is disposing of, the person to whom he is giving or selling, and the purpose for which he is disposing of the property. In Smith v. Beatty, 37 N. C. 456, 40 Am. Dec. 435, it is said: "Weakness of mind alone, without fraud, does not appear to be a sufficient ground to invalidate an instrument. It is said that a court of equity will not measure the size of people's understandings. Excessive old age, with weakness of mind, may be a ground for setting aside a conveyance obtained under such circumstances. But old age alone, without some proof of fraud, will not invalidate a transaction." Rippy v. Gant, 39 N. C. 443; Suttles v. Hay, 41 N. C. 124. These were cases in which it was sought to set aside deeds. We are unable to see any good reason why a different standard of mental capacity should be established for the execution of a will and a deed. It is apparent that a court would scrutinize with more care and hold the grantee to a stricter account to show fair dealing, or rebut any presumption of undue influence, than a devisee, but in the ultimate decision of the question of capacity the standard is or should be the same—was the execution of the paper the free, voluntary act and deed of the party, knowing what he was doing?

The question of undue influence or fraud is eliminated by the consent of the plaintiff to the answer of the issue upon that question. The sole question is one of fact—whether at the time the grantor executed the deed he had sufficient mental capacity to understand what he was doing. This is the standard laid down by this court in Horne v. Horne, 31 N. C. 99; Lawrence v. Steel, 66 N. C. 584. In Paine v. Roberts, 82 N. C. 451, Smith, C. J., said that the standard fixed by the law was that the party "knows what he is about." We are not cited to any case in which this court has made or recognized the distinction. On the contrary, our investigation discloses a clear rejection of it in Barnhardt v. Smith, 86 N. C. 473, in which Smith, C. J., says: "The rule laid down by Lord Coke 'that the person must be able to understand what he is about,' approved in Moffit v. Witherspoon, 32 N. C. 185, Horne v. Horne, 81 N. C. 99, and more recently in Paine v. Roberts, 82 N. C. 451, as a general and practical rule for the guidance of juries, approximates an accurate statement of the law as to the degree of mental capacity required to make a valid disposition of property as the subject will admit." This case involved the validity of a deed. Bost v. Bost, 87 N. C. 477; Horah v. Knox, Id. 483; Williams v. Hald, 118 N. C. 481, 24 S. E. 217; Cameron-Barkley Co. v. Power Co., 138 N. C. 365, 50 S. E. 695.

There was no error in refusing the plaintiff's prayer. The exception to the instruction given was not pressed. We have examined it and find that it is in strict accordance with the settled law of this state. The grantor provided for the payment of a mortgage indebtedness which was outstanding and threatening to deprive him of his home. He also provided for the support of himself and his wife. There is no suggestion that the grantee did not fully discharge his duty in the matter.

The judgment must be affirmed.
Affirmed.

KNOWLES v. SAVAGE, SON & CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 27, 1906.)

1. FACTORS—NEGLIGENCE—FINDINGS.

In an action against a commission merchant to whom plaintiff sent a quantity of peanuts for storage and sale, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that defendant failed to properly store and care for the nuts.

2. NEW TRIAL—TIME FOR APPLICATION.

A motion to set aside a verdict for insufficient evidence must be made before the judge who tried the cause at the same term at which the trial was had.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 239.]

3. JUDGES—SIGNING JUDGMENT.

If for any reason the signing of a judgment is omitted, it can be done at a succeeding term.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, § 555.]

4. STIPULATIONS—EFFECT.

An agreement between the parties empowering the judge to sign the judgment after adjournment of the term did not authorize the judge to hear and determine a motion to set aside the verdict after such adjournment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by A. T. Knowles against Savage, Son & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Rodman, for appellant. Ward & Grimes, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. Plaintiff shipped to defendant, commission merchant, in Norfolk, a quantity of peanuts for storage and sale. Plaintiff alleged that he negligently failed to store and sell the peanuts, by reason whereof he sustained damage. The defendant upon conclusion of the evidence moved for judgment of nonsuit. The motion being denied, defendant excepted. The court submitted the cause to the jury under instructions to which there was no exception. There was evidence on behalf of the plaintiff that the peanuts were in good condition when delivered to defendants, and that they were dry and cured. The evidence in this respect was conflicting. His honor's instruction to the jury in regard to the degree of care required to be exercised by the defendant is not set out; there being no exception thereto. The defendant contends that there was no evidence of negligent storage by him. It must be conceded that, if the jury had credited the testimony offered by defendant, it fully exonerated him from any liability. The plaintiff's testimony, on the contrary, which was accepted by the jury, showed that the peanuts were in good condition when shipped to defendants on January 2, 1904, and plaintiff testified that, "if they had been properly stored and cared for, they would have remained in same condition as when received by him." It seems from the correspondence that on or about January 25, 1904, defendant made sale of the peanuts to be delivered in 10 days, and that, when he undertook to deliver them, they were found to be "thoroughly mixed with peanuts that were not merchantable. There were some good ones in them, and it looked as if they were mixed with rotten ones." This is the testimony of the part of defendant of the purchaser who rejected them. The motion to nonsuit was, of course, based upon the admission that the plaintiff's evidence was all true and must be so considered by us. There was an irreconcilable conflict, and the jury alone could settle the controversy. We cannot say that there was an absence of evidence from which the jury could not have reasonably drawn the conclusion that the defendant had failed in the discharge of his duty to safely store and care for the property. We must assume, in the absence of any suggestion to the contrary, that his honor correctly instructed the jury in regard to the measure of duty imposed upon the defendant. The record states: That counsel, desiring to leave the court pending the deliberation of the jury, agreed that upon the return of the verdict the judge could sign judgment "out of term." That neither of the counsel were present at the rendition of the verdict. The court announced from the bench that it would set the verdict aside if any one was present to make the motion. That while the judge was in another county counsel, by letter, requested him to set the verdict aside, which he declined, because, in his opinion, he had no power to do so after the expiration of the term.

From a judgment upon the verdict defendant appealed, assigning as error the refusal of the court to grant his motion to nonsuit plaintiff, and the refusal to set the verdict aside. Neither exception can be sustained. It is conceded that a motion to set aside the verdict for insufficient evidence must be made before the judge who tried the case upon his minutes and at the same term at which the trial is had. Revisal 1905, 554; Moore v. Hinnant, 90 N. C. 163. It is equally clear that, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the judge has no power to sign a judgment out of term. The defendant contends that the agreement empowering the judge to sign the judgment after adjournment included the form to hear and determine the motion to set the verdict aside. We do not concur in this view. Such is not a reasonable construction of the agreement. Signing the judgment involved no judicial discretion or ruling. This, if omitted for any reason, could be done at a succeeding term. Ferrell v. Hales, 119 N. C. 199, 25 S. E. 821. Hearing and determining a motion to set the verdict aside is quite another matter, involving recollection of the testimony, manner and demeanor of witness, and other incidents of the trial not likely to be impressed upon the memory of the judge that he may safely act upon them after adjournment. While convenience of counsel often occasion and usually justify outside agreements of the character made in this case, they frequently lead to confusion and irregularity in the administration of justice. The courts will not by construction extend their terms beyond the fair and reasonable import of the language used. We concur with his honor that he had no power after the adjournment of the term to hear and pass upon the motion.

The judgment must be affirmed.

(140 N. C. 393)

CORBETT BUGGY CO. v. DUKES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 27, 1906.)

1. TROVER AND CONVERSION — PROCEEDS OF GOODS — FAILURE TO RETURN NOTES FOR PRICE—EFFECT.

Where complaint for conversion claimed the proceeds of buggies alleged to have been delivered to defendant under a contract binding him to hold the proceeds subject to the order of plaintiff, and set out the contract, the delivery of the buggies to defendant, and the execution of notes by him for the price, and defendant merely denied receiving the buggies under the contract alleged without making any point of plaintiff's failure to tender the notes, the failure of plaintiff to tender the notes before bringing suit was not in issue.

2. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—CORRECTION OF ERRONEOUS CHARGE.

Where, in an action for the conversion of the proceeds of buggies delivered to defendant under contract binding him to hold the proceeds subject to the order of plaintiff, defendant alleged that the buggies were delivered under a subsequent verbal contract unaccompanied by any fiduciary relation, and the court charged that plaintiff insisted that defendant's claim of a new contract was unreasonable because he had come to trial without the new contract and without serving notice on plaintiff to produce it, the action of court, in recalling the jury and withdrawing the charge and correcting the wrong impression made by reason of the court's misapprehension of the fact that the alleged new contract was oral, was not prejudicial to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Peeble, Judge.

Action by the Corbett Buggy Company against H. T. Dukes. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On September 28, 1901, defendant entered into a contract with plaintiff corporation in writing, the terms of which were: "It is agreed that all goods shipped on this contract, and also all other goods hereafter shipped to the maker of this contract, are consigned and the said goods and proceeds of sales of goods received under this contract, whether in cash, notes, book accounts or other proceeds, are to be held in trust and subject to the order of the Corbett Buggy Company. No agreement, verbal or otherwise, is binding on the Corbett Buggy Company, unless embodied in this contract." At the time of the execution of the contract, three buggies were delivered to defendant which were paid for. Afterwards plaintiff alleges other buggies were delivered to him upon and pursuant to the terms of the contract, for the price of which he executed his notes. Plaintiff alleged that defendant had disposed of the buggies so delivered, and received therefor the sum of $521.97, which he had converted to his own use. Defendant admitted the delivery of the buggies, but denied that they were delivered or received under or upon the terms of the contract. That, after the first three buggies were shipped, a new verbal contract was made, and that thereafter all buggies were delivered pursuant to such new contract, unaccompanied by any trust or fiduciary relation, etc. That the notes were executed for the purchase price of said buggies. He tendered to plaintiff judgment for the amount due on the notes. The jury, upon an issue submitted, upon the controverted allegation, found that defendant received the buggies for the price of which the notes were given on consignment under the terms of the contract to account to plaintiff for the proceeds of the buggies. His honor rendered judgment for amount found to be due and directed execution against the person of defendant, etc. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Winbourne & Lawrence, for appellant. J. R. Mitchell and F. D. Winston, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts). Two exceptions to his honor's ruling were argued in this court. Defendant contends that, conceding the fact to be as found by the jury, the acceptance by plaintiff of the promissory notes for the price of the buggies merged the original cause of action, or at least suspended it until the notes are returned or tendered at the trial. That plaintiff cannot retain his promissory negotiable notes, and at the same time prosecute an action against him for the recovery of the amount received by him as his agent. This exception was raised by a request to charge the jury. The issue did not involve the controverted proposition; it was directed simply to the question of fact respecting the capacity in which, or the contract under which, the buggies were delivered and received. The question is, however, presented upon the admitted facts considered in connection with the verdict. It is true, as contended by defendant, that the acceptance of a negotiable security for an open account suspends the right of action until the maturity of the note, and then, if the plaintiff will resort to his original cause of action, he must surrender the security. The acceptance of the promissory note, unless expressly so agreed upon, will not discharge the original cause of action. The law is well stated in Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) 435: "In such a case the position of the parties is that the payer, having certain rights against the other party, under a contract, has agreed to take the instrument from him instead of immediate payment of what is due him, or immediate enforcement of his right of action, and the other party, in giving the instrument, has thus far satisfied the payer's claim, but, if the instrument is not paid at maturity, the consideration of the payer's promise fails, and his original rights are restored to him. The effect of receiving a negotiable instrument conditionally is merely to suspend the right to sue on the original contract until the instrument matures, and, when it matures, and is not paid, to give the right to sue either on it or on the original contract." Norton, Bills & Notes (3d Ed.) 20; Gordon v. Price, 32 N. C. 385. The complaint sets out the entire transaction, and defendant makes no point of the fact that his promissory notes are not tendered. He simply denies that he received the buggies upon the contract—the jury have found the issue against him.

In summing up the arguments of counsel for plaintiff, the court told the jury that plaintiff insisted that defendant's statement that he had another and different contract from the one introduced by plaintiff was unreasonable, for the reason that he had come to trial without such contract and without serving notice on plaintiff to produce it, etc. After the jury retired, plaintiff's counsel called the attention of the court to the fact that in his answer defendant had said that the new contract was in parol. The court caused the jury to be brought back and told them that he withdrew so much of the charge as related to the failure of defendant to produce the new written contract or to serve notice on plaintiff to produce it, and that the same should have no influence whatever on their verdict. No exception was taken to this at the time, or until the case on appeal was made out. Waiving the objection that no exception was made at the time, we are unable to perceive how the defendant could have been prejudiced by his honor's action. He had been misled as to the form of defendant's alleged contract and simply removed any impression made on the mind of the jury by reason of such misapprehension. There is no merit in the exception.

The judgment must be affirmed.

(140 N. C. 209)

COOPER v. NORTH CAROLINA R. CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSING.

Both the railroad when approaching a public crossing and the traveler on the highway are charged with the mutual duty of keeping a careful lookout for danger, and the degree of diligence to be used on either side is such as a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances of the case in endeavoring to perform his duty.

2. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY OF TRAVELER.

In an action for damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate, an instruction that relieved the traveler of all obligation to look and listen when there had been a failure on the part of the defendant to give the ordinary signals, where there was evidence tending to show that there was an unobstructed view, is erroneous, and the fact that the court in other portions of the charge imposed on the plaintiff the obligation to look and listen whenever the view was unobstructed does not help the matter.

3. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Evidence tending to show that the intestate was in a covered wagon and that he drove on the crossing without any stop whatever and with the wagon cover down on the side from which the train approached, and at a point just on the edge of the wagon road and 13 feet from the center of the railroad track one could see down the track from 500 to 1,200 feet, in the direction from which the trains approached, was sufficient for the consideration of the jury on the issue of contributory negligence.

4. SAME—SIGNALS—DUTY TO LOOK AND LISTEN.

A traveler on the highway, before crossing a railroad track, as a general rule, is required to look and listen to ascertain whether a train is approaching; and the mere omission of the trainmen to give the ordinary or statutory signals will not relieve him of this duty.

5. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where the view is unobstructed, a traveler who attempts to cross a railroad track under ordinary and usual conditions without first looking, when by doing so he could note the approach of a train in time to save himself by reasonable effort, is guilty of contributory negligence.

6. SAME—OBSTRUCTED VIEW.

Where the view is obstructed, a traveler may ordinarily rely upon his sense of hearing, and if he does listen, and is induced to enter on a public crossing because of the negligent failure of the company to give the ordinary signals, this will usually be attributed to the failure of the company to warn the traveler of the danger, and not imputed to him for contributory negligence.

7. SAME.

There may be certain qualifying facts and conditions which so complicate the question of contributory negligence that it becomes one for the jury, even though there has been a failure to look or listen, and a traveler may in exceptional instances be relieved of these duties altogether, as when gates are open or signals given by a watchman and the traveler enters on the crossing reasonably relying upon the assurance of safety.

8. DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES.

In an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate, plaintiff's inventory of the personal property of her intestate and her annual account as administratrix are inadmissible for the purpose of showing intestate's capacity to earn and accumulate money.

Clark, C. J., and Connor, J., dissenting.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Caswell County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Mary W. Cooper, as administratrix, etc., against the North Carolina Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Action to recover damages for alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. The ordinary issues in such actions were submitted. There was evidence of plaintiff tending to show that intestate was killed in attempting to drive his wagon over defendant's road at a public crossing, and by reason of the negligent failure on the part of defendant in giving the ordinary and usual signals at crossings, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. There was evidence of defendant tending to show that the ordinary and usual signals were given, and that the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence in driving on the crossing without having looked and listened for an approaching train, and when, if he had looked, the approach of the train might have been seen in time to have avoided the collision and prevented the death of the intestate. In response to prayer for instructions by plaintiff, the court on the issue as to contributory negligence charged the jury as follows: "Fourth. It is the duty of a railroad company to give the public due notice of the approach of its trains to a public crossing so that travelers may stop their teams, if necessary, and stay off the crossing until the train has passed. The train, if it gives the proper warning of its approach, and the railroad company is not otherwise at fault, is entitled to the right of way in preference to a traveler on the highway. The traveler has the right to expect such warning to be given to him, and he must look and listen when approaching a crossing, and his failure to look and listen when such warning is given is negligence, and, if such failure should cause his death, no recovery could be had for it. But, when the train does not give timely warning and reasonable warning of its coming, it is not contributory negligence in a traveler to go upon the track without looking and listening for the approach of a train, if he exercises that prudence and care which a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances, and, if the injury resulting is attributable to the negligence of the railroad company in failing to give the signals, for such failure would be deemed the proximate cause of the injury, if the jury should find from the evidence that with proper warning the traveler would not have attempted to cross. Therefore, if from the evidence you find that the railroad company failed to give timely warning of its approach to the crossing, by sounding the whistle or ringing the bell, and also find that the plaintiff's intestate went upon the crossing without looking and listening, his failure to look and listen under such circumstances would not be the proximate cause of his death, if, with the proper warning, he would not have gone upon the track, and if from the evidence you find such to be the facts, you will answer the second issue 'No'; that is, that the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence." To this charge the defendant duly noted an exception. The court in substance repeated this statement in its direct charge to the jury. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Manly & Hendren, for appellant. Kitchin & Carlton, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case). The first portion of the instruction above quoted, which states the obligation on the railroad to give adequate warning when approaching a public crossing and the obligation on the traveler to look and listen in like case, is correct. As stated in Improvement Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. Ed. 403: "Both parties are charged with the mutual duty of keeping a careful lookout for danger, and the degree of diligence to be used on either side is such as a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances of the case in endeavoring to perform his duty." The remaining portion of the instruction, however, addressed more particularly to the feature of contributory negligence, by fair and reasonable intendment can only mean that, though a traveler in approaching a railroad track is required to look and listen, yet this obligation is not upon him, nor will the consequence be imputed to him, if he failed to look and listen when such failure was caused by the negligent failure of the railroad train to give the necessary signals; and this where there was evidence tending to show that, if he had looked, he could have seen the approaching train in time to have avoided the collision, or at least to have saved himself by the exercise of reasonable effort. In this we think there was error which entitles the defendant to a new trial. It relieves the traveler of all obligation to look and listen when there is a failure on the part of the defendant to give the usual and ordinary signals, and places the entire responsibility for such a collision on the railroad company. It would, in effect, practically eliminate the defense of contributory negligence when there had been a negligent failure to give the warning; for ordinarily it is only by looking and listening that a traveler can inform himself of dangerous conditions. This is not a just principle by which the rights of parties in cases like the present should be determined, nor is it supported by any well-considered authority. The general rule is well stated in Beach on Contributory Negligence, as follows: "In attempting to cross, the traveler must look and listen for signals, notice signs put up as warnings, and look attentively up and down the track, and a failure to do so is contributory negligence, which will bar a recovery. A multitude of decisions of all the courts enforce this reasonable rule. It is also consonant with right reason and the dictates of ordinary prudence, and so much in line with the ordinary care which the average of mankind display in the daily routine of life that it would seem to be scarcely dependent upon the authority of decided cases in the law courts. As a general rule, the omission of the traveler to look and listen is so clearly a want of ordinary care that it constitutes contributory negligence as a matter of law, but it cannot be said that such failure will always defeat a recovery, for circumstances may and sometimes do exist which excuse the omission." And the rule so stated is in accord with the decisions in this and other jurisdictions. Randall v. Railroad, 104 N. C. 410, 10 S. E. 691; Mayes v. Railroad, 119 N. C. 758, 26 S. E. 148; Mesic v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 490, 26 S. E. 633; Laverenz v. Railroad, 56 Iowa, 689, 10 N. W. 268; Nixon v. Railroad, 84 Iowa, 331, 51 N. W. 157; Davis v. Railroad, 47 N. Y. 400; Rodrian v. Railroad, 125 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 741; Bonnell v. Railroad, 39 N. J. Law, 189.

The rule is so just in itself, and so generally enforced as controlling, that citation of authority is hardly required. But, as the matter has been very earnestly debated, it is considered well to quote from some of the decisions illustrative of the obligation on the traveler to look and listen, and some of the exceptions where its violation was not held contributory negligence as a matter of law. In Randall's Case, supra, it is held to be the duty of a person approaching a railroad track to take every prudent precaution to avoid a collision, and it is the duty of the engineer to sound the whistle or ring the bell at a reasonable distance from the crossing in order to enable travelers to avoid danger. In Mayes' Case (Clark, J., delivering the opinion) it is held to be the duty of one approaching a railroad crossing to use ordinary and reasonable care to avoid accident, and to exercise his senses of hearing and sight to keep a lookout for an approaching train; and, if he does not do so, but drives inattentively upon the track without keeping a lookout or listening for approaching trains, and injury results, he is ordinarily, but not in all cases, guilty of contributory negligence. In Mesic's Case, Mr. Justice Montgomery, speaking for the court, said: "The rule is general and usual that, whenever an approach to a public crossing over a railroad is made by any one in charge of a wagon and team, such person is bound to look and listen for approaching trains and take every proper precaution to avoid a collision; and this is so, even though the approach be made at a time when no regular train is expected to pass; and in case the driver fails to look and listen and to take proper precaution to avoid a collision, and one does occur, the plaintiff cannot recover, even though the defendant was negligent in the first instance." In Laverenz's Case, supra, it is held to be the rule that a person who voluntarily goes on a railroad track at a point where there is an unobstructed view of the track, and fails to look or listen for danger, cannot recover for an injury which might have been avoided by so looking and listening; but, when the view is obstructed or other facts exist which tend to complicate the question of contributory negligence, it becomes one for the jury. In Nixon's Case, supra, it is held that one who, in full possession of his senses and without having his attention diverted from any cause, passes over a railroad crossing without looking in both directions to see if there is an approaching train, is guilty of contributory negligence, and will not be entitled to recover for injuries received from a passing train, though no whistle was sounded nor bell rung from the engine, as required by law. Rothrock, J., delivering the opinion, said: "It is true there are exceptions to this rule. There may be such circumstances surrounding the traveler as that his failing to look and listen may exonerate him from the charge of contributory negligence. The traveler, for instance, may be placed without his fault in some dilemma, or some place of danger, where the exigencies of the situation and an emergency may excuse him from going on the track without looking and listening. These circumstances are so varied that they cannot be cited or commented upon in an opinion without unduly extending the subject. They involve obstructions on the track, which prevent an approaching train from being seen by the traveler, and where there are several tracks and trains running on them in different directions, and one train is obscured by another the fact that the railroad track is in a deep cut and trains cannot be seen by a traveler approaching the crossing, or trains following each other in close proximity which may serve to confuse the traveler, and numberless other circumstances from which the jury may be authorized in finding that the traveler exercised the precaution which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under the same circumstances." In Rodrian's Case, supra, it is held that a pedestrian who crosses a railroad track must, in the absence of circumstances excusing it, look in each direction and ascertain whether a train is approaching. He may not omit this in reliance upon the performance by the railroad of its duty to give reasonable notice of the approach of the train; and, if he does omit it, the neglect of the company to discharge its duty will not relieve him from the imputation of negligence; Andrews, J., further saying: "If in case of an accident at a crossing it appears that the person injured did look for an approaching train, it would not necessarily follow as a rule of law that he was remediless because he did not look at the precise place and time when and where looking would have been of some aid. Many circumstances might be shown which could properly be considered by the jury in determining whether he exercised due and reasonable care in making his observation, the presence of other imminent dangers, the raising of gates erected by the company to guard the highway, giving assurance that the crossing was safe, these and similar circumstances appearing, they may be considered in determining whether the person injured, who did in fact look and listen before attempting to cross the track, fairly discharge the duty imposed upon him, although it should appear that if he had looked at another instant of time, or had looked last in the direction from which the train was approaching, he would have seen it."

It will be observed that the circumstances which may at times excuse the failure of the traveler, who has entered on a railroad crossing, to note the approach of a train, usually arise where the view is obstructed, or in the presence of some imminent danger or emergency sufficient to divert the attention of a person of reasonable fortitude and self-possession, or where one has entered on the crossing under an express or implied invitation of the company's employees giving reasonable assurance of safety. The last instance more usually occurs at stations where a way has been left open by the company across other tracks for an approach to the station or train, or at much frequented crossings where there are gates raised, or an employe charged with the duty has satisfied the traveler that he may cross in safety, and has no application here. The general rule is that the traveler is required to look and listen for danger, and, where there is an unobstructed view, he is not relieved of the obligation by the fact that the train has failed to give the ordinary signals of its approach. The error in the above charge consists in relieving the plaintiff's intestate from all obligation to look and listen, if his not doing so was caused by the negligent failure of the defendant to give proper warnings, where there was evidence tending to show that there was an unobstructed view which would have enabled the intestate to see the train in time to have saved himself by the exercise of reasonable effort. It is submitted in support of this charge that the objectionable feature is qualified or eliminated by the use of the words "if he exercised that prudence and care which a prudent man would use under the circumstances"; and, further, "that the failure to look would not be the proximate cause of the injury, if the jury should find from the evidence that with the proper warning the traveler would not have attempted to cross," and it is argued that by reason of these qualifying words the charge may be referred to certain testimony to the effect that the view was obstructed. Unfortunately for this position, and for the intention here imputed to the judge below, he puts his own, and as we interpret it, an entirely different, construction upon these words, for in his conclusion, and just after using them, he says: "Therefore, if from the evidence you find that the railroad company failed to give timely warning of its approach to the crossing by sounding the whistle or ringing the bell, and also find that the intestate went upon the crossing without looking or listening, his failure to look and listen would not be the proximate cause of his death, if with the proper warning he would not have gone upon the track." It is true the court in several other portions of the charge imposes on the plaintiff the obligation to look and listen whenever the view was unobstructed, but this does not help the matter. Standing apart, the positions are in absolute conflict, and the only way to reconcile them and give each any significance would be to annex the erroneous proposition to the more correct one wherever the same occurs.

Again, it is contended that the burden was on the defendant to establish contributory negligence, and that there was no evidence tending to show contributory negligence sufficient for the consideration of a jury, and for this reason any error in the charge on that issue should be considered as harmless and immaterial. But this position cannot be sustained. Both the evidence on the conduct of the intestate and as to the physical conditions and placing of the occurrence are against it. There was evidence of the defendant tending to show that the intestate was in a covered wagon and that he drove on the crossing without any stop whatever, and with the wagon cover down on the side from which the train approached. Henry Flintop (on pages 38 and 39 of the record) testified that he "was in the wagon, going towards Scarlet crossing; while near a branch Cooper's wagon passed the witness and continued up the hill to the crossing; noticed the wagon of intestate nearing the railroad and wondered why they did not stop the team; Cooper was driving; the wagon sheet was down on the right side; the wagon did not slacken its speed or stop, but went right on the crossing; was looking at the wagon all the time." There was also evidence to the effect that at a point just on the edge of the wagon road and 13 feet from the center of the railroad track one could see down the railroad from 500 to 1,200 feet in the direction from which the train approached, and photographs were in evidence giving a picture of the view from that point. This was on the edge of the county road, and it may have been taken from that point in order to give the photographer an opportunity to present a picture of the county road where it approached the crossing, as well as the crossing itself. If the camera had been placed in the center or right of the county road, the view down the railroad would have been shortened some, but would still be sufficient to require that the question should be submitted to the jury as to whether the intestate could by looking have noted the train's approach in time to have saved himself by reasonable effort, and with the obligation to look upon him. There was both contradictory and impeaching testimony for the plaintiff on this question, but the defendant was entitled to have this view presented under a proper and correct charge.

We are referred, further, to several decisions in this state which it is argued are contrary to our present opinion, but none of them we think sustain the position for which they are cited. While the headnotes of the different cases may be at times too general, both these and the language of the judge delivering the opinion must be taken in connection with the facts admitted or established, or at least in evidence and assumed to be true, upon which they are predicated; and they are only to be regarded as authoritative decisions when so construed and applied. Thus, in Hinkle's Case, 109 N. C. 478, 13 S. E. 884, 28 Am. St. Rep. 581, the plaintiff testified that the plaintiff and his father were on the county road in a covered wagon, and as they traveled along the road he looked out of the wagon two or three times to see if the train was coming; and when they had gone down the hill, within about 20 yards of the crossing, he stopped the wagon and listened. The plaintiff then got on the cross-pieces of the shaft and held to the wagon with one hand while he rested the other on the horse's rump, and, as his father drove on, he looked and listened, but neither saw nor heard an approaching train. In Alexander's Case, 112 N. C. 720, 16 S. E. 896, the view of the track was shut off by cars, etc., and the ordinary noise of a moving train was deadened by the operation of an adjacent cotton factory, etc. The plaintiff testified that before attempting to cross the track he pulled up his horse and listened to hear if there was any approaching train, and, hearing no bell, he ventured on the track and was hurt; that he had heard the bell there, prior to that time, as a warning, etc. There was also an ordinance requiring trains to sound bells at crossings. In Russell's Case, 118 N. C. 1098, 24 S. E. 512, the evidence was not set out, but the writer has examined the record and finds that the plaintiff testified that he both looked and listened, and failed to see or hear any train, and drove on the track only after having done this. There was also testimony in this case to the effect that the plaintiff, who was in a buggy, had crossed one railroad track, and was between that and another which she was approaching, when the horse took fright, and her husband, who was driving, lost control over him; and, further, there were some cross-ties between the roads which may have partially obstructed the view. Here was testimony that the plaintiff both looked and listened, that the occupants of the buggy were in the presence of an emergency, and further there was evidence tending to show that the view was partially obstructed. In Norton's Case, 122 N. C. 910, 20 S. E. 886, the plaintiff stopped, looked, and listened at a distance of 90 feet from the track, the nearest point where the view was open to him, and not seeing or hearing any train, and relying on the signals he had a right to expect and which the defendant negligently failed to give, he drove on the track, and was injured by a train running at an unlawful rate of speed. Here the plaintiff had looked at the only place where looking would have availed him. In Mesic's Case, supra, the distinction here dwelt upon is adverted to by Mr. Justice Montgomery. After laying down the obligation on the traveler to look and listen, even though the railroad may have been negligent, he proceeds: "The rule, however, does not prevail where to look would be useless on account of obstructions, natural in themselves or such as had been placed by accident or design by the company's employes on their tracks, * * * and when at the same time the engineer had failed to sound the whistle or ring the bell for the crossing, and in consequence of which failure the plaintiff had been induced to go upon the track and take the risk."

In none of these cases cited and relied upon is the person injured or killed relieved of the obligation to look and listen when the proper and prudent exercise of sight or hearing would have enabled him to save himself by avoiding a collision, and a correct deduction from these and the other cases seems to be: (1) That a traveler on the highway, before crossing a railroad track, as a general rule, is required to look and listen to ascertain whether a train is approaching; and the mere omission of the trainmen to give the ordinary or statutory signals will not relieve him of this duty. (2) That, where the view is unobstructed, a traveler, who attempts to cross a railroad track under ordinary and usual conditions without first looking, when, by doing so, he could note the approach of a train in time to save himself by reasonable effort, is guilty of contributory negligence. (3) That, where the view is obstructed, a traveler may ordinarily rely upon his sense of hearing, and, if he does listen and is induced to enter on a public crossing because of the negligent failure of the company to give the ordinary signals, this will usually be attributed to the failure of the company to warn the traveler of the danger, and not imputed to him for contributory negligence. (4) There may be certain qualifying facts and conditions which so complicate the question of contributory negligence that it becomes one for the jury, even though there has been a failure to look or listen, and a traveler may, in exceptional instances, be relieved of these duties altogether as when gates are open or signals given by a watchman and the traveler enters on the crossing reasonably relying upon the assurance of safety. None of these positions, however, justify the charge given in the case, which, as stated, withdraws all obligation either to look or listen when there has been a negligent failure to give the ordinary warnings, even though there was evidence tending to show there was an unobstructed view.

There was also pressed upon our attention a ruling of the court on a question of evidence; and, as the cause goes back for a new trial, we deem it well to determine the matter. Defendant offered Exhibit A, being the plaintiff's inventory of the personal property of the deceased, and Exhibit B, being the annual account of plaintiff, as administratrix of the intestate, for the purpose of showing the intestate's capacity to earn and accumulate money. The proposed evidence was excluded by the court, and defendant excepted. If these papers should show a large estate, there are so many ways by which it could be explained otherwise than by the capacity of the deceased to accumulate money, and, if it is small, there are so many and various ways it could be accounted for, consistent with the highest capacity to earn and acquire, that these admissions, we think, would tend rather to confuse than aid the investigation and would open up a field of inquiry entirely too extensive and often foreign to the issue. We hold the papers to be irrelevant, and affirm the ruling of the trial judge on that question.

For the error in the charge above pointed out, there will be a new trial on all the issues, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). In the first part of the fourth instruction, given for the plaintiff, the court charged, upon the issue of contributory negligence, that the traveler "must look and listen when approaching a crossing, and his failure to look and listen when such warning [by the railroad] is given is negligence, and, if such failure should cause his death, no recovery could be had for it." The court then added: "But when the train does not give timely and reasonable warning of its coming, it is not contributory negligence in a traveler to go upon the track without looking and listening for the approach of a train, if he exercises that prudence and care which a prudent man would under the circumstances, and, if the injury resulting is attributable to the negligence of the railroad company in failing to give the signals, such failure would be deemed the proximate cause of the injury, if the jury should find from the evidence that with the proper warning the traveler would not have attempted to cross." This does not withdraw from the jury the duty of the traveler to look and listen, but simply leaves it to the jury to find, upon the facts of this case, whether the proximate cause of the injury was the failure of the deceased to look and listen, or was it attributable to the failure of the engineer to give a warning signal. Every instruction must be taken in connection with the context and the evidence in the case. Here, in this fourth instruction, the judge expressly told the jury that one "must look and listen when approaching a crossing"; and further he charged them, in response to the fourth request of the defendant, that, if the defendant failed to give a signal on approaching the crossing, this did not relieve the plaintiff's intestate of his duty to exercise the senses of sight and hearing and to take reasonable precautions to avoid accidents, and that, if he did so fail to use his senses, the jury should find the issue of contributory negligence "Yes," notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant in failing to give the signal. This is elaborated and more fully given in response to the defendant's prayers 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 14, which are as clear and as strong as the defendant's counsel asked or could ask, and in substance he gave that instruction to the jury no less than 10 times in the charge or in the prayers given at the request of the defendant. It is clear, not only that the judge did not eliminate the duty of the intestate to look and listen, but that there being occasions when the failure to look and listen could not contribute to the injury, as when if he had looked he could not have seen, and if he had listened he could not have heard, the judge in the above-selected paragraph of the plaintiff's fourth prayer was simply submitting to the jury (as he should have done) the question of proximate cause, whether on the facts of this case, if the deceased did not look and listen it contributed to the injury, or was such injury caused by the defendant's failure to sound the whistle or ring the bell.

The evidence was that the county road crossed the railroad where the cut was 18 to 20 feet deep. Necessarily there was a bluff which would cut off the view of the approaching train from a wagon in the road. The engineer testified that he was running 40 to 50 miles an hour. He further said, "When I was 100 yards away, I could not see the mules or the county road," and that he was only 40 or 50 yards away when he did see them. Of course, if the engineer, sitting several feet above the track, could not see the mules when 100 yards away and did not see them till 40 or 50 yards away, the deceased, who was in the wagon, down in the road and several feet behind the mules, could not see the engine that far off by reason of the same bluff. The court, therefore, properly told the jury that, if the train did not give timely warning, "it is not contributory negligence in a traveler to go upon the track without looking and listening, if he exercises that prudence and care which a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances." He had told them that prudence required the traveler ordinarily to look and listen, but in this case upon the engineer's evidence, if the intestate had looked, he could not have seen, and upon the weight of the evidence, if he had listened, he could not have heard, for 11 witnesses who were in position to hear it testified that no signal was given, and the court was favorable to the defendant in requiring that the intestate should in all cases "exercise that prudence and care which a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances." It is true a photograph is sent up in the record by the defendant, and the photographer, witness for defendant, testified that at the point where it was taken the train could be seen 1,000 feet away. But on cross-examination he says: "I did not take a picture * * * from a point where a man would be crossing the track of the road. I was 13 feet from the center of the railroad track in the outer edge of the public road." Why was it taken there, and not in the public road where the intestate must have been sitting in his wagon when the heads of his mules were at the track? The engineer's testimony and a glance at the photograph will show the reason. In the road, where the intestate was, the bluff hid him so that even his mules could not be seen by the engineer 100 yards away, and hence he could not see the engineer; whereas, on the outer edge of the public road, the angle of vision, not being cut off by the bluff, would perhaps permit a view down the railroad track for 1,000 feet. The evidence shows that the public road was 18 feet wide. The deceased sitting on the right-hand side of the wagon could not see through the bluff, but the photographer on the left-hand outer edge of that road could see down the track.

The charge was as favorable as possible to the defendant. In Mayes v. Railroad, 119 N. C. 770, 26 S. E. 149, it is said: "It is not negligence in a traveler to cross a track unless he disregards a warning in crossing which he might have seen or heard with proper care." In Russell v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1109, 24 S. E. 513, it is said: "The plaintiff had a right to expect that the company would not omit to give the usual alarm, and was not culpable for acting upon that supposition." "It is the duty of a railroad company to give reasonable and proper warning for the protection of travelers on the highway, when its trains are approaching a highway crossing, and a traveler has a right to presume that this duty will be performed and reasonable warning given." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d. Ed.) 408, citing Railroad v. Cody, 166 U. S. 606, 17 Sup. Ct. 703, 41 L. Ed. 1132, and numerous other cases. Where the view is obstructed, "the duty of the company to give notice is more imperative than at other places along its route." Id., and cases there cited in note 4. The omission to do so "is negligence per se" (Id. 416); and "the question whether the failure to ring a bell or sound a whistle was the cause of the injury sustained is a question of fact, for the determination of the jury" (Id. 417, and numerous cases cited in note 1). This was the identical question which the judge submitted to the jury in the part of the fourth instruction given for the plaintiff, which is here objected to. "Failure to stop, look, and listen is not contributory negligence per se," and is not negligence at all when the traveler could not have seen or heard. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 432, 433, with citation of numerous authorities. The judge in substance told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to ring the bell or sound the whistle for the crossing, but that, if the engineer failed to do so, this would not absolve the traveler from the duty of looking and listening, and, if the intestate failed to do so, it would be contributory negligence, unless they found that in fact the failure to look and listen could not contribute to the injury. That was correct, certainly, in this case, where, if the intestate had looked, the bluff would have prevented his seeing, and, if he had listened, he could not have heard a signal which it was testified by many was not given. The court further charged that in all cases one crossing a railroad track is required to use "that prudence and care which a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances," and there was evidence that the intestate did stop his wagon, and presumably he looked and listened. Only one witness, a colored man, testified that he did not stop, and five respectable men testified that such witness was not there on that occasion, and neither he (nor any other) testified that the deceased did not look and listen. The judge left the question of proximate cause fairly to the jury, and I see no error of which the defendant has any cause to complain. Hinkle v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 473, 13 S. E. 884, 26 Am. St. Rep. 581; Alexander v. Railroad, 112 N. C. 720, 16 S. E. 896; Russell v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1108, 24 S. E. 512; Mayes v. Railroad, 119 N. C. 758, 26 S. E. 148; Mesic v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 491, 26 S. E. 633; Norton v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 935, 29 S. E. 886. Hinkle's, Russell's, and Mayes' Cases all say that the traveler is not guilty of contributory negligence if his going upon the track is induced by the negligence of the defendant. But, suppose the jury believed Flintoff, he does not undertake to say that the intestate did not look and listen, but says that the wagon did not slacken its speed or stop. If true, was the failure to stop sufficient for the jury to reasonably infer that the intestate did not use due care, and that such failure to stop contributed as the proximate cause of his death, when no warning was given? His honor could safely have instructed the jury that there was no evidence to justify an affirmative answer to the issue of contributory negligence.

But the defendant assumes that the intestate failed to look when at a distance of 13 feet from the track, and insists that such failure was the proximate cause of the injury. This contention of the defendant was clearly stated by his honor in giving the defendant's instructions, and was found against the defendant. The evidence does not show that the intestate, when 13 feet from the track, could have seen the train. The evidence does not show that, when the intestate was 13 feet from the track, the train was 1,000 feet from the crossing. The evidence does not show that the intestate failed to look, and the evidence does not show that after the intestate could have seen the train the accident could have been avoided. On the contrary, the evidence shows that, when the intestate could have seen up the track, his mules must have been partly on the track, and that at that time the train was in 50 yards of the crossing, running nearly a mile a minute. The evidence does not show what the mules did, but they escaped, while the wagon was demolished; the engine striking its front wheels. An occupant of a wagon is about 10 feet behind the heads of his team, so that when he is within 10 feet, or even within 13 feet, of the center of the track, his mules are in the act of crossing it. It would seem unreasonable to hold that as matter of law a traveler, whose team is in the act of crossing with a fast train coming within 50 yards of him, when he could first see it, even if no excitement seized him or his mules in this sudden danger, had the opportunity thereafter and could be reasonably expected to avoid a collision.

In view of the great increase of the country in population and wealth, with the consequent vast increase of traffic, both upon the public roads, which are the inheritance of the people, and also upon the railroads operated by corporations, which are under very slight regulation by the public, the number of people killed or maimed at the crossings of public roads on the same grade by railroads running at a speed formerly unknown now amounts up into many thousands annually in this country. Throughout Europe, except, perhaps, in Russia, no railroad is permitted to cross a public road on the same grade, but must either pass under or over the public road. This avoids the vast and deplorable loss of life which occurs in this country at such crossings, and similar statutes will doubtless be enacted at no distant day in this country, when such cases as the present will cease to come before the courts. In New York, years ago, such statute was enacted, applying, however, only to crossings to be laid out thereafter. In Massachusetts and Connecticut statutes have been enacted forbidding any grade crossing whatever, and requiring all railroads within a specified time to change all crossings, so that their tracks should pass under or over the public roads. This act was held constitutional by the United States Supreme Court, affirming the Supreme Court of Connecticut, even as to existing crossings (Railroads v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 558, 14 Sup. Ct. 437, 38 L. Ed. 269) on the ground that grade crossings were a menace to public safety, and it was further held that the imposition of the entire expense of such change of grade upon the railroad company was not in violation of the Constitution of the United States. This has been cited and followed. Railroad v. Woodruff, 153 U. S. 691, 14 Sup. Ct. 976, 38 L. Ed. 869; Railroad v. Kentucky, 161 U. S. 696, 16 Sup. Ct. 714, 40 L. Ed. 849; Railroad v. Defiance, 167 U. S. 99, 17 Sup. Ct. 748, 42 L. Ed. 87; Wheeler v. Railroad, 178 U. S. 324, 20 Sup. Ct. 949, 44 L. Ed. 1085; Railroad v. McKeon, 189 U. S. 509, 23 Sup. Ct. 853, 47 L. A due regard for the safety of life and limb of our citizens who may have occasion to use the public roads will doubtless cause the statutes in this respect, enacted in New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, to be followed and enacted in other states, or, at least, will cause enactments conferring power upon the Corporation Commission to compel railroad companies to abolish grade crossings, or erect gates provided with keepers, wherever the public safety and the volume of travel on the public roads may require it. In Germany the wheel of the engine at a prescribed distance completes an electric circuit and automatically rings a gong communicator in the station. The same device applied to grade crossings would save thousands of lives annually in this country. If it were not cheaper for the railroads to pay the damages assessed for the lives and limbs destroyed at such crossings, their own pecuniary interests would require them to make such changes of grade at all public crossings, especially at those most used, without awaiting the legislation that shall require them to do so.

CONNOR, J. (dissenting). Conceding the force of the view presented in the opinion of Mr. Justice HOKE, I think that, considered as a whole, every question of law applicable to the evidence was presented to the jury in the charge. His honor said to the jury that "the traveler has the right to expect such warning to be given to him, and he must look and listen when approaching a crossing, and his failure to look and listen when such warning is given is negligence, and, if such failure should cause his death, no recovery could be had for it." He then stated the proposition in a negative form: "But, when the train does not give timely and reasonable warning of its approach, it is not contributory negligence in a traveler to go upon the track without looking and listening for the approach of the train, if he exercises that prudence and care which a prudent man would exercise under the circumstances," etc. I think that with this language, construed in the light of other portions of the charge favorable to and given in the words of the defendant's prayer, the jury could not have been misled in regard to the relative duty of the plaintiff's intestate and the defendant. Upon this view, and for the reasons and authorities cited in the opinion of the Chief Justice, I concur in the dissenting opinion that there is no reversible error. I do not care to express any opinion in regard to the weight of the testimony; nor do I think that the other questions discussed are presented by the record. They are not "matters of law or legal inference," and I do not care to express any opinion in regard to them.

SHERRILL v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff was employed by contract to construct a union depot for defendant and another railroad at a junction; his duty requiring him to work almost on the track, and frequently requiring him to be on and across it. While so engaged, he was run over by defendant's engine, which came upon him without giving the warning required by custom and rules of the company. Plaintiff had just looked both ways and listened without seeing any train on defendant's track, when he started to walk a short distance across the same, and within five or six seconds from the time he looked was struck and injured. Held, that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to look a second time just prior to his stepping onto the track.

Appeal from Superior Court, Catawba County; Council, Judge.

Action by A. H. Sherrill against the Southern Railway Company. At the close of plaintiff's case, the court directed a nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action for personal injuries, caused by alleged negligence of defendant. The ordinary issues were raised by the pleadings. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was at the time of the injury engaged in superintending the construction of a union depot at Helena, Ga., for the defendant and the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. The tracks of the two railroads crossed each other at right angles, and the depot was being constructed in one of the angles and within a few feet of the tracks, and within the yard limits of the defendant at that point. The plaintiff's duties required him to cross and recross the defendant's track at frequent intervals in order to properly superintend the construction of the work. The depot which was being built had two fronts, one facing the track of the defendant, and the other the track of the Seaboard. The defendant's employes were accustomed to give warning of the approach of the trains at this point by sounding the whistle and ringing the bell, and the rules of the company required that adequate warning should be given. On the occasion when the plaintiff was injured, no warning of any kind was given, and the plaintiff, in endeavoring to cross the track, was struck by one of the defendant's trains and severely injured. The plaintiff, who was the only witness examined, speaking to the main features of the charge, testified as follows: "I was setting door and window frames. After I got them set, I stepped across the Southern, and walked up and down to see if the frames were level. There was a belt over the doors and windows, running around the whole building, and the frames had to be on line at the top. I stepped across and walked up and down the platform to see if these frames were on a line. I had to get off to do this, and could not have done it properly any other way. The Seaboard train was standing across the Southern, and I walked to the side of the depot on the Seaboard line, and cautioned the men about letting blocks of timber fall from the building. I pulled out a piece of scantling 4x6 that had fallen from the building and walked back across the Southern on to the platform, and gave a few steps, and the Seaboard train was then pulling out. I made straight back to my men. I don't think I walked over 15 feet. I walked straight to the men across the road, and the engine of the Southern caught me. I had no notice or knowledge of the presence of the engine until I was struck. I did not hear the ringing of the bell, nor a signal of any kind. It was not more than half a minute. I looked and saw the Seaboard train, just started, and was about stepping across the road. I don't think I walked more than 15 feet when the engine struck me. I cannot tell at what speed the engine was running. It was all done so quick I could not see. I was walking right fast. When I started down the Southern the last time, returning to my men, I looked back and the Seaboard was on the crossing, moving off. I looked both ways and there was nothing there. I looked both ways and did not hear anything. I heard nothing. I heard the rumbling of no car and no whistle. I was using every precaution I could." On cross-examination he stated that, when he started down the Southern track the last time, he was 10 or 12 feet from the Seaboard track, and looked both ways. He then walked nearly 30 feet before he undertook to cross, or something like 20 feet, and did not look back again. He walked down the track and stepped over, and that, if he had looked just as he stepped on the track, he could have seen the train which struck him, and that he was not struck just as he stepped on the track, but just as he was making the last step off the track. At the close of the testimony, on motion, the court directed a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

W. C. Feimster and M. H. Yount, for appellant. S. J. Ervin, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case). We have held in Cooper v. Railroad (at this term) 52 S. E. 932, that one who enters on a public railroad crossing is required to look and listen, and when he fails in this duty and is injured in consequence, the view being unobstructed, under all ordinary conditions, such person is guilty of contributory negligence. It is further held that, negligence having been first established, facts and attendant circumstances may so qualify this obligation to look and listen as to require the question of contributory negligence to be submitted to the jury, and in some instances the obligation to look and listen may be altogether removed. The principle, with its limitations, applies, we think, with peculiar force to those persons whose duties, by contract relation with the railroad company, call them to work on or upon the railroad tracks, or frequently to cross the same, and is sustained by abundant authority. Cooper's Case, supra; Erickson v. Railroad, 41 Minn. 500, 43 N. W. 332, 5 L. R. A. 786; Shearman & Redf. on Neg. § 476; Laverenz v. Railroad, 56 Iowa, 689, 10 N. W. 268; Nixon v. Railroad, 84 Iowa, 331, 51 N. W. 157; Rodrian v. Railroad, 125 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 741; Jennings v. Railroad, 112 Mo. 268, 20 S. W. 490. In Shearman & Redfield, supra, it is said: "A traveler must look in every direction, * * * but circumstances may excuse him from looking more than once. There is no arbitrary rule requiring him to look constantly." In Rodrian's Case, supra, Agnew, J. said (quoted, also, in Cooper's Case, supra): "But, where one has looked for an approaching train, it would not necessarily follow as a rule of law that he was remediless because he did not look at the precise place and time, when and where looking would have been of the most advantage." The facts in Jennings' Case are very similar to the one before us, so far as the obligation to look and listen is concerned. As pertinent to the question, they are stated thus: "Plaintiff before passing these cars looked west along the street he was travelling, and saw it was open. He could not see south, on the second side track, because of cars on the first. He looked in that direction, however, saw no one on top of any car, and heard no engine bell ringing, though he saw the smoke from an engine. He crossed over the first track upon which the cars were standing, and, while looking north at the approaching train on the main track, stepped upon the side track without again looking south, and was immediately struck, knocked down, and run over by some freight cars, five in number, which had been kicked by an engine from a point 300 or 400 feet south of Lesperance street." On these facts there was verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and in affirming the judgment the court held that "the rule that a person who goes on a railroad track, or purposes crossing it, must use his eyes and ears to avoid injury, and, if he neglects to do so, he cannot recover, notwithstanding the negligence of the company, is not of universal application, but has exceptions under exceptional circumstances, and the facts of this case make an exception to the rule."

Applying these decisions to the facts testified to by the plaintiff, we hold there was error in directing a nonsuit. The plaintiff's duties by contract with the company (whether through himself or under his employer, who was a contractor with the company, makes no difference) caused him to work almost on the track, and frequently required him then and there to be upon and across it. While so engaged, he was run over by an engine of the defendant company, which had come upon him without any warning, and which warning was required both by the custom and rules of the company. More than that, he had just looked and listened both ways, not at the precise time when he started to cross the track, but only several seconds before, and the way then appeared clear. He says half a minute, but, as a matter of fact, you could walk the distance he says he went, and at the rate he says he was moving, in five or six seconds. To hold him to a constant looking would disqualify him from doing his work, and as a matter of law it is not required of him. If the negligence of the defendant is properly established, we are of opinion that on the evidence set forth in this case the question of contributory negligence must be left to the jury to determine under proper instructions, and on the facts as they shall find them. The case, we think, comes within the principles so clearly stated in Smith v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 825, 44 S. E. 663.

There is error and a new trial is awarded.
New trial.

NORTH CAROLINA CORP. COMMISSION
v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS—REGULATION—ESTABLISHMENT OF SIDE TRACK.

Where the action of the corporation commission in requiring a railroad company to install a private switch has been affirmed by the circuit court on a jury finding that the requirement was reasonable, the fact that the switch would increase the danger of operating the road is no cause for reversing the judgment of the circuit court.

2. SAME — REASONABLENESS OF ORDER — EVIDENCE.

On an issue as to the reasonableness of an order of the corporation commission requiring a railroad to establish a private switch, evidence that the railroad had previously maintained a switch at the same place without inconvenience or accident was admissible.

Brown J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Justice, Judge.

Proceeding by the state, on relation of the North Carolina Corporation Commission, on petition of the Round Pine Lumber Company, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment affirming the action of the commission, the railway company appeals. Affirmed.

T. B. Womack and Pou & Fuller, for appellant. H. E. Norris and Seawell & McIver, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The corporation commission act (Laws 1899, p. 292, c. 164, § 2,) enumerates in 26 subheads the powers conferred upon the corporation commission. Among these, subsection 15 authorizes the commission "to require the construction of side tracks by any railroad company to industries already established or to be established: Provided, it is shown that the proportion of such revenue accruing to such side track is sufficient within five years to pay the expenses of its construction"—and further restricting the power by forbidding the commission to require the construction of any side track more than 500 feet. The power of the General Assembly to establish a commission to supervise and regulate the rates and operations of quasi public corporations exercising public franchises has been too often decided in the state and federal Supreme Courts to be again discussed. The matter has been discussed, with the citation of authorities. R. R. Connection Case, 137 N. C. 14, 49 S. E. 191 et seq.; Corporation Commission v. Railroad (Rate Case) 127 N. C. 283, 37 S. E. 266; Express Co. v. Railroad, 111 N. C. 463, 16 S. E. 393; and in many others, among them, Corporation Commission v. Railroad ("Track Scales Case") 51 S. E. 793, at this term.

As to this special matter, which arises under subhead 15, authorizing the commission to require the establishment of side tracks for the use of industrial plants, there is, in view of the great industrial development of the state, scarcely any power granted to the commission that is of greater importance. Owing to the exigencies of their business, as well as the greater cost of land immediately at railroad stations and in towns, many factories, and especially most lumber plants, are situated at some distance from any passenger and freight station, though usually on the line of some railroad. To require their products, which are usually shipped in car load lots, to be hauled to a distant station, often over bad roads, when the trains perhaps pass in a few yards of the plant, would entail a great and useless expense, to the great discouragement of such enterprises in our midst. To avoid this the railroads, whenever the receipts in their judgment would justify it, have for years been putting in such sidings, upon which empty cars would be placed when called for, and, when loaded, would be taken away by some passing train. Such sidings are not passenger or freight stations named in subsections 12, 13, 13a, and 14, and have not (except possibly in rare instances) any agent. Prior to the enactment of this provision of the statute the establishment of such sidings rested in the arbitrary will of the common carrier, who could also discontinue such sidings at will. Such powers, it will be seen at once, placed the industrial development of the state at the mercy of the railroad management, which could mar the prosperity of any plant along its line by refusing a siding, or arbitrarily discontinuing it if established. This power could be used for both political and pecuniary advantage. Whether it was ever so used or not the General Assembly, while not prohibiting the carrier from continuing to establish such sidings at its pleasure, deemed it wise to take the power of refusing to grant or continue such sidings out of the arbitrary will of the common carrier by authorizing the corporation commission to require the establishment of such sidings in proper cases. It did not, however, substitute the arbitrary power of the commission for the arbitrary power of the carrier, but it gave the former authority to require such sidings only when the "revenue accruing from such side track is sufficient within five years to pay the expense of its construction," and subject also to a review of the reasonableness of such order on appeal to the superior court, and by further review as to the rulings on the law to this court. By a subsequent act (Laws 1903, p. 788, c. 444, amended by chapter 693, p. 1073, of the same year) a penalty is imposed for refusing to receive loaded cars at such side tracks as well as at regular depots or stations, showing that the Legislature was advertent to the distinction and difference between such sidings and "regular stations."

In the present case, the corporation commission, upon petition of the Round Pine Lumber Company, ordered the establishment of such siding, sufficient to hold four cars, on the line of defendant road, at the twenty-fourth milepost from Raleigh, and about 1¼ miles north of Merry Oaks Station. The lumber company agreed to prepare the grade for said siding, and to furnish the cross-ties for the same, and to have the switch lamp for said siding lighted every night while it should be in existence. The corporation commission found that approximately 30,000,000 feet of lumber would be shipped by the lumber company from said siding in two years, yielding a revenue of not less than $8,000 to the defendant, and that the cost to the defendant of constructing the siding, the grading being done and cross-ties furnished by the lumber company (as offered), would be about $200, and ordered that, upon the petitioner doing the grading and furnishing the cross-ties, the defendant construct, on or before 23d August, 1905, a spur siding, as prayed, to hold four cars. An appeal to the superior court was taken upon the ground that the order was unjust and unreasonable; that it would entail considerable and unnecessary cost upon the defendant, which would be taking its property for private purposes without compensation; that the commission had no right to make the order; that the petitioner's mill was 800 yards from the defendant's track, and hence the petitioner could not use the siding without hauling that distance or constructing a tramroad; and, lastly, that putting in the siding would increase the hazard in operating the defendant's road. Upon appeal in the superior court three issues only were submitted, and without exception: (1) Was it reasonable that the defendant be required to construct the spur siding for the convenience of the petitioner as prayed for? (2) Is the spur siding a necessary convenience for the use of the petitioner in the shipment of freight from its sawmill? (3) Will the revenue accruing to the defendant from such spur or side track from the shipment of freight, within five years, be sufficient to pay the expenses of its construction? The jury responded, "Yes" to each of these issues, and judgment was entered reaffirming the order made by the corporation commission, but extending the time for its execution till 3d November, 1905.

Upon appeal to this court the defendant frankly admits in its brief that "the order appealed from does not lessen the revenues of the road, but distinctly tends to increase the same," and rests its case almost entirely upon the allegation that putting in the side track would increase the hazard of operating its road by reason of the additional switch required. But this point, if it could be made one of law, is not raised by the tender and refusal of an issue as to such alleged fact, nor was it presented, as might probably have been done, by an appropriate prayer upon the first issue. It was presented as an issue of fact by the argument and evidence, on the first issue, to the jury on the trial, and the finding upon the issue was adverse to the contention of the defendant. There was neither any prayer for instruction refused, nor any exception to the charge. If it is competent for us to take judicial notice of such matters, we should say that, while there is some danger that this switch may be misplaced, there is also risk as to any other switch on the line of the defendant's road, just as there is danger that any rail, if not renewed, may become worn, or any cross-tie, if not removed in time, may become rotten, and cause derailments; but these are risks necessarily incident to the defendant's business, and to be guarded against by its diligence, and certainly the supposed danger from adding one switch to the great number now on the defendant's line is not a sufficient cause, as a matter of law, to reverse the judge's order made upon the responses to the issues submitted to the jury, without exception from the defendant, and without a prayer for instruction upon this aspect of the case. There was, as already stated, no exception to the charge, and the only exception to the evidence is that the plaintiff was permitted to show that a few years ago the defendant's road maintained a spur or side track at this same spot for two years without inconvenience or accident. This was competent, certainly, to show the practicability of a side track being established at that point, and requires no serious consideration. Indeed, the argument in this court was chiefly upon the evidence whether it showed the order of the commission to be a reasonable one, which was properly a matter for consideration by the jury, and which has been passed upon by them under instruction from the court with which the defendant was satisfied, as it filed no exceptions thereto. There was evidence, too, that the facilities offered the petitioner at Merry Oaks were entirely inadequate for the accommodation of its shipments, aside from the evidence that it would add $5 to $8 to the cost per car load, if the petitioner were required to ship from that point, and that it would be impossible to haul from the sawmill to Merry Oaks in the winter at all.

We affirm the judgment of the superior court, and, as the date of its execution (3d November, 1905) has now passed, final judgment will be entered here, directing the execution of the work in the same terms as prescribed by the judgment of the superior court, on or before 15th February, 1906. This course was pursued in the Railroad Connection Case, 137 N. C., and in other cases therein quoted on page 21, 49 S. E. 199.

Affirmed.

BROWN, J., dissents.

CONNOR, J. (concurring.) For the reasons set out in the opinion and upon the authority of the cases cited, I concur in the opinion of the court that the statute confers upon the commission the power to require the construction of side tracks upon the terms and conditions prescribed. Whether the order is a reasonable one was submitted to the jury, and answered by them as set out in the record. To this there was no exception. In view of the fact that the cause was tried in that way, I do not care to discuss the question whether what is a reasonable regulation is a question of law for the court or a fact to be submitted to the jury. The usual rule undoubtedly is that what is a reasonable time, or a reasonable notice, or reasonable regulation upon the facts admitted, or found by the jury if disputed, is a question of law. The practice in regard to the validity of orders made by the corporation commission not being well settled, and not having been discussed in this case, I do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion in regard to it. I do not think the exception to his honor's ruling upon the question of evidence is reversible error. There are expressions in the opinion as to which I cannot give my assent, not being, in my opinion, pertinent to the questions presented for our decision. I simply concur in the disposition made of this case.

WALKER, J., concurs in the concurring opinion of CONNOR, J.

(140 N. C. 293)

MOORE v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF STATESVILLE et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—MALICE—PROBABLE CAUSE.

In an action for malicious attachment, it is necessary for plaintiff to show an absence of probable cause before he can call in question the motives of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Malicious Prosecution, § 18.]

2. SAME—DEFINITION OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

That probable cause which constitutes a defense to an action for malicious attachment is a belief by the attaching creditor in the existence of the facts essential to the prosecution of his attachment, founded upon such circumstances as, supposing him to be a man of ordinary caution, would be sufficient to induce the belief.

3. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for malicious attachment, the facts being admitted, the question as to the existence of probable cause is one for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Malicious Prosecution, § 161.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A bank, which for several years had been making advances to a customer without security, received a letter from him stating that, owing to an action which was pending against him, he feared the impairment of his capital, and suggested that he convey his property in trust for the benefit of creditors. Subsequently he withdrew his account from the bank and disposed of some of his property, and the cashier, on going to a mill conducted by the customer, was informed by his son, who was in charge, that the customer had left the state and would be absent for a week or so, and that all the running capital had been drawn out from the mill owing to the litigation. Held, that the facts did not show a want of probable cause for the issuance of an attachment by the bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alexander County; Webb, Judge.

Action by J. H. Moore against the First National Bank of Statesville and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Action for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of suing out an attachment by defendant bank and George H.

Brown, its cashier, against plaintiff's property, wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause. A demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence was sustained by the court, and the action dismissed. Plaintiff appealed.

The facts developed upon plaintiff's evidence, in so far as they are material to the decision of the appeal, are: The defendant bank is a banking association duly organized pursuant to the national banking laws and was, at and before the date of the transactions set out in the complaint, engaged in the banking business in the city of Statesville. The defendant Brown was, at said dates, cashier of said bank, charged with the duties incident to his office. Plaintiff was, on the 5th day of June, 1903, and had been for some time prior thereto, indebted to defendant bank in the sum of $5,100. Said indebtedness was evidenced by several notes executed at different dates during the year 1901, and two notes during 1902, some of said notes running 30 days and some 90 days. Interest had been paid from time to time. Several of them were overdue on June 5, 1903. The defendant bank had no security to the said indebtedness. The bank had, during the year 1903, frequently urged the payment of the notes, but no payment had been made on them. Plaintiff was, in June, 1903, a resident of Lilledown, Alexander county. He was a physician, but was, at the date of the transactions referred to, engaged in operating a cotton mill, flour-mill and farming, etc., conducting a store in connection with his mills. He owned June 5, 1903, a roller flourmill and cornmill at Hickory in Catawba county, known as the "Allspaugh Mills," also the Allspaugh farm of 287 acres, worth in all $8,000. He owned at Lilledown a cotton mill and other real estate, estimated to be worth $45,000. There was a mortgage on the Alexander property of about $2,500. He owned the Watts farm of 350 acres, upon which there was a mortgage of $2,500 for the purchase money. According to plaintiff's estimate, his property was worth at a forced sale, $53,000, and his indebtedness was $20,000. He was involved in a divorce suit with his wife, in which she was claiming alimony, and had filed a notice of lis pendens in the county of Alexander. There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff owned property in Kentucky of considerable value. He had in his mill at Lilledown $10,000 or $12,000 worth of "duck goods," the product of his mill, which he had sold, and for which he had received New York exchange. Prior to June, 1903, plaintiff had kept an account depositing large sum of money in defendant bank, but had ceased to do so during the month of April, 1903, after which time the deposits did not amount to much. He was on June 5, 1903, solvent.

Plaintiff's litigation with his wife was giving him anxiety and annoyance. Motion was pending for further alimony pendente lite, $4,000 having been allowed and paid. The reason assigned by plaintiff for ceasing to keep his account with defendant bank was the fact that the attorney for the bank had been employed by his wife in her suit with him, and that he did not deem it safe to have his business known to them. On May 21, 1903, plaintiff sent to defendant Brown, cashier, a letter in which he stated that he felt he owed a duty to his creditors, he being one of them, to make a plain statement concerning his business, and to afford him the means of realizing the amount of his debt in full; that he (Brown) had trusted him, and he did not propose that he should lose a cent by reason of his confidence; that if he would take the prompt action, as he (plaintiff) suggested, he would sustain no loss; that prior to two years before this his business was on a firm basis, and he was making money; that his obligations were met promptly, and he looked forward with hope to a successful business future; that at that time his wife, from whom he had separated several years before, had returned from California and instituted suit against him on groundless charges; that he had been harassed by motions for alimony pendente lite, had paid her $4,000, besides costs and attorney's fees; that he had been unable to procure a trial of the case, and had exhausted every effort to obtain a reasonable settlement; that he had no assurance when the cause would be tried; that meanwhile she was clamoring for more alimony, and that costs and expenses were accumulating; that after July 1st another motion for alimony could be made, and he had no doubt that it would be; that it might result in another heavy financial loss to him; that he had lost heavily in sums actually paid out; that he had not been able to give to his business the proper attention; that he was indebted to the amount of $20,000, and had property enough to make every obligation good, saying: "But with the continuance of this suit, its heavy demands upon my time and resources, its disturbing and harassing influence upon my mind, I fear that such will not be the case long." He stated that he wished to protect his creditors while he had the means with which to do so; that he did not wish to enter bankruptcy, because he was not a bankrupt; that if he left his creditors to sue, obtain judgment, and levy execution, and resort to other process, the assets would be consumed in court, etc. He proceeded to make a proposition to convey his property to two trustees—one selected by himself and one by his creditors—both to give bond, etc., to sell and pay his creditors. He requests the defendant to act promptly in the matter, signifying acceptance and taking the steps necessary to carry into effect his proposition. This letter was sent by plaintiff to his other creditors who were willing to accept his proposition. Some time during the months of February and March, 1903, plaintiff sold some horses, mules, and cattle, he sold other stock in May, and on the 18th day of said month sold his stock of goods for $3,300 for which he received $2,000 cash, and note for balance, leased his storehouse for two years, sold his growing crop cotton on hand, and shut down his mill. On or about May 26, 1903, plaintiff left his home, and went to the city of Cincinnati for the purpose of attending the sale of some property belonging to his children. He stated in Sunday school that he was going, and would be away some two or three weeks. He caused to be sent to his nephew, Mr. Payne, in Cincinnati, from the proceeds of his property sold, about $8,000, which was deposited in bank to his (Payne's) credit. This was not known to Brown on June 5, 1903. There was much testimony in regard to plaintiff's property and his movements subsequent to the issuing of the attachment.

Plaintiff introduced his son, Ernest V. Moore, who testified that he saw defendant Brown at Taylorsville two days prior to the date of the attachment. He testified as follows in regard to conversation with defendant: "I came up on the train from Statesville; had been to Hickory. I got into a buggy; was about to drive away, when I saw Mr. Brown. I had the buggy stopped. Mr. Brown spoke to me, and shook hands with me, and made some remark; asked where my father was. Told him that my father was out of town, and he made the remark that he wished to see me. I got out of the buggy, and went back to the Campbell boarding house. Mr. Brown asked me again, I think, where my father was, and I told him he was in Cincinnati. He told me that a report had come to him of the sale of certain property. I told him that Mr. Deal could give him all the information regarding that property, and that he could see him at the mill. We secured a buggy, and at his request drove to the mill, about three miles. On our way out we talked about the situation. He explained that the money had been loaned by the bank, and that he was very anxious about it. I told him that I realized that, and also that he need have no anxiety concerning it; that we were immediately expecting a trial of the divorce proceedings then pending; that a special term of court had been ordered by the Governor in Catawba county for the purpose of trying this case, and it would come up in July—1st of July; and that the case would then unquestionably be settled. Explained to him that he had practically exhausted his credit on the property on account of these divorce proceedings, and that at the present time it was impossible for us to make payment of the notes then due or about to be due. He seemed to be very well satisfied with what I had said, and when he reached the mill he made inquiry concerning the insurance on the property. I told him my impression was it was insured for $40,000. We made search for the policies and found several; but all the policies which we were able to locate were old policies and had been canceled. Mr. Brown seemed very anxious about it, and wished to know definitely about it, and I told him that the only way I could find out was to write my father, which I promised to do and let him know immediately I heard. He then requested me to take him through the cotton mill. He examined the machinery thoroughly, and made notes of some sort, and questioned me as to the price of it. I informed him that the mill originally cost between $40,000 and $50,000, including the machinery. We went entirely through the mill; examined the water power and the engine, and just as we stepped out the mill Mr. Brown said, 'There is no question about this being a good mill.' I took him through the roller mill. It cost between $3,500 and $4,000. I offered to take him up about one-half mile above the place to show him the shoal, and he said he did not care to go. We went back into the store. He went and questioned Mr. Deal. I don't know what he said to Mr. Deal. Very shortly afterwards we drove back to town. Driving back to Taylorsville, he said to me, 'Why did your father sell the property at Lilledoun?' I went into this detailed statement, which might have been made some parts at other times. This was the substance of the statement I made to him at different times on that trip. I stated that for the past two or three years we have been harassed by divorce proceedings. Motions for alimony have been made at eight or nine different times. At one time there was a judgment and an order from the superior court of this state for $4,000 to be paid in 90 days. An appeal was taken on that order; and there were other matters in the court. At least my father was threatened with contempt proceedings and threatened with jail for failing to pay it, but the amount was paid. I stated the business here has been dull, and all the running capital practically has been withdrawn from the mill to meet the expense of the litigation. In addition to this, he has bought and paid for, to a great extent, the roller mill in Hickory, which also took a great part of his capital. That capital which I speak of was the running capital of the mill at Lilledoun. I explained to him that the litigation had been protracted, but a special term of the court had been ordered, and we were expecting a trial in July, and beyond all reasonable doubt a trial would be had. In addition to a trial, we were expecting a further motion for alimony, and that the sale of the property had been for the exclusive purpose of obtaining money to meet the expenses of the litigation, and to pay any possible judgment for alimony, and to run his business which was then standing still for lack of funds. Mr. Brown seemed to be satisfied. He had previously stated that he had always been a good friend to this concern. I said that was true.

He said that he was my father's friend; and, when he said he was, he was; and he had no desire in the world to injure him. I told him I believed that. He told me that he knew the attorneys and the plaintiff in the divorce proceedings were doing everything in their power to ruin him, and, if possible, would ruin him; and in all the trouble that had preceded, he had advanced the money with which to run the business, and had done it willingly. He said now he was anxious, and wanted the money back; wanted the debt paid off. I told him that the most earnest desire we had was to pay every obligation we had. Every move we made was to protect our creditors. That the sale of such personal property as had been sold was for the purpose of meeting all the requirements of the court in the matter then pending. After we reached Taylorsville, I left him at the bank in conversation with Mr. McIntosh and Mr. Matheson. Mr. Brown was very much concerned because he could see no insurance on the property at Lilledoun. I told him, however, that I would look into the matter at once, and let him know as soon as I could. He said that he thought Dr. Moore should, for his own protection, and the protection of his creditors, keep his property insured. $50,000 of property with not a cent of insurance on it! I may have stated again, I would write to my father about it. While we were at Lilledoun, Mr. Brown again asked me where my father was. I told him he had gone to Cincinnati, and was going to Columbus for a day or so. I said, 'I would be very glad for you to write him about the matter.' I took a piece of paper, and wrote his address in Cincinnati and in Columbus, telling him I was not certain as to just which place he would be when his letter should arrive. I said, 'If you write duplicate letters to him at these addresses, they will be delivered in due course of mail,' and gave him the addresses. I told him further, 'I will write to him, and will let you know immediately I hear from him concerning the insurance.' He said, 'When will he be back?' I said, 'If he is not on his way back, he will be here the first of the week.' He said, 'What is he gone for?' I said, 'To look after some property belonging to us children in Cincinnati. He has an order of court authorizing a sale of this property, and has gone for the purpose of trying to effect a sale.' He urged me on the matter as to his return, and I repeatedly restated these facts. I questioned him as to what course he was about to pursue. He made a statement here in Taylorsville just outside the Bank of Alexander, in the middle of the street, just before he went to the train that he had no course in view; nothing to act upon. I said, 'Whatever course you have in view, don't take any action until Monday.' I said, 'My father will certainly be here Monday.' He said, 'He will certainly return Monday?' I said, 'He will undoubtedly return Monday.' Mr. Brown smiled, and said, 'All right.'

He returned Monday. I don't recall anything further."

On June 5, 1903, defendant bank instituted an action against plaintiff for the recovery of said indebtedness. For the purpose of obtaining a warrant of attachment, the defendant Brown made an affidavit setting forth the cause of action, and averring that plaintiff had sold and disposed of the property described, and was then offering for sale other valuable property "all of which said defendant has done with intent, as affiant is informed and believes to defraud his creditors." That plaintiff had departed from the state with, as affiant is informed and believes, intent to defraud his creditors. A warrant of attachment was issued upon said affidavit, and duly levied by the sheriff of said county upon plaintiff's property on June 6, 1903. Plaintiff, through his counsel, gave notice on July 25, 1903, that he would move the court at a time and place named to dissolve the attachment. At the August term, 1903, an order was made reciting the said motion, and that, "the defendant having averred in his answer his willingness and ability to pay off the indebtedness due plaintiff upon dissolution of the attachment, and having exhibited a certified check to the court payable to the plaintiff as evidence of his good faith, it is ordered that the said attachment be dissolved and thereupon said check delivered to the plaintiff." Thereafter an order was made taking defendant bank with the cost. There was evidence that plaintiff had advertised his property for sale. It is not clear whether defendant Brown had knowledge of this at the time he sued out the attachment. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for judgment as upon nonsuit. Motion allowed. Plaintiff excepted, and appealed.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the case). We are relieved of any extended discussion of the principles of law applicable to this appeal. The learned counsel for plaintiff and defendants agree in that respect. Plaintiff's counsel cite a line of cases decided by this court which clearly and without any variation settle the law as to the material questions in the case. We are not called upon to express any opinion in regard to the conduct or motives of plaintiff except in so far as they bear upon the state of defendant's mind and the reasonableness of his belief. It may well be, and we do not wish to be understood as intimating any opinion to the contrary, that he was acting in all that he did in perfect good faith and with honest intentions. It is evident from his testimony that the long and harassing litigation with his wife had, as it was well calculated to do, seriously disturbed his mind, and embarrassed his business. The question is whether the defendant Brown had probable cause to believe that plaintiff was moved by any other than an honest purpose in his conduct. The essential averment to be established before the plaintiff can proceed with this suit is the absence of probable cause for defendant's action. Until he has done this, he can not call the defendant's motives in question. This is conceded by his counsel. What constitutes probable cause? The answer is given by Daniel, J., in Cabiness v. Martin, 14 N. C. 454, quoting Judge Washington: "I understand it to be the existence of circumstances and facts, sufficiently strong to excite, in a reasonable mind, suspicion that the person charged with having been guilty was guilty; it is a case of apparent guilt, as contradistinguished from real guilt. It is not essential that there should be positive evidence at the time the action is commenced; but the guilt should be so apparent at that time as would be sufficient ground to induce a rational and prudent man, who duly regards the rights of others as well as his own, to institute a prosecution." Smith v. Deaver, 49 N. C. 513; Jaggard on Torts, 616. "A reasonable or well-grounded suspicion of the guilt of the accused, based on circumstances sufficient to justify a reasonable belief thereof in the mind of a cautious and prudent man is sufficient defence to the action." 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. 659; Stacey v. Emery, 97 U. S. 642, 24 L. Ed. 1035; Ferguson v. Arnou, 142 N. Y. 580, 37 N. E. 626. In Spengler v. Davy, 56 Va. 381, the action was for malicious prosecution in suing out an attachment. Daniel, J., referring to Judge Washington's definition in Munns v. Dupont, Fed. Cas. No. 9,928 (cited in Cabiness v. Martin, supra) says: "Modifying the definition so as to adapt it to such a case as the one before us, we may, I think, properly define justifiable probable cause in cases of the kind to be, a belief, by the attaching creditor, in the existence of the facts essential to the prosecution of his attachment founded upon such circumstances as, supposing him to be a man of ordinary caution, prudence and judgment, were sufficient to induce such belief."

It is conceded that when the facts are admitted it is the duty of the court to declare, as a question of law, whether there is probable cause. Daniel, J., in Swalm v. Stafford, 25 N. C. 289, says: "What is probable cause when the facts are admitted is a pure question of law." The law has been uniformly so held in this state. In Beale v. Roberson, 29 N. C. 280, Ruffin, C. J., after reviewing the English authorities, in connection with our own, says: "It would seem then, that making a question on this subject must be regarded as an attempt to move fixed things, and cannot be successful either in England or here." He also says that however difficult it may be it is a question which a judge can deal with better than a jury; as he does with reasonable time, due diligence and legal provocation and the like.

Vickers v. Logan, 44 N. C. 394; Jones v. R. Rd., 125 N. C. 227, 34 S. E. 398. In Kirkham v. Coe, 46 N. C. 423, the judge upon the entire evidence instructed the jury that there was not probable cause. In Honeycut v. Freeman, 35 N. C. 820, the court held, as matter of law, that there was not probable cause. In this case, his honor, in effect, instructed the jury that there was probable cause. There was nothing to be submitted to the jury; the defendant admitted every portion of plaintiff's testimony, material to the inquiry, to be true. In ascertaining whether the defendant had probable cause, we are to consider only those facts which were known to him at the time he sued out the attachment. Those facts and circumstances alone, which were known to defendant at the time the affidavit upon which the warrant of attachment were based are to be considered in determining the question whether he had probable cause. Swalm v. Stafford, supra; Beale v. Roberson, supra.

The defendant Brown knew that plaintiff was indebted to the bank in a large amount; that the debt was unsecured, and had been running a long time, interest being paid; that, although urged to do so, plaintiff had made no payment whatever on the notes; that he had withdrawn his account from the bank. In this connection the reason given for doing so is not material, the withdrawal deprived the bank of any opportunity of keeping up with his cash transactions, knowing the sources from which he was drawing cash, and the disposition made of it. He had a right to withdraw his account, if he saw fit; but when he did so, he was bound to know that the bank would not longer extend him credit. The defendant knew of the litigation with his wife, and its effect upon his business and property. In the light of these facts, the letter of May 21, 1903, informed the defendant of his condition and his apprehensions in regard to the future of his business. The bank was under no obligation to accept his proposition, no matter how sincere and honest he was in making it. The defendant Brown must have known that a conveyance of the property incumbered with two mortgages of $5,000—a pending claim for alimony pendente lite reasonably anticipated to be not less than $4,000—secured on the property by a notice of its pendens, with the right to renew the demand, the property further incumbered with an inchoate dower right. Certainly all of these incumbrances rendered the security offered for $20,000 precarious. No prudent person would have loaned so much upon the property with the chances, the almost certainty, of litigation. In this condition of affairs, the defendant Brown goes to Taylorsville, and thence to the mill; he finds that plaintiff has sold very nearly, if not quite, all of his personal property, has dismantled and shut down the mill, leased out the store for two years, left the entire property uninsured and gone, as his son tells him, to a distant state. It is true that plaintiff's son gives defendant an account of conditions, as he understands them, and we take it does so honestly. There is no suggestion of the disposition made of the money for which the property had been sold—his son says, because he did not ask. The defendant was not bound to accept the son's explanations of the father's conduct, he could well have concluded that the son himself did not understand the purposes of his father. In this condition of affairs, it was certainly the duty of the officers of the bank to take some action looking to the collection of the debt; to have failed in that respect would have subjected them to censure, if not personal liability. No other course than an attachment was open to them. The plaintiff was out of the state, no personal service could be made, nor could any injunction have been served on him. The defendant must either have quietly awaited developments and taken the risk of further sales by plaintiff while out of the state, or of his return or of other creditors attaching.

The plaintiff's counsel strongly contend in a well-considered brief that the facts which were known to defendant Brown should have assured him that the bank was in no danger of losing the debt; that plaintiff was amply able to pay his debts in full; that he knew why plaintiff had gone to Cincinnati, and that he would return on Monday; that, while the conditions existing at the time of suing out the warrant might have constituted probable cause for action by some other person, the same facts did not constitute such cause to justify defendant Brown's action. This is equivalent to saying that Brown swore falsely in his affidavit; that he did not, in fact, believe that plaintiff was guilty of fraudulent conduct. We are of the opinion that when all of the facts and circumstances known to defendant Brown are taken into consideration, he had probable cause to sue out the warrant. Was there any evidence that in truth he did not honestly believe that to which he swore? But, says the plaintiff, did not plaintiff's son explain his father's absence, and when he would return, and did not Brown say that he had the utmost confidence in Dr. Moore—had been his friend and had no ground to take any action? Brown was under no obligation to accept the son's version of his father's conduct, and his action shows that he did not do so. He may not, at the time, have determined upon the course he would pursue to secure the bank's debt. If he had done so, he would hardly have notified the son that he was going to return to Statesville and sue out an attachment. That would not have been the conduct of a prudent man trying to secure a debt of $5,000. It is asked: Were not the circumstances now relied on as suspicious, explained to the defendants, and explained to their satisfaction? The answer is found in defendant's action. Again, it is asked: "Didn't they say, after hearing the explanations, that they had the utmost confidence in Dr. Moore?" The testimony upon this point is as follows: Mr. Moore says that he told defendant Brown that the property had been sold; that he did not ask him where the money was; told him that the running capital had been practically run out of the business on account of the suit; that they had to increase the capital some way or the mill had to shut down. "Mr. Brown told you he had always been your father's friend in his business? Yes, sir. Let him have this money to be used in conducting his business? Yes, sir; had the utmost confidence in him. And, when he told him he was his friend, he was? Yes, sir; said he had the utmost confidence in him."

We do not construe this language as plaintiff does. To our minds it is rather the language of a man more disappointed in the conduct of one to whom he had extended credit because of his confidence and friendship. This language must be interpreted in the light of time, place, and circumstances. Here was the cashier of a bank, and had for two years been renewing and increasing a loan to his friend without security to enable him to carry on his business. When he goes to see him for the purpose of securing his debt, the debtor has sold off property of large value, as it afterwards turns out $8,000, shut down the mill, permitted the insurance to expire, and gone to a distant state, leaving his son, a young student just from college, in charge. Certainly his statement that he had trusted and had reposed confidence in plaintiff does not show a state of mind inconsistent with his action taken shortly thereafter. That Brown was anxious about the debt is evident from his actions, as well as his words. Plaintiff was put upon notice that the bank desired payment, and was urgently pressing for payment; that it had rejected his proposition. To take the most favorable view of his conduct, was it not folly on his part to leave the state under the circumstances known to him, and was not his entire conduct well calculated to cause his creditors to reasonably apprehend that their debts were in jeopardy. The plaintiff says that the dissolution of the attachment shows an absence of probable cause. Whatever effect such order would have had if made upon the merits, it is not necessary to discuss, because the order was made upon plaintiff's payment of the debt. No other cause was open to the court or the defendant bank. The fact that plaintiff returned on Monday following the attachment, and paid the debt cannot be considered on the question of probable cause, nor can the fact that plaintiff caused the proceeds of the personal property, including the manufactured goods in the mill which he had sold, amounting to $8,000 to be deposited in the bank in Cincinnati to the credit of his nephew, Dr. Payne. "If by his folly or his fraud the plaintiff exposed himself to a well-grounded suspicion that he was guilty of the crime of which he was charged, he cannot claim that there was not probable cause for the prosecution." 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. 659. An examination of the cases in our own and other Reports shows that the courts have, with practical uniformity, held that when the facts are admitted, as by a demurrer to the evidence, the question of probable cause has been decided as a matter of law. When the testimony is conflicting, the court instructs the jury as to the law, leaving to them to find the truth of the matter by applying the law to the facts as they find them to be. Mr. Justice Hunt, in Stacy v. Emery, supra, says: "The question of malice or good faith is not an element in the case. It is not a question of motive. If the facts and circumstances before the officer are such as to warrant a man of prudence and caution in believing that the offense has been committed, it is sufficient. Whether the officer seized the occasion, to do an act which would injure another, or whether he moved reluctantly, is quite immaterial." In Willard v. Holmes, 142 N. Y. 492, 37 N. E. 480, Gray, J., in discussing the law in regard to suing out an attachment says: "It was a process which the statute authorized and which is usual in such cases, and its use subjects this defendant to no unfavorable criticism, if it accompanied the institution of an honest suit." He further says: "The circumstances to sustain this right of action must appear to have been such that no reasonable man could have been influenced thereby to the belief that the plaintiff had unauthorizedly committed the company, whose officer he had been, to a liability which it had not incurred, and which was foreign to its chartered purposes. It is our judgment that the facts did not justify the trial court in submitting the case to the jury, and that, upon all the evidence, it was error to deny the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint. The material facts were not in dispute, and whether there was probable cause for the prosecution of the former action became a question of law solely for the court." The law is discussed in the case of Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. Ed. 116. The authorities are reviewed in an able opinion by Mr. Justice Strong.

The plaintiff strongly urges upon our attention the fact that he owned a large quantity of real estate of large value. In this action we do not perceive that this fact is material upon the question of probable cause. If the defendant had such cause to believe that plaintiff was disposing of his property to defraud his creditors, or had left the state for that purpose, the value of his property was of no moment. He could as easily dispose of a large quantity by conveyance as a small quantity. A very wealthy man, whose conduct is such as to give to his creditors probable cause to sue out an attachment, is in no better position in that respect than a man with small means. That defendant was seriously apprehensive in regard to its debt is shown by the testimony of plaintiff's son. If this were an action for abuse of process by levying the attachment upon property of value largely in excess of the debt or otherwise using the process oppressively, the testimony in respect to the value of the property would be material. Railroad Co. v. Hardware Co., 138 N. C. 174, 50 S. E. 570.

Upon a careful examination of the entire record, we find no error in his honor's judgment.

No error.

FORTUNE v. BUNCOMBE COUNTY COM'RS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. STATUTES—INTENT OF LEGISLATURE.

A statute should be construed with reference to its general scope and the intent of the Legislature in enacting it, and in order to ascertain its purpose the court must give effect to all its clauses and provisions and must construe ambiguous language in such a sense as will conform to the scope of the act and effectuate its object.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, §§ 259-265, 269, 283.]

2. SAME—VERBAL INACCURACIES.

The use of inapt, inaccurate, or improper terms or phrases, clerical errors, or misprisions, inadvertences, or omissions, or misdescriptions or misnomers, will not invalidate a statute, providing the real meaning of the Legislature can be gathered from the context or from the general purposes and tenor of the enactment; and such errors and inaccuracies will be corrected and the inadvertences and omissions supplied by reference to the context or to other statutes, if practicable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, §§ 278, 279.]

3. SAME—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

The court, in endeavoring to correct misdescriptions or misnomers in a statute, may consider the description as it reads, in the light of extrinsic evidence and of anything in the act itself which points a way to the true meaning of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, §§ 290-299.]

4. SAME—SUPPLYING OMISSIONS.

Laws 1905, p. 856, c. 703, creating the office of auditor of a certain county, provides, in section 12 (page 859), that the auditor shall perform all duties required by "section 74 of the Public Laws of 1905" to be performed by the register of deeds. The only act of 1905 which contains as many as 74 sections is chapter 590, relative to the collection of taxes, and section 74 (page 688) of that act refers to duties to be performed by the register of deeds. While chapter 590 was ratified two days later than chapter 703, yet under Const. art. 2, § 14, requiring a bill for a law imposing taxation to be read on three several days, chapter 590 was presumably pending and nearing completion when chapter 703 became a law. Held, that section 12 of chapter 703 would be construed to refer to section 74 of chapter 590, and would be enforced accordingly, notwithstanding its failure to mention such chapter.

5. SAME—TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.

Laws 1905, p. 856, c. 703, fixing salaries for the officers of a certain county and creating the office of auditor of that county, provides, in section 12 (page 859), that the auditor shall perform the duties required of the register of deeds by Laws 1905, p. 688, c. 590, § 74. The section referred to requires the register of deeds to make out tax lists and to perform certain duties in relation thereto. Section 22 of chapter 703 (page 860) provides that the act shall be in "full" force and effect after the expiration of the term of office of the officers elected at the election of 1904. The general purpose of the statute is to substitute salaried officers for fee officers, and for that reason its full operation is postponed until the expiration of the terms of the officers then in office. Section 11 of the act specifically appoints a certain person to serve as auditor, to hold until the next election, and fixes his salary. Section 21 provides that the term of office of the auditor so appointed shall begin on July 1, 1905. Held, that chapter 703, in so far as it requires the auditor to perform the duties imposed on the register of deeds by section 74 of chapter 590, and to perform other duties capable of immediate performance, takes effect July 1, 1905, although his performance of such duties will lessen the fees of the register of deeds.

6. OFFICERS—RIGHTS AND DUTIES—REDUCTION OF COMPENSATION.

Although an office is a constitutional one, the Legislature may, within reasonable limits, change the statutory duties and diminish the emoluments of such office, if the public welfare requires it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Officers, § 152.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Moore, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by A. B. Fortune against M. L. Reed and others, commissioners of Buncombe county. From a judgment awarding a peremptory writ, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Civil action for mandamus, heard at chambers in August, 1905. The case was heard upon a case agreed, which was as follows: (1) That A. B. Fortune is the register of deeds for the county of Buncombe, duly qualified and elected, and as such has been performing the duties incident to said office since the first Monday of December, 1904, and that his term of office will not expire until the first day of December, 1906. (2) That M. L. Reed, C. P. Weaver, R. B. Clayton, Frank Wells, and Marion Glenn were duly elected and qualified as commissioners for the county of Buncombe on the first Monday of December, 1904, and as such have been filling the offices of county commissioners since said date and constitute the board of county commissioners of the county, and their term of office will not expire until the first Monday of December, 1906. (3) That the General Assembly of North Carolina, at its session in 1905, passed an act entitled "An act to amend an act to provide for the assessment of property and the collection of taxes," which said act was ratified on March 6, 1905 and went into force from and after its ratification, the same being chapter 590, p. 647, Laws 1905, and is made a part of this case. (4) That the said General Assembly, at its session of 1905, passed an act (chapter 703, p. 856, Laws 1905) entitled "An act to fix salaries for the officers of Buncombe county, and to increase the road fund and to create the office of auditor of Buncombe county," which said act was ratified on March 4, 1905, and is made a part of this case. (5) That on July 10, 1905, the plaintiff requested and demanded of the board of commissioners that the tax lists of the county be delivered to him for the purpose of performing the duties required of him by chapter 590, p. 647, Laws 1905. (6) That the board of commissioners declined and refused to permit the plaintiff to have the tax lists, and declined and refused to make an order for the payment of the said register of deeds for the work of computing the taxes and making out the tax lists, and declined and refused to permit the said register of deeds to perform any of the duties in relation to said tax lists required of him by said chapter 590. (7) That the State Auditor furnished the plaintiff books and blanks for the purpose of preparing the tax lists, and the same were demanded of him by the board of commissioners and R. J. Stokeley, and were delivered to said Stokeley under protest; the plaintiff denying the right of Stokeley or the board of commissioners to deprive him of the right to perform the duties mentioned and described in said chapter 590. (8) That the plaintiff is, by virtue of section 2 of article 7 of the Constitution, ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners. (9) That said Stokeley, on July 1, 1905, qualified as auditor for Buncombe county, and is now performing the duties required by section 12 of said chapter 703, p. 859, Laws 1905, and is now, under authority of said act and by order of said commissioners, computing the taxes and preparing the tax lists of the county for the year 1905.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that he is entitled to perform the duties required of him by said chapter 590, and he asks the court for a writ of mandamus to compel the commissioners of the county to comply with the conditions of the provisions of chapter 590, p. 647, Laws 1905, and to turn over to him the tax lists for the county, which said tax lists they have undertaken to place in the hands of said Stokeley. It is insisted by the defendants that said Stokeley, by virtue of chapter 703, p. 859, Laws 1905, from and after July 1, 1905, became the auditor for the county and entitled to perform all the duties and functions of said office as prescribed in said chapter 703, and as such auditor he was the proper person to compute and make out the tax lists for the year 1905 for the county of Buncombe; the said auditor's office beginning on the 1st day of July, 1905. Upon the foregoing facts, judgment was rendered that the plaintiff is entitled to the tax lists and to perform the duties in regard thereto, which are specified in Acts 1905, p. 688, c. 590, § 74, and to receive the compensation for his services in that behalf. It was then adjudged that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue, requiring the defendants to deliver the lists to the plaintiff for the purposes aforesaid, and to pay such compensation as they may deem proper for his services in computing the taxes, completing the lists and making copies as required by law. The court further adjudged that said Stokeley is the duly elected auditor of Buncombe county, and that his term of office, as such, began on the 1st day of July, 1905. The defendants were adjudged to pay the costs. From the judgment of the court, they appealed.

Chas. A. Webb, for appellants. Merrimon & Merrimon, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts). The correctness of the principles by which statutes should be construed, as stated with much clearness in the brief of the plaintiff's counsel, may be readily conceded, and yet we are of opinion, if the statute in question is examined in the light of those principles, the plaintiff has not shown himself entitled to the relief which he seeks. Some of the cardinal rules for the interpretation of a statute are that it should be construed with reference to its general scope and the intent of the Legislature in enacting it, and, in order to ascertain what was the purpose we must give effect to all of its clauses and provisions. Where the language used is ambiguous, or admits of more than one meaning, it is to be taken in such a sense as will conform to the scope of the act and effectuate its object. The use of inapt, inaccurate, or improper terms or phrases will not invalidate the statute, provided the real meaning of the Legislature can be gathered from the context or from the general purpose and tenor of the enactment. Clerical errors or misprisions, which, if not corrected, would render the statute unmeaning or incapable of reasonable construction or would defeat or impair its intended operation, will not necessarily vitiate the act, for they will be corrected, if practicable. Nor will mere inadvertences or omissions have that effect, provided they can be supplied by reference to the context or to other statutes, and the true reading of the statute made obvious and its real meaning apparent. These principles are fully set forth and aptly illustrated, by reference to decided cases, in Black on Interpretation of Laws, §§ 30-39. Guided by them, we should be able to ascertain and declare what was the intention of the Legislature with reference to the matter involved in this case, and whether it has been sufficiently expressed in the act under consideration. It seems that the leading purpose was to reduce expenses and to provide for the management of the affairs of the county in the future upon a more economical basis. At the same time, it was thought fair and just that a radical change from the fee system to the salary system should not take effect until the terms of those now in office should expire. In construing the act, we should give proper heed to this controlling idea and bring the different provisions of the statute into harmony with it, if this can reasonably be done. The office of auditor of the county was created, and at the same time filled by the appointment of Stokeley, and it is expressly provided that his term shall begin on the 1st day of July, 1905. So far, there can be no misunderstanding. Section 12 prescribes the duties of the auditor, and among others therein enumerated is the duty of making out a copy of the tax list of each county for the tax collector therein. He is further required to perform "all the duties required by section 74 of the Public Laws of 1905 to be performed by the register of deeds and to prepare for publication the annual statements required by law."

One difficulty in construing the act, and an insuperable obstacle, as the plaintiffs counsel contend, in the way of enforcing the provision which we have quoted, is that there is no reference therein to any particular chapter of the acts of 1905. It is argued that this is a patent ambiguity which defeats the operation of that clause. "A misdescription or misnomer in a statute will not vitiate the enactment or render it inoperative, provided the means of identifying the person or thing intended apart from the erroneous description, are clear, certain and convincing." Black, Int. of Laws, § 58. Under this rule, we may call to our aid anything in the act itself or even in the alleged erroneous description, which sufficiently points to something else as furnishing certain evidence of what was meant, though the reference to the extraneous matter may not in itself be full and accurate. The rule, even when literally or strictly construed, does not require that the erroneous description shall be altogether rejected in making the search for the true meaning, but it may be used in connection with anything outside of the statute to which it refers, and which itself, when examined, makes the meaning clear. The erroneous description may in this way be helped out by extraneous evidence. Black, Int. of Laws, § 38. But ours is not so much an erroneous as an inaccurate description, and the question is whether its words are adequate to express with sufficient certainty the intention of the Legislature. It has been held that, if a later act expressly refers to a designated section of an earlier one, to which it can have no application, but there is another section of the prior act to which, and to which alone, in view of the subject-matter, the later act can properly refer, it will be read according to the manifest purpose of the Legislature, and the misdescription will not prevent the reasonable construction that the Legislature intended to refer to the latter section. School Directors v. School Directors, 73 Ill. 249; Plank Road Co. v. Reynolds, 3 Wis. 287; Black, Int. Laws, § 38. When we turn to chapter 590, p. 647, of the Acts of 1905, commonly known as the "Machinery Act," we find that section 74 prescribes the duties of the register of deeds with reference to computing the taxes and preparing the tax lists of the county, and this is the only chapter of those acts that contains as many as 74 sections, and it is the only one referring to such duties. It is true that chapter 590 was ratified two days later than chapter 703, but this should not have the effect of defeating the will of the Legislature otherwise sufficiently declared. Taking judicial notice of the course of legislation as affected by the requirements of the Constitution (article 2, § 14) that a law imposing taxes cannot pass unless a bill for the purpose has been read on three several days, we must assume that the bill which finally became chapter 590 was pending in one of the Houses of the General Assembly at the time that chapter 703 became a law and was nearing its completion, being in the last of the formative stages of legislation. It was not possible then to indicate by number the chapter of the laws to which reference was made, as the arrangement of the acts into chapters had not then been effected, but it was possible to indicate the section. We have no doubt as to the intention, and conclude that the mere designation of the section was sufficient, under the circumstances, for us to identify with certainty the chapter and section to which the reference was made.

This brings us to the consideration of the other question, whether it was intended that the act should have operation from July 1, 1905, as to the duties mentioned in that section. By section 12, c. 703, p. 859, of the Acts of 1905, the auditor is required to perform various duties, the most, if not all, of which were the duties of other officers at that time. In the view we take of the case, it is not necessary that we should stop to inquire whether all of said duties appertained to other offices then existing, or whether some of them were newly created. It is sufficient for us to say that one of the duties, namely, the examination of all books and papers of the county officers, for the purpose of keeping a record of fees and commissions received by them, cannot be performed under the terms of the act until after the next election, as the liability of the said officers to account for fees and commissions received by them cannot arise during their present terms of office; it being manifest that the change from the fee to the salary system was not intended to take effect until after the present terms expire. But there is no reason why the act should not be allowed to have full operation as to all duties not within that category. The language is explicit that the auditor shall prepare the tax lists and perform all other duties prescribed by section 74 of the Laws of 1905, and this provision must have effect from July 1, 1905, when the auditor's term of office commenced, unless by a subsequent section its operation is postponed. Section 22 provides as follows: "This act shall be in full force and effect from and after the expiration of the term of office of the officers elected for said county at the election in November, 1904." The use of the adjective "full" implies that the act shall have some force and effect at once, and its clear meaning is that it shall have such force and effect as to all official duties, except those which cannot be performed until after the expiration of the present terms of the county officers. This must be true, if we give to the word "full" its natural and ordinary meaning and then construe the act with due regard to the manifest intention of the Legislature. When an act creates an office to commence at a certain time, and directs its incumbent to perform certain duties, which, though formerly belonging to another office, are required by law to be performed annually at a specified time, the officer must perform them, if at all, at the time specified. There is nothing in this act to restrict the plain, direct, and positive requirement of the statute that he shall prepare the tax lists, to a particular period of time, and there is no good reason why the operation of the act in this respect should be deferred. The mere fact that the duty thus required of him had theretofore been annexed to another office, and that the present incumbent of that office will be deprived of the compensation allowed for the service, is not sufficient to override the plain intent of the statute. Again, the act refers to the duties of the register of deeds as prescribed in section 74 of the Laws of 1905. That section requires those duties to be performed in the years 1905 and 1906, and it must be the clear intentment that those duties shall be performed by the auditor in the same years. This is in accord with the spirit and intent of chapter 703 to reduce expenses as speedily as is consistent with a proper regard for existing rights. The abolition of the fee system was postponed until the expiration of the present official terms, for reasons which appeared to the Legislature to be sound and just, but they do not apply to the mere transfer of some of the duties of one officer to another then created by the statute. Nor is there any constitutional objection to such transfer. The office is constitutional, it is true, but the duties are statutory. The Legislature may within reasonable limits change the duties and diminish the emoluments of the office, if the public welfare requires it to be done, and to this the incumbent must submit. Bunting v. Gales, 77 N. C. 283; Mial v. Ellington, 134 N. C. 181, 48 S. E. 961, 65 L.

R. A. 697; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C., at page 20, 25 Am. Dec. 677.

We have not adverted to the fact that the Legislature has not only created the office of auditor, but has filled it by direct appointment, instead of waiting for its incumbent to be chosen at the next election, which shows that there was considered to be a pressing necessity for immediate change from the old system to the new, in respect to the duties assigned to the auditor by the act. His salary is fixed at $1,200, and, unless our construction be the correct one, he will have very little to give, in the way of public service, in return for what he will receive. His salary would seem to be out of all proportion to the work which would be left for him to do. This result is not consistent with the main purpose and the evident policy of the enactment. The expression used in section 22, namely, "This act shall be in full force and effect," cannot be found in any other statute, and they must have been intended, by implication, to give the act immediate operation as to those matters which pertained to the office of auditor, created by it, for the regulation of which there seemed to be urgent need. If this is not the meaning, we are unable to understand what it is. The provision in regard to the duty of preparing the tax lists, if put into immediate effect, will not conflict with the other provisions concerning the substitution of salaries for fees. This is not true as to some of the other duties imposed upon the auditor, and, as to the latter, the act will take effect only after the existing terms of the officers expire. The statute must have some effect, for it was clearly so intended, and we can give it none unless we hold that the auditor is to perform the duties of the register of deeds in respect to the tax lists, this year and the next, and, of course, thereafter, unless the Legislature should otherwise provide.

There was error in the ruling of the court upon the facts agreed. The judgment will be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

Reversed.

PLEMMONS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—LETTERS—ISSUANCE—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The action of the clerk of the superior court in issuing letters of administration without requiring a proper bond cannot be attacked collaterally in an action brought by such administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, §§ 178-182.]

2. RAILROADS—PERSONS ON TRACK—DEATH—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

In an action for death of plaintiff's intestate by being run over by defendant's train while intestate was lying unconscious on the track, evidence held to justify the court in submitting to the jury the issue whether defendant could have avoided striking deceased, notwithstanding the latter's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; T. A. McNeill, Judge.

Action by Maggie Plemmons, as administratrix of B. M. Plemmons, deceased, against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Action to recover damages for alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. The court submitted the following issues: (1) Is the plaintiff the duly qualified administratrix of B. M. Plemmons, deceased? Answer: Yes. (2) Was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (3) Did said intestate by his own negligence contribute to his own death? Answer: Yes. (4) If so, could the defendant, notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased, have avoided his death by the exercise of proper care and caution? Answer: Yes. (5) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: Fifteen hundred dollars." From the judgment rendered defendant appealed.

Moore & Rollins, for appellant. Julius O. Martin, for appellee.

BROWN, J. 1. The defendant requested the court to dismiss the action because the administrator had not given an administration bond at the time the letters of administration were issued. The issuing of the letters cannot be collaterally attacked in this action. If the clerk of the superior court issued the letters in violation of the statute without requiring the proper bond, he should revoke them at once of his own motion, or upon the application of any one interested in the intestate's estate. Until he does so, and for any devastavit in the interim, the clerk's official bond is undoubtedly liable. For the purposes of this action his honor's ruling on the first issue is correct. 2. The defendant asked the court in apt time to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground that there was no sufficient evidence tending to prove that the intestate was killed by the negligence of the defendant. There is evidence tending to prove that the intestate was run over by the defendant's train in the yards of the defendant in Asheville on the night of November 25, 1900; that the intestate was lying across the track unconscious; that the track was straight for a distance of some 300 feet or more; that the headlight of the locomotive was burning; that the train was running slowly, and was actually stopped within about 80 feet after striking the man. There was evidence tending to prove that the engineer or fireman either saw the object lying across the track, or could easily have done so, to the distance of 100 yards or more. We have examined the evidence carefully, and under the decisions of this court in similar cases the judge below properly submitted the issues to the jury. Clegg's Case, 133 N. C. 304, 45 S. E. 657; Upton's Case, 128 N. C. 173, 176, 38 S. E. 738; Lloyd's Case, 118 N. C. 1010, 1014, 24 S. E. 805, 54 Am. St. Rep. 764; Pickett's Case, 117 N. C. 618, 639, 23 S. E. 264, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611.

We find no error in the record.

BROWN v. W. T. WEAVER POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. WITNESSES — BIAS — COMPETENCY OF IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

In an action against a water power company for damages to plaintiff alleged to have been caused by the erection of a dam in a stream on which her property abutted, a witness for plaintiff testified in regard to the value of the land. On cross-examination he stated that he had sold some worn-out upland in the neighborhood of plaintiff's land for $30 and $50 an acre, giving the location of the land; that the sales were made before the installation of defendant's water power. It appeared that witness had given his opinion that plaintiff's land was worth $100 per acre, and that defendant was permitted to show that he had sold lands in that vicinity at a smaller price, and that such sales were made since this installation of defendant's plant. Held, that a question on cross-examination as to whether the erection of defendant's plant had not increased the value of land "down there" was not competent as an impeaching question to lessen the weight of his testimony in regard to the value of the lands.

2. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — REQUESTS.

An instruction requested is properly refused, when its substance is included in the instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 651-659.]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN — DAMAGES.

Where land is damaged by the exercise of the power of eminent domain in the erection of a dam, the true measure of damages is the difference in the value of the land arising from the erection of the dam in its condition just prior to the erection of the dam and its value in its condition just after the erection of the dam.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 372-374.]

4. SAME — ELEMENTS OF DAMAGE.

Where the power of eminent domain is exercised in the erection of a dam for the purpose of generating water power, the jury, in assessing damages, may consider as an element of damages the manner in which the water flowed through and over the plaintiff's land as it related to and was connected with the flow over the defendant's lands, as constituting water power capable of use and development.

5. SAME.

Where the power of eminent domain is exercised in the erection of a dam for the purpose of generating water power, the jury should, in estimating the damages, consider the fact that a railroad owned an easement of right of way over the lands in question.

6. APPEAL — VERDICT — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Though the Supreme Court on appeal has the power, and though it is the court's duty, to set aside a verdict when there is no evidence to support it, the court will not disturb the verdict, when there is any evidence in support of it proper to be submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3928-3943.]

7. SAME.

Whether there is any evidence in support of the verdict proper to be submitted to the jury is a question "of law or legal inference," which the Supreme Court on appeal must pass on and decide, under Const. art. 4, § 8, giving the court jurisdiction to review on appeal any matter of law or legal inference.

8. SAME—DAMAGES—EXCESSIVENESS.

The Supreme Court will not on appeal set a verdict aside on the ground of excessiveness in assessment of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3944, 4546.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; McNeill, Judge.

Action by Mary Brown against the W. T. Weaver Power Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff alleged: That she was the owner in fee of a tract of land lying on the French Broad river in Buncombe county, a particular description of which is set forth. That she resided with her family on said land, cultivating a portion thereof. That the defendant company had erected and maintained a dam across said river in the vicinity of and below said land, by which the water was thrown back and ponded said land near to her residence. That by reason of said dam her land is flooded and damaged, and that, so long as the said dam is maintained, such injury and damage will continue; that by reason of said ponding, etc., the value of her land is diminished, and that she will continue to suffer in comfort and convenience, and in the destruction of her water power and of a valuable spring on her premises. That by ponding the water above said dam the defendant has taken possession of a part of said land and wrongfully withholds the same from her. She demands judgment for the same from her. She demands judgment for the possession of the portion of land so withheld. She also demands judgment for permanent and annual damage. The defendant by way of answer admits that it has erected and maintains the dam as alleged; denies the plaintiff's ownership of the land and the damages alleged to have been sustained, etc. For a defense it avers that it is a corporation duly chartered pursuant to the laws of the state, the charter being properly pleaded; that it has constructed, and has now in operation, a large and expensive dam across the French Broad river and a large plant with expensive machinery, and is engaged in furnishing electric power to the public lights in Bltmore, and operating the street railway system and lights in the city of Asheville, certain cotton mills, and other manufacturing plants; that in order to carry on this business it was and is necessary to erect and maintain across the French Broad river a dam to collect water and to operate such plant and machinery; that the portion of the lands described in the complaint situated between the roadbed of the Southern Railway and the western banks or margin of the said river is necessary, and is required, by the defendant for the purpose of constructing and operating its works; that it has made several efforts to agree with plaintiff upon a price for the said lands, etc. Defendant insists that by its charter the right to condemn said land to its use is conferred, and that plaintiff's remedy is confined to the procedure provided in the charter, etc. The following issues were submitted to the jury: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner and entitled to the possession of the lands and premises described in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (2) Was the land of plaintiff injured by the erection of the dam, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (3) What permanent damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained by reason of the erection of said dam and the ponding and backing of said river, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: $750. (4) What annual damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained by reason of the erection of said dam and the ponding and backing of said river, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: $150." The court reduced the amount assessed for permanent damage to $625. Defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict. Motion denied. Judgment was signed, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Davidson, Bourne & Parker and Tucker & Murphey, for appellant. Mark W. Brown and Zeb F. Curtis, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts). There was evidence tending to show the location of plaintiff's land, the location of the dam, and the effect upon the land by water ponding thereon, etc., in regard to its productive capacity, the crops raised upon it before and after the erection of the dam. There was also evidence tending to show that the quantity of land upon which water was ponded was about three acres, the rental value of the land, the effect of the water ponded on the land by the dam upon the health of plaintiff's family, etc. The testimony in all of these aspects was conflicting. The estimate of the value of the land and its rental value indicated great divergence of opinion. Only such portions as relate to the exceptions need be noticed. Several of the exceptions to the ruling of his honor upon the admission of testimony were not pressed in this court.

Mr. Ingle, a witness for the plaintiff, testified in regard to the value of real estate, etc. Upon cross-examination he stated that he had sold some worn-out upland in the neighborhood of plaintiff's land for $30 and $50 an acre, giving the location of the land; that the sales were made before the installation of the water power. Defendant thereupon proposed, upon cross-examination, to ask him if the erection of defendant's plant had not increased the value of the land "down there." The question was, upon objection, excluded, and defendant excepted. Defendant's counsel concede that this testimony was not competent for the purpose of offsetting against plaintiff's damage any benefit that may have accrued to her land by the erection of the plant, but states that his purpose was to impeach the witness and lessen the weight of his testimony in regard to value of lands. We are not quite sure how the testimony in regard to the sale of other lands in the vicinity of the plaintiff's, unless it was shown that in respect to the conditions, etc., they were similar, was relevant. The question in issue was the market value of the plaintiff's land. It seems that witness had given his opinion that it was worth $100 per acre. The defendant was permitted, without objection, to show that he had sold lands in that vicinity—worn-out and bottom land—at a smaller price; that such sales were made since the installation of the plant. We do not perceive how it would tend to impeach him to show that the erection of the plant had increased the value of lands "down there." The time of the sale, in respect to the erection of the plant, was shown. This enabled the jury to draw such reasonable inferences from the facts as were proper in estimating the weight to be given to his evidence in regard to the value of plaintiff's land. The exception cannot be sustained.

Plaintiff testified that her land between the river and the railroad is submerged all the year; that there is but a small portion over which a person can walk; that this was caused by the dam; that no part of the three acres was fit for agricultural purposes or pasturage now; that the erection of the dam had ruined her spring, which formerly afforded good water; that she has no other water. She testified that noxious odors came from the river, caused by ponding the water; that sickness, fevers, etc., had prevailed. She said that "before the dam was made this place was her home, and she was happy at it, and could have made her support out of the bottom, and now she has no good water and no support, and it rendered her unhappy, and she did not have her health this summer, and before she had always had her health; that through the wet weather one of the houses on the place had its walls moulded, and that her things got so damp and bad that they moulded in her trunk; that they had filled the yard up trying to prevent it; that it was not that way before the dam was built; and that there was no unpleasant odor before the dam was built." There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff had an orchard on the land from which she gathered and sold fruit, and that since the erection of the dam the trees had died; that she raised vegetables for market on the three acres, etc. The testimony in regard to the value of the orchard, fruit, etc., was conflicting. Mr. Hawkins testified that the three acres between the railroad and the river, if used for gardening purposes, would be worth about $100 per acre, and that included the orchard; that he had run a mill all of his life, and, if plaintiff had a water power in front of her place before the erection of the dam, it would be worth about $500 an acre at least, and it would be worth that much on the French Broad anywhere that you could put up water power nearly. He also testified, in regard to the effect of the water ponded upon the land on the orchard, that the trees were dead, and that it was not now worth anything for gardening or agricultural purposes; that he never measured the fall of the river from plaintiff's south line to her north line before the erection of the dam, but he guessed it was about 3½ feet; that he looked over it, but never measured it. He was examined at much length in respect to the flow of the water, etc. He testified that in forming his estimate of the value of the land he did not know that it was all subject to the right of way of the Southern Railway; that the fact that this land was subject to an easement of the railway company would affect its value after they took possession of it, because you could not farm there, but it would not affect its present damage; that it would not affect it unless the company built a house there, or took permanent possession of it.

Defendant introduced Mr. Stepp, who said that he was familiar with the land, passed it frequently, thought it worth for agricultural purposes $50 per acre; that the people asked a good deal more than that for it, but that was as much as it was worth for purpose of general farming. Mr. Weaver, president of defendant company, testified in regard to water power on the French Broad: That the fall from plaintiff's southern to her northern line was exactly 8¼ inches; that above this property for 1,900 feet there is an eddy or pool in the river, that is, there is a swag there, etc.; that from his knowledge of water powers and what it takes to make them commercially valuable, if the defendant's dam had not been built, the whole fall on plaintiff's property would have been of no value and could not have been utilized; that 8¼ inches from a slight rise in the river would be wiped out, and a wheel to give speed under such a fall would have to be an enormous affair. He testified at much length in regard to the power, concluding with the statement that it would be commercially impossible to develop 8¼ inches fall on the French Broad river, giving his reasons for the opinion, etc. He also testified in regard to the damage sustained by plaintiff in other respects. Defendant inroduced several other witnesses, whose testimony in regard to the river, the fall, etc., tended to sustain its view and contention. Plaintiff introduced witnesses in reply.

At the close of the evidence defendant submitted certain prayers asking special instructions. Those which were pressed in this court are: "The court charges the jury that they cannot be influenced in this action by any sentimental considerations which might arise from the fact that this was plaintiff's home, that she was satisfied with it and did not care to sell the three acres of her land lying between the railroad and the river; nor will the jury be influenced by what plaintiff would charge for her land or was willing to take for her land, except in so far as this consideration throws some light on the true value of the said land and the extent of the injury thereto resulting from the erection of defendant's dam." His honor declined to give this instruction. Defendant excepted. He instructed the jury, upon the issue in regard to permanent damage, that the burden was on the plaintiff to show what permanent damage she had sustained, and that in passing upon the evidence they would take into consideration all the evidence tending to show the ponding or obstruction of the water of the stream, the extent to which the plaintiff's land was overflowed and damaged by the water ponded by the erection of the dam, if caused by its erection. "You will take into consideration the testimony tending to show that the land was rendered unfit for agricultural or gardening purposes, the quantity of it so injured, the injury or destruction of the apple orchard, injury to the spring, if any; you will take also into consideration the evidence tending to show that plaintiff had water power on the river, and that of the defendant tending to show that her water power, if there, was of no commercial value, and, if there, upon the whole circumstances and all the testimony, you will determine its value, if you are of the opinion that it has value; taking into your estimate also in fixing the damages on this issue the evidence tending to show that the land of the plaintiff was subject to the right of way or easement for railroad purposes, or that a portion of it was; and you will also take into consideration, if you find from the testimony and by the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff's land was injured, and that the injury and damage was caused by the erection of the dam, and you further find that this injury and damage continues, then you will ascertain what the injury and damage from the erection and maintenance was, and the amount you reach will be your answer to the issue." In conclusion his honor said to the jury: "You are not to be influenced by sympathy on the one side or by prejudice or bias on the other side, if any such exist. The true measure of damages in this case is the difference in the value of the land of the plaintiff that is affected by the flowage or ponding back of the water, arising from the erection of defendant's dam in its condition just prior to the erection of said dam and its value in its condition just after the erection of said dam. That the burden of proof is on the plaintiff in this case, and she must establish by a preponderance of the evidence not only the fact that her lands have been damaged, but also that such injury was due to the erection of defendant's dam; and she must also establish by like preponderance of the evidence in what amount said lands have been damaged before she can recover in this action."

While we find no proposition of law in the instruction asked which is not correct, we think that his honor's instruction in respect to the manner in which the jury should consider the evidence pertaining to the permanent damage and the measure of such damage covers the principle involved in the instruction. It is too well settled to require or justify the citation of authority that the court is not required to give the instruction in the language of the prayer. It is well settled that when, for the purpose of meeting and providing for a public necessity, the citizen is compelled to sell his property or permit it to be subjected to a temporary or permanent burden, he is entitled, by way of compensation, to its actual market value. Lewis on Em. Domain, § 478. The difficulty arises, not so much in fixing the standard of the right, as in ascertaining what elements or factors may be shown in applying the standard. Certainly where by compulsory process and for the public good the state invades and takes the property of its citizen, in the exercise of its highest prerogative in respect to property, it should pay to him full compensation. The highest authorities are to that effect. "The market value of property is the price which it will bring when it is offered for sale by one who desires, but is not obliged, to sell it, and is bought by one who is under no necessity of having it. In estimating its value all the capabilities of the property and all the uses to which it may be applied or for which it is adapted may be considered, and not merely the condition it is in at the time and the use to which it is then applied by the owner." Lewis, Em. Dom., supra. Mr. Justice Field, in Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206, says: "In determining the value of land appropriated for public purposes, the same considerations are to be regarded as in a sale of property between private parties. The inquiry in such cases must be, what is the property worth in the market, viewed not merely with reference to the uses to which it is at the time applied, but with reference to the uses to which it is plainly adapted; that is to say, what is it worth from its availability for valuable uses? Property is not to be deemed worthless because the owner allows it to go to waste, or be regarded as valueless because he is unable to put it to any use. Others may be able to use it. Its capability of being made thus available gives it a market value which can be readily estimated." In L. R. Junction Ry. v. Woodruff, 49 Ark. 381, 5 S. W. 792, 4 Am. St. Rep. 51, it is said: "Since, then, the market value is the true criterion of damages, we are led to inquire, what is the market value? The word 'market' conveys the idea of selling, and the 'market value,' it would seem to follow, is the selling value. It is the price which an article will bring when offered for sale in the market. It is the highest price which those having the ability and the occasion to buy are willing to pay." Referring to the range which the testimony may take in ascertaining the market value, the court says: "As a general guide to the range which the testimony should be allowed to assume, we think it safe to say that the landowner should be allowed to state, and have his witnesses state, every fact concerning the property which he would naturally be disposed to adduce in order to place it in an advantageous light if he were attempting to negotiate a sale of it to a private individual. On the other hand, the jury and the opposing counsel, for the information of the jury, should be allowed to make every inquiry touching the property which one about to buy it would feel it to his interest to make." "If a tract, of which the whole or a part is taken for a public use, possesses a special value to the owner which can be measured by money, he is entitled to have that value considered in the estimate of compensation and damages." 15 Cyc. 724; Cooley, Const. Lien, §§ 567, 568. Plaintiff testified without objection that she could have rented the bottom land for $100, and had been offered that sum; that she depended upon it for her sole support, and would not have taken less than $100 a year for it. This last testimony, considered with what preceded it, was certainly competent to be considered by the jury in ascertaining its value. She also said that it was her home, and she was happy there with her spring of good water, and that she could make her support out of the bottom; that she did not have her health and was unhappy by reason of it. We do not understand that, under the instruction of his honor, the jury gave her compensation for the disturbance of her happy condition before the march of progress and the demands of a large city for water and lights deprived her of her bottom land and her spring. As said in Boom Co. v. Patterson, supra: "So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes, that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern it in all cases." The instruction given the jury for their guidance conforms to the rule approved by the authorities.

The defendant requested his honor to charge the jury: "If the jury should find as a fact that the plaintiff had not used or developed, and had not intended to use or to develop, any water power which she might have had on her river front, then they cannot consider the alleged destruction of such power as an element of damages in this case. That the jury cannot consider the value of plaintiff's property as a part of the water power system of the W. T. Weaver Power Company in estimating the damages occasioned by erection of defendant's dam, but only in its former condition and the difference in value between the land in its former condition and its value in its condition immediately after the erection of the dam." To the refusal to give this instruction defendant excepted. In this connection it appears in the case on appeal that, at the conclusion of the charge, counsel for defendant requested the court to caution the jury that they should not consider the 8½ inches of water power of plaintiff as a part of a great system, as argued to them by plaintiff's counsel. His honor in response said to the jury that they would take into consideration the water power on the one side and the easement on the other, and say upon the whole evidence what it is worth. To this defendant excepted. It is said in defendant's brief that testimony in regard to the value of the water power as a part of the Weaver power, as a system or whole, was excluded. The testimony sent up does not disclose the ruling upon this point, and we are not quite sure that we comprehend the extent of it. It is further stated in the brief that plaintiff's counsel, in the course of his argument, read to the jury a case bearing upon the question and attempted to apply the law as therein decided to this case; that the attention of the court was called to the argument, and he said that he could not prevent counsel from arguing the law to the jury. The judge was requested to caution the jury when he came to charge them. The action of his honor in that respect was as set out in the record. The question raised by the request for special instruction, although not very clearly presented by the testimony, is whether the jury should, in arriving at the plaintiff's compensation, consider the manner in which the water flowed through and over her land as it related to and connected with the flow over the defendant's lands, as constituting water power capable of use and development.

The defendant's contention, stated in the brief, is: "If plaintiff did not have a water power along her river front which could be independently developed, and had not set about acquiring rights which would enable her to combine her water power with that of other riparian proprietors along the river, at the time of the erection of the dam, she was not entitled to damages for any alleged destruction of her water power." This contention presents an interesting and, as applied to the condemnation of property, an important question. The rule is thus stated by Mr. Lewis: "The market value of property includes its value for any use to which it may be put. If, by reason of its surroundings, or its natural advantages, or its artificial improvements, or its intrinsic character, it is peculiarly adapted to some particular use, all the circumstances which make up this adaptability may be shown and the fact of such adaptation may be taken into consideration in estimating the compensation. Some of the authorities hold that its value for a particular use may be proved, but the proper inquiry is, what is its market value in view of any use to which it may be applied and of all the uses to which it is adapted?" The question was presented in San Diego Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. 372, 3 L. R. A. 83, in which it was sought to condemn land for the purpose of a reservoir. It was insisted that the value of the land as a reservoir site should not be considered because there was no practicable site for a dam on the land; the only way in which it could be so used being in connection with plaintiff's land. The court disposed of the objection by saying: "While it is true that defendant's land had no value for reservoir purposes except in connection with the land of the plaintiff, it is equally true that the plaintiff's land had comparatively little value for such purposes except in connection with the land of the defendant. * * * Suppose, for illustration, that the two sides of a cañon suitable for reservoir purposes were owned respectively by two persons who are joined as defendants in a proceeding to condemn the land by a water company which did not own any of the property. It would not be pretended that such company could take the property at its value for grazing or agricultural purposes merely because it was owned by different persons. * * * Now there is no difference in principle between such a case and the one where the company itself owns half the cañon and is seeking to acquire the other half. Nor is there any difference in principle where the company owns somewhat more than half, or the more valuable portion. The logical result of the argument for the appellant is that, if the company owned but a small portion of the cañon, it could acquire all the rest, without regard to the value for the only purpose for which it might have much value, merely because the other party did not own the whole and had not been able or did not choose to go into the business themselves." This case was followed in Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 510, 13 S. W. 123, 8 L. R. A. 123. In Boom Co. v. Patterson, supra, the question was whether the adaptability of certain islands in the Mississippi river for boom purposes should be considered in estimating their value. The court held that it was a "circumstance which the owner had a right to insist upon as an element in estimating the value of his lands." The same contention was made, as in this case, that the charter conferred upon the company the privilege of erecting its boom at the place of its location, and this prevented the defendant from utilizing his lands for that purpose. In reply to the argument the court said: "The contention on the part of the plaintiff in error is that such adaptability should not be considered, assuming that this adaptability could never be made available by other persons by reasons of its supposed exclusive privileges; in other words, that by the grant of exclusive privileges to the company the owner is deprived of the value which the lands, by their adaptability for boom purposes, previously possessed, and therefore should not now receive anything from the company on account of such adaptability upon a condemnation of the lands. We do not think that the owner, by the charter of the company, lost this element of value in his property." Goodin v. C. & W. Canal Co., 18 Ohio St. 169, 98 Am. Dec. 95; Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30.

The president of the defendant company testified that the plaintiff's land between the railroad and the western bank of the river was necessary to the operations of the company. While there is no direct evidence of its value as a part of the water power, the defendant had the benefit of the testimony of experts that in no point of view was it of any commercial value. His honor simply submitted the question to the jury to be considered as an element of value. We find no error in his ruling in this respect. In regard to the effect of the easement owned by the Southern Railway over the land, the court expressly told the jury to consider it in estimating the damages. This was proper. Forbes v. Com., 172 Mass. 289, 52 N. E. 511. The condemnation for the purpose of building and operating a railroad did not deprive the plaintiff of the use of her land except to the extent that it was necessary for the operation of the road. For any additional burden she was entitled to compensation to be measured with reference to the limited easement of the railroad. Blue v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 644, 23 S. E. 275; Phillips v. Telegraph Co., 130 N. C. 513, 41 S. E. 1022, 89 Am. St. Rep. 868; Hodges v. Tel. Co., 133 N. C. 225, 45 S. E. 572.

The defendant strongly urges upon us the exception to his honor's refusal to set the verdict aside. There can be no controversy in respect to the power and duty of this court to set a verdict aside when there is no evidence to support it. Whitted v. Fuquay, 127 N. C. 68, 37 S. E. 141. It is equally well settled that, when there is any evidence proper to be submitted to the jury, this court has no power to interfere. Whether there is such evidence is a question "of law or legal inference." This question, we must, in the discharge of our constitutional duty, pass upon and decide. Const. art. 4, § 8. The defendant's exception assumes that the jury, in estimating the value of the land and the damages, were confined to the rental value for agricultural purposes. As we have seen, other elements of value entered into the estimate and were submitted to the jury. There was competent and legal evidence fit for their consideration in regard to these matters. If the defendant desired more specific instructions in respect to the evidence, it should have asked for them. We are impressed with the language of the court in Railroad v. Woodruff, supra, in disposing of a similar motion: "This is a delicate duty in any case, and especially so in a case when the sole issue is one as to value. This is so peculiarly within the province of the jury, it is a matter in which we can act with so little intelligence or satisfaction, and there is so little finally about any judgment we could render on this point, that nothing but an extreme case would justify our interference. If there was no evidence to support the verdict, we would not hesitate to exert our authority to set it aside. It must be very seldom, however, that the verdict is entirely unsupported by evidence in a case where there is but a single and simple issue submitted to the jury, as in this class of cases."

* * * As long as witnesses differ so widely in their opinion as to values, and as long as litigants measure values so entirely by the standard of self-interest, we cannot hope for verdicts that shall be satisfactory to both parties. The utmost to which we can hope to attain is to sometimes reach a verdict that is unsatisfactory to both parties." In that case the estimates vibrated between $1,500 and $50,000; the jury fixed the value at $20,000. The attention of the writer was called some years ago to a case in which the commissioners, appointed to assess the value of land condemned for a street in a progressive town, fixed the amount at $1,250. The town authorities not being content with the assessment sent another jury to assess the value. They fixed it at $250. They were all intelligent, honest men and, with no change in conditions, reached conclusions so divergent. It sometimes occurs that appeals disclose, upon the record, verdicts which seem to be excessive, but this court has not, so far as we are informed, assumed the power to set them aside. When an erroneous rule for assessing damages is given the jury, it is our duty to direct a new trial, as in Carter v. Railroad (at this term) 52 S. E. 642. We do not find any error in this respect. The plaintiff must part with her land submerged by water thrown over it by the dam, and whatever value resided in the flow of the water affected by the conformation of the bottom and banks of the river must be destroyed to meet a public necessity. Counsel informed us upon the argument that a very large, valuable, and, to the public use, important motive power has been developed by defendant company generating electricity which is utilized for lighting the streets and operating the street railways of populous towns and cities and the machinery of several cotton and other manufacturing plants. The state has conferred upon the company, to enable it to accomplish these beneficent results, one of the highest and most dangerous of its sovereign powers—that of eminent domain. An essential and elementary condition precedent annexed to the exercise of this power is that the owner of property who is compelled to surrender it shall have full compensation. His honor in the exercise of his discretion reduced the amount assessed for permanent damages to $625. We can see no ground, as matter of law, authorizing us to disturb the verdict.

We have disposed of the case upon the theory that by suing for permanent damages the plaintiff concedes the right of defendant to acquire a permanent easement in her land. The judgment confers such easement upon defendant. She recovers, by way of permanent damages, compensation in full therefor. It was agreed by counsel that the annual damage accruing prior to the beginning of the action should be assessed for two years, and the judgment is drawn accordingly. When the judgment is discharged, the defendant acquires an easement to overflow plaintiff's land to the extent set out in the judgment. Ridley v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 996, 24 S. E. 730, 32 L. R. A. 708; Candler v. Electric Co., 135 N. C. 12, 47 S. E. 114.

(73 S. C. 194)

STATE ex rel. SCHRODER, County Treasurer, v. BURNS, Court Clerk.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 22, 1906.)

1. STATUTES — LOCAL LAWS — COUNTY OFFICERS.

Act Feb. 22, 1905, § 33 (24 St. at Large, p. 927), providing that the salary of the clerk of the court of Oconee county shall be $1,350 per year, payable monthly, and that he shall collect all fees and costs and pay the same over to the county treasurer, is unconstitutional, as violating Const. art. 3, § 34, providing that the General Assembly shall not enact local laws fixing the amount of compensation to any county officer.

2. SAME—PARTIAL INVALIDITY—EFFECT.

Act Feb. 22, 1905 (24 St. at Large, p. 918), fixing the amount of compensation to be paid county officers, is not unconstitutional because of the invalidity of section 33 (page 927), providing for the salaries of officers of Oconee county.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Oconee County; Dantzler, Judge.

Application by the state, on the relation of W. J. Schroder, county treasurer of Oconee county, for writ of mandamus against O. R. D. Burns, clerk of court. From an order refusing the writ, relator appeals. Affirmed.

Jaynes & Shelor, for appellant. Stribling & Herndon, for respondent.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from an order of Judge Dantzler denying relator's application for a writ of mandamus to require respondent to pay over to relator certain amounts collected by him as fees, costs, and commissions, and to make and file certain monthly reports, as required by an act of the General Assembly, approved February 22, 1905 (24 St. at Large, p. 918). Judge Dantzer held that so much of section 33 (page 927), of said act as undertakes to provide for the compensation of the clerk of the court for Oconee county is void, because violative of article 3, § 34, and for this reason denied the writ. From such decision the relator appeals.

The act in question is entitled "An act to fix the amount of compensation to be paid to the county officers of the various counties of the state," 24 St. at Large, p. 918. Section 33 of said act, providing for the salaries of the officers for Oconee county, contains this provision with reference to the compensation of the clerk of the court: "Clerk of the court, thirteen hundred and fifty dollars, payable monthly: Provided, that he shall collect all fees, costs and commissions due to him by virtue of his office and pay same over to the county treasurer on monthly statements verified by him, which shall be a part of the ordinary county funds."

The question is whether this claim in said act violates section 34 of article 3 of the Constitution, which declares: "The General Assembly of this state shall not enact local or special laws concerning any of the following subjects, or for any of the following purposes, to wit * * * X. To fix the amount or manner of compensation to be paid to any county officer, except that the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation in proportion to the population and necessary services required. XI. In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted. XII. The General Assembly shall forthwith enact general laws concerning said subjects for said purposes, which shall be uniform in their operations: Provided, that nothing contained in this section shall prohibit the General Assembly from enacting special provisions in general laws." The manifest purpose of this provision of the Constitution is to uproot the great evil of local and special legislation. Ten subjects are therein enumerated (which include the matter of compensation to be paid county officers, involved in this case), as to which there is express inhibition of local or special legislation, and, in order to further extend the inhibition, it is declared that there shall be no special law on any other subject where a general law can be made applicable. As to the 10 expressly inhibited subjects of local or special legislation, the General Assembly is directed to enact general laws, subject, however, to the provision that such general laws shall be uniform. We understand that such uniformity must exist throughout the state as distinguished from a uniformity of operation within a county or other subdivision of the state, since the whole scheme of this article of the Constitution is to bring about as far as possible general laws operating with substantial uniformity throughout the state. Then follows the somewhat perplexing proviso "that nothing contained in the section shall prohibit the General Assembly from enacting special provisions in general laws." The difficulty is to harmonize the express inhibition of local or special legislation as to the enumerated subjects with the provision allowing special provisions in general laws, and at the same time preserve uniformity of legislation with respect to the enumerated subjects. To reconcile these apparently conflicting ideas, we must construe "special provisions in general laws" so as not to practically nullify the purpose to uproot local or special legislation as to certain subjects and to secure general laws thereon having uniform operation throughout the state. We understand the language, "special provisions in general laws," to mean provisions in general laws, which, while having a limited application, must not be so inconsistent with the general scheme or purpose of the statute as to prevent substantial uniformity of operation throughout the state. Such was the view of the court as declared in State v. Queen, 62 S. C. 247, 251, 40 S. E. 553, 554, wherein Mr. Justice Gary, speaking for the court, used this language in reference to this section of the Constitution: "The main object was to secure uniformity as to the subjects therein mentioned, and any legislation relating to those subjects which substantially militates against uniformity must necessarily be declared unconstitutional." In the case of Grocery Company v. Burnet, 61 S. C. 205, 211, 39 S. E. 381, 384, 58 L. R. A. 687, this court declared: "It may be regarded as settled that local or special statutes upon any of the 10 enumerated subjects above will be declared void, and that the express prohibition of special legislation on said subjects shall not be practically annulled or evaded under any form or guise of legislation. State v. Higgins, 51 S. C. 51, 28 S. E. 15, 38 L. R. A. 561; Dean v. Spartanburg County, 59 S. C. 110, 37 S. E. 226; Nance v. Anderson County, 60 S. C. 501, 39 S. E. 5." In the case of Grocery Co. v. Burnet, supra, and in the case of Severance v. Murphy, 67 S. C. 410, 46 S. E. 35, the court considered the matter of special provisions in general laws in reference to subjects not among the 10 inhibited, and as to such other subjects there must necessarily be a wider range for legislative discretion. In State v. Queen, supra, there was an apparent attempt to make a general law with respect to 1 of the 10 inhibited subjects of local or special legislation, and is therefore more analogous to this case; but in State v. Queen the statute exempted the county of Aiken wholly from its operation, and so failed to be a general law; but the court held that, even if the provisions of the statute objected to could be regarded as special provisions in a general law, they violated the principle of uniformity.

The act in question, considered as a whole, may be regarded as a general statute, as it operates throughout the state in providing compensation for the various county officers. The salaries or compensation provided are in the act declared to be graded in proportion to the population and necessary service required. With reference to clerks of the court, the general scheme or purpose of the statute was to give said clerks salaries in lieu of fees, etc., chargeable against the respective counties as distinguished from fees, etc., which are payable by parties in civil cases, for recording, etc. In Abbeville county, for example, the salary of the clerk from the court is fixed at $300, and in the county of Anderson at $500; but in Oconee county the salary is $1,320, in lieu of all fees, costs, and commissions due him by virtue of his office, which he is required to collect and pay over to the county treasurer as ordinary county funds. No other clerk of court is required to pay over to the county treasurer all his fees, etc., from whatever source derived. This provision as to Oconee county is wholly different from the general plan and purpose of the act, and violates the requirement as to uniformity. We therefore agree with the circuit court that so much of section 33 of said act as herein referred to is unconstitutional. But as it is the duty of the court to sustain the validity of an act of the General Assembly in so far as it is possible to do so, we do not regard the vice in the particular clause under consideration as sufficient to destroy the whole statute, since it is separable from the other provisions of the statute relating to Oconee county and the other counties of the state.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

(73 S. C. 173)

ABLE v. SOUTHERN RY. et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 5, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—JOINT TORTS.

A master and servant are jointly liable for the willful tort of the servant committed in the scope of his employment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 1238.]

2. REMOVAL OF CAUSES—SHAM DEFENDANT.

In an action against a master for willful tort committed by his servant in his employment, the servant is a proper party, and the case is not removable to the United States court on the theory that he is a sham defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Removal of Causes, § 79.]

3. TRIAL—CALENDARS—HEARING OF DEMURRER.

Though Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 279, par. 2, provides for three calendars, and distinguishes the causes which shall be placed on each, and a demurrer should be heard on a different calendar from that on which issues of fact to be tried by a jury are placed, where a demurrer to a pleading in a cause properly on calendar No. 1 because of issues of fact to be tried by a jury is heard without a transfer to calendar No. 2, it is a mere irregularity, not affecting the jurisdiction and affording no sufficient ground for reversal.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Able, administratrix of Oliver C. Able, against the Southern Railway and James Alexander. From an order refusing to remove cause to the United States court, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. L. Abney, E. M. Thomson, and R. H. Welch, for appellant. G. T. Graham and J. Wm. Thurmond, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was brought by the administratrix of Oliver C. Able for $21,000 damages for his death by the alleged wrongful acts of the defendant railway company and its codefendant Alexander. The complaint alleges that the defendant railway company is a corporation duly created and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia, and owned and operated a railroad running through the town of Leesville, in the county of Lexington, in this state; that the defendant Alexander was a servant in its employ as engineer of its passenger locomotive engine which struck and killed plaintiff's intestate and operated the same. The allegation of the complaint which alleges the joint tort and which is material to this appeal is as follows: "That on or about the 13th day of December, 1903, the said Oliver C. Able, deceased, plaintiff's intestate herein, was struck and killed at a public crossing, and traveled place within the corporate limits of the town of Leesville, in the county of Lexington and state of South Carolina, by a locomotive engine with a train of passenger cars attached thereto, operated, controlled and managed by the defendants. And the plaintiff alleges that the death of her intestate, the said Oliver C. Able, was caused by the joint and concurrent, negligent, reckless, and wanton conduct and management of the said locomotive engine by the defendants, in that said defendants ran said locomotive and train of cars on and over said railroad track and in the corporate limits of the said town of Leesville at a negligent and reckless rate of speed, and caused said locomotive engine and train of cars to approach the public crossing in Green street, in the town of Leesville aforesaid, the place at which plaintiff's intestate was walking, at a negligent and reckless rate of speed, and then and there negligently, recklessly, wantonly, and willfully caused said locomotive engine to strike and kill plaintiff's intestate, that while plaintiff's intestate was in plain view of the defendants and was actually seen by them in ample time for them to have avoided injuring him, and while plaintiff's intestate's back was toward the said locomotive and train of cars which was approaching the plaintiff's said intestate at said public crossing, and while the defendants saw and knew the perilous position of her said intestate and could easily have avoided injuring him, but regardless of their duty in that respect, and regardless of the rights of the plaintiff's intestate, and in utter disregard of human life, and without ringing the bell or sounding the whistle of said locomotive, and without observing any care or caution whatsoever, the said defendant ran said locomotive engine and train of cars over said railroad track within the corporate limits of the town of Leesville aforesaid at a negligent and reckless rate of speed, and then and there negligently, recklessly, and wantonly caused said locomotive engine to strike and kill plaintiff's said intestate at said public crossing on said railroad track as he was in the act of stepping off of said railroad track at said public crossing."

Within due time, on April 27, 1904, the defendant Southern Railway Company filed its petition and bond for the removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina. The railway company on April 28th answered the complaint, denying its allegations and pleading contributory negligence. On the same day the defendant Alexander demurred to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him. On the call of the cause on calendar No. 1, Hon. R. O. Purdy, the presiding judge, refused the petition for removal, and the appeal involves chiefly the correctness of this ruling.

As stated in appellants' argument, the petition of the railway company for removal alleges (1) that the complaint averred no fact to charge the defendant railway company with participation in alleged willful and wanton acts of its codefendant Alexander and showed a separable controversy; and (2) upon information and belief that its codefendant Alexander was made defendant to the suit, under the allegation that he is a resident and citizen of the state of South Carolina, solely for the purpose of preventing the removal of the cause to the United States court, and that he is merely a nominal or sham defendant and not a necessary or indispensable party to the action, that the said codefendant cannot be made to respond to any judgment that may be had against him in the cause, and that the petitioner does not believe it is intended eventually to obtain a judgment against him. The first ground was not urged in the argument for the reason, no doubt, that the conclusive opinion of the circuit judge is fully sustained by the cases of Schumpert v. Ry. Co., 65 S. C. 332, 43 S. E. 818, 95 Am. St. Rep. 802; Carson v. Ry. Co., 68 S. C. 55, 46 S. E. 525; Id., 194 U. S. 186, 24 Sup. Ct. 609, 48 L. Ed. 907. Under these authorities the master and servants are jointly liable for the willful tort of the servant committed in the scope of his employment while in the master's service. The application of this principle also disposes of the second ground.

If a tort was committed, and the defendant Alexander is responsible therefor jointly with the railway company, he is a proper party to the action, and is in no legal sense a sham defendant because a judgment could not be collected from him for lack of property. No one can be a sham defendant who is legally liable in the action. It is not averred in the petition that the facts alleged in the complaint constituting the cause of action against Alexander and giving the state court jurisdiction are not stated in good faith, but pretensively, as, for example, that Alexander is known to the plaintiff not to be a resident of the state, or not to have been the engineer in charge of the locomotive, and was fraudulently made a party to defeat the right of the railway company to have the cause removed.

The view of the defendant railway company that, though Alexander may be jointly liable as a matter of fact and law, yet he was a sham defendant, because the plaintiff, as defendant believes, does not expect to collect her money from him, but from the railway company, is erroneous. If all this were proved, it could not confer upon Alexander or any one else the right to have the action against him dismissed. The following clear statement of the principle under consideration made by Chief Justice Fuller in the beginning of the opinion in Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Dixon, 179 U. S. 131, 135, 21 Sup. Ct. 67, 45 L. Ed. 123, is conclusive: "The question to be determined is whether the Court of Appeals of Kentucky erred in affirming the action of the Boyd circuit court in denying the application to remove. And that depends on whether a separable controversy appeared on the face of plaintiff's petition or declaration. If the liability of the defendants, as set forth in that pleading, was joint, and the cause of action entire, then the controversy was not separable as matter of law, and plaintiff's purpose in joining Chalkey and Sidles was immaterial. The petition for removal did not charge fraud in that regard, or set up any facts and circumstances indicative thereof, and plaintiff's motive in the performance of a lawful act was not open to inquiry." Carson v. Railway Co., supra; Powers v. Railway Co., 169 U. S. 92, 18 Sup. Ct. 264, 42 L. Ed. 673.

From the foregoing discussion it is also obvious that the complaint states a cause of action against the engineer Alexander, and his demurrer was properly overruled. He insists, however, that, as the cause had not been docketed on calendar No. 2, the circuit judge was without jurisdiction to hear the demurrer against his objection upon the call of the case on calendar No. 1. The second paragraph of section 279 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, provides specifically for three calendars, and distinguishes the causes to be placed on each.

Though the different calendars and the character of the causes properly on each are recognized in the same section of the Code of 1902, the second paragraph, providing for the three calendars, is entirely omitted. Enough of the section remains, however, taken in connection with other sections of the statute, to make it clear that a demurrer should, in the regular conduct of the business of the court, be heard on a different calendar from that on which issues of fact to be tried by a jury are placed. When there has been a demurrer to a pleading in a cause properly docketed on calendar No. 1, because the issues of fact are for trial by a jury, if the cause has not been also docketed on calendar No. 2 for the hearing of the demurrer, either party may move to have it docketed on calendar No. 2 for the hearing of the demurrer. Threatt v. Brewer Co., 42 S. C. 92, 19 S. E. 1009. In this case the defendant merely objected to hearing the demurrer on calendar No. 1, but made no motion to docket on calendar No. 2. There was no showing that the defendant was taken by surprise or was deprived of a full hearing, and hence hearing the demurrer on calendar No. 1 was at most an irregularity in no wise affecting the jurisdiction and affording no sufficient ground for reversal. Ward v. Telegraph Company, 62 S. C. 274, 40 S. E. 670.

The judgment of this court is that the orders appealed from be affirmed.

FRASIER v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 20, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO FREIGHT—LIMITING LIABILITY—ACTION BY CONSIGNEE.

In an action against a carrier for injury to a horse shipped, where the carrier sets up a special contract limiting its liability, the consignee may show the contract was not binding on him because not signed by the shipper until after the injury, and on agreement that it should not affect the rights of the consignee.

2. SAME—SPECIAL CONTRACT.

Where, in an action to recover for injury to freight shipped from a foreign state, the carrier sets up a special contract, the consignee may show that the contract was void under the laws of the foreign state without pleading such laws.

3. TRIAL—STATUTES—FOREIGN LAWS—CONSTRUCTION.

The construction of the laws of a foreign state is for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 327.]

4. CARRIERS—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

In an action by a consignee for damages arising from injuries to freight shipped from a foreign state, the contract must be construed according to the laws of the state in which it was executed.

5. SAME—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

Under the laws of Georgia a carrier cannot bind the shipper by a contract limiting the liability of the carrier, unless it is signed by the shipper at the time of the shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 678, 691-694.]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CONTRACT OF CARRIER—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

Act Feb. 23, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81), providing a penalty against a common carrier for failing to adjust and pay within a specified time the claim of a shipper for loss or damage to goods, is not unconstitutional as denying to common carriers the equal protection of the laws.

7. CARRIERS—INJURY TO LIVE STOCK—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a carrier for injury to a horse shipped, an instruction that if defendant furnished a safe means of unloading the horse in question, and the injury did not occur on account of the unsafe condition of the same, plaintiff could not recover, was erroneous, in eliminating the question whether defendant was negligent in furnishing a suitable place for unloading and in the use of the appliances at hand.

8. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction assuming the existence of a contract in dispute was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 420-423.]

9. CARRIERS—UNLOADING LIVE STOCK—LIABILITY OF CARRIER.

Under a special contract making it the duty of a shipper to unload a horse, if the agent of the carrier is present and assisting in unloading the horse in an unsafe way, and the horse is injured, the carrier is liable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 924.]

10. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMING DISPUTED FACTS.

Where a special contract was denied, an instruction that the shipper ratified the special contract limiting its liability by accepting reduced rates of freight was properly refused.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; J. A. McDonald, Special Judge.

Action by T. B. Frasier against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Simpson and Parker & Greene, for appellant. Wm. N. Graydon, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff brought this action for damages for loss of a horse, which died from injuries received in transportation from Augusta, Ga., to Mt. Carmel, S. C., and for the penalty of $50, as provided by statute, for failing to adjust and pay said claim within ninety days. The jury rendered a verdict for the whole amount claimed, including the penalty, and defendant now seeks to reverse the judgment thereon.

1. The first exception alleges error in refusing to strike out of the deposition of plaintiff's witness James S. Carswell so much of the testimony therein as sought to show when the contract of shipment was signed by him and why the same was signed. It is contended that plaintiff, having introduced said contract in evidence as the basis of his action, should not have been allowed to vary its terms, or impeach it, or relieve himself of its obligation. This exception is founded on a misconception of the circumstances. The plaintiff did not make said contract the basis of his action. The defendant by its answer set up a special contract limiting its liability, and evidence of such contract was sought to be brought out by defendant on cross-examination. The plaintiff was properly allowed to offer testimony that the said alleged contract was not binding on plaintiff, and that it was not signed by the shipper until 10 days after the shipment and after the injury to the horse, and with the understanding that it would not be prejudicial to plaintiff's claim for damages.

2. The second exception assigns error in allowing the plaintiff to offer in evidence the Code of Georgia, when he had not pleaded the matters therein sought to be proved. The general rule is, "where a party seeks either to recover or defend under a foreign law, such law must be pleaded and proved like any other fact, since the court cannot ex officio take notice of the laws of a foreign state." 9 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 542. The plaintiff's cause of action did not arise in Georgia, nor does the complaint seek to establish a right founded on the laws of Georgia. He sues in tort to recover damages arising from a breach of the carrier's general duty under the law to safely deliver the freight consigned to him, a breach which occurred in this state. The law of Georgia not being essential to plaintiff's cause of action, it was not necessary to plead the same. The plaintiff merely sought to avail himself of the law of Georgia in reply to defendant's answer setting up a special contract made in Georgia, in which case it was clearly admissible for plaintiff, without having pleaded the same, to prove the law of Georgia in order to show the invalidity of the legal effect of the special contract alleged by defendant. In the case of Rosemand v. Southern Ry., 66 S. C. 92, 44 S. E. 574, the cause of action arose in Georgia, and it was necessary to allege the laws of Georgia as one of the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action. In the case of Association v. Rice, 68 S. C. 239, 47 S. E. 63, while it was not necessary for the plaintiff to anticipate a defense by way of counterclaim and allege in his complaint the law of Virginia, yet, inasmuch as the Code requires a reply to a counterclaim, if it is to be contested, it was necessary to plead in reply to the counterclaim the law of Virginia relied on to defeat said counterclaim. These cases cited by appellant illustrate the general rule stated, but do not apply to this case, which is governed by the rule stated in Price v. Railroad, 38 S. C. 210, 17 S. E. 732, which allowed plaintiff to offer evidence to invalidate a release set up in the answer without having pleaded in reply, because under section 189 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1902 plaintiff was not required to reply to such defense, since the allegation of new matter in the answer, not relating to a counterclaim, is to be deemed controverted by the adverse party.

The third exception charges error in refusing defendant's motion for nonsuit on the ground that the evidence showed conclusively that the horse injured was not the property of the plaintiff at the time of the injury. There is no ground for this exception. The witness Carswell, who shipped the horse to plaintiff, testified that he sold the horse to plaintiff for $125, and plaintiff testified he gave that sum for the horse.

The fourth exception imputes error in charging the jury as follows: "The statute law of Georgia has been introduced in evidence, which provides that a common carrier cannot limit its common-law liability, but they can make express contracts and be bound thereby. I charge you under that statute, and it construes the law of Georgia, that, when a bill of lading is issued and is signed only by the common carrier, the shipper is bound by all of the general provisions in that bill of lading, whether signed by the shipper or not. But any special contract limiting its liability, there must be a signing of the contract by the shipper, or he must expressly assent to the terms of the contract. The mere acceptance of a bill of lading by the shipper, and his acting upon it, will bind him so far as a general contract is concerned, but it will not bind him as to limiting the liability of the common carrier, but he must sign it at the time of shipping or expressly assent thereto. I charge you that is the law of Georgia. If you find from the testimony that at the time of this shipment this bill of lading was delivered to Mr. Carswell or some one acting as his agent, and he shipped it under the bill of lading, he is bound by the general provisions of that bill of lading, and so is the plaintiff in this case." The specifications of error are: (1) That plaintiff could not avail himself of the law of Georgia without having pleaded the same; (2) that the charge was upon the facts, in violation of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution; (3) that it was competent to show a ratification of the contract after shipment, such as would bind the plaintiff. The first specification above cannot be sustained for reasons given in considering the second exception.

3. The second specification cannot be sustained because the testimony as to the law of Georgia was documentary, and it was the duty of the court to construe it. "While it is true that what is the law of another state is a fact to be proven (Horne v. McRae, 53 S. C. 51, 30 S. E. 701), yet it is not a charge upon the facts for the court to construe the language of documentary evidence such as the statute of another state." State v. Whittle, 59 S. C. 304, 37 S. E. 923.

4. There was no evidence of any act on the part of the plaintiff or his alleged agent which tended to show a ratification of the alleged special contract, unless such ratification could be inferred from the mere acceptance of the bill of lading containing the special contract signed only by the carrier. The evidence was undisputed that the shipper did not sign the contract until 10 days after the shipment, when the shipper and the agent of defendant knew of the injury to the horse, and after representation by defendant's agent that such signing by the shipper would not hurt plaintiff's case. "A common carrier cannot limit his legal liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts given or tickets sold. He may make an express contract and will then be governed thereby." In order, therefore, to make a valid contract in Georgia so as to bind the shipper to stipulations limiting the carrier's common-law liability for injury not the result of the carrier's negligence, the shipper must expressly assent to such stipulations. "Mere acceptance of the bill of lading does not establish the shipper's assent to stipulations of this kind." Central Railroad v. Hasselkus (Ga.) 17 S. E. 838, 44 Am. St. Rep. 37. The special contract sought to be established by defendant contained, among other things, a provision limiting liability for damages for loss or injury to the horse to $60. Such a contract when fairly made upon consideration is binding on the shipper. Johnstone v. Railway Co., 39 S. C. 56, 17 S. E. 512. The circuit court, however, charged in effect that the existence and validity of the special contract set up in this case must be governed by the law of Georgia, where it was made, and that the shipper would not be bound by such stipulation in the bill of lading unless he expressly assented thereto. We think the circuit court was correct in this, and that all exceptions by appellant based upon a contrary view must be overruled. The general rule on this subject is that clearly stated in Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 406, 412, 23 L. Ed. 245. "Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, or validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitations, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought." In Lery v. Boas, 2 Bailey, 219, 23 Am. Dec. 134, approved in Ayres v. Audubon, 2 Hill, 604, it is declared that: "The lex loci contractus is to be observed in deciding on the nature, validity, and construction of the contract; but the form of the action, the course of judicial proceeding, and the time when the action must be commenced, must be directed exclusively to the laws of the state in which the action is brought." This general rule is well settled and understood, but the real contention in this case is whether the requirement by the Georgia law that the shipper shall expressly assent to the special contract, touches the validity of the contract or only the remedy upon it or the evidence of it. Upon a similar contract the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Hoadley v. Northern Trans. Co., 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106, held that the question was one of evidence, and was to be determined by the law of the place where the suit is brought; while in Missouri, in the case of Hartmann v. Louisville, etc., Ry. Co., 39 Mo. App. 88, it was held that the question related to the validity of the contract, and was governed by the law of the place of contract. We think this latter rule is the correct one. The contract was alleged to have been made in Georgia concerning a shipment from that state into South Carolina. It was therefore not to be fully performed in South Carolina, but was to be at least partly performed in Georgia, where made. It therefore falls within the general rule stated in 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1506: "The law of the place where it is made and is to be performed, either in whole or in part, governs as to its nature, validity, and interpretation." To treat the question as relating to the remedy, or the evidence of the contract, is to assume that a contract has been made to be evidenced and enforced, whereas the real question is whether any such contract exists. By the law of Georgia, there is no contract limiting common-law liability, unless the shipper expressly assents thereto.

5. The seventh, ninth, and thirteenth exceptions raise the question that the act of February 23, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81), providing a penalty against a common carrier for failing to adjust and pay within a specified time the claim of a shipper for loss or damage to goods while in the possession of the carrier, is unconstitutional, in that it denies to common carriers the equal protection of the laws. This question has been recently discussed in the case of Seegers v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. (decision filed November 13, 1905) 52 S. E. 797, and the constitutionality of the act was sustained, and we are satisfied that such conclusion is correct.

6. The appellant's fourteenth exception alleges error in refusing to instruct the jury as follows: "That under the contract offered in evidence in the case, it is provided that the owner or shipper, shall unload the horse shipped, and if in so doing, through any act or omission on his part solely the horse was injured, the plaintiff cannot recover." This request is faulty in assuming the existence of a special contract, a matter in controversy. Furthermore, the provision in the alleged contract was "that the owner and shipper is to load, transfer, and unload said stock, with the assistance of the company's agent or agents, at his own risk." It is a primary duty of the carrier to load and unload freight, and it cannot transfer to the shipper or owner the consequences of its own negligence in these particulars. Crawford v. Railway Co., 56 S. C. 149, 34 S. E. 80. The complaint was based upon the charge that plaintiff's horse was injured through the negligence of the defendant in failing to provide a safe and suitable place at which to unload said horse, and in failing to provide a safe and suitable passageway or gang-plank on which to unload said horse, and in carelessly leading said horse over a slick piece of iron. The evidence tended to show that the horse slipped and fell and was injured while being led from the car by plaintiff and defendant's agent over a slick piece of sheet iron used to connect the car with the platform. It may be true that, if the injury to the horse was caused solely by the negligence of the plaintiff while unloading, there should not be a recovery; but the request to charge was not so framed as to submit such question.

7. The fifteenth exception charges error in refusing to instruct the jury in these words: "If the jury find that the defendant furnished a safe and suitable means of unloading the horse in question, and that the injury did not occur on account of the unsafe condition of the same, the plaintiff cannot recover." This request was incorrect in eliminating the question whether the defendant was negligent in furnishing a safe and suitable place for unloading and in the use of the appliances at hand. The court charged in lieu of such request: "If they furnished safe and suitable means to unload the horse, and an injury did occur, and did not occur from unsafe and unsuitable appliances, or from the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover." This modification of defendant's erroneous request to charge is not to be construed as leaving it open to the jury to consider acts of negligence on the part of the defendant not alleged in the complaint, but is to be construed with reference to the negligence alleged in the complaint.

8. The sixteenth exception assigns error in declining to charge the jury as follows: "If the defendant had suitable facilities for unloading stock, and the plaintiff failed to use the same, he cannot complain of the company on that account, but is himself responsible for any damage caused by a failure to use the same." The request was properly refused, as it is the duty of the carrier not only to furnish suitable facilities for unloading stock, but to use such facilities with due care. The request to charge was doubtless framed under appellant's view that plaintiff had made a valid contract exempting defendant from all duty with respect to unloading, except to place at the shipper's disposal appliances which, if used by him, would have resulted in a safe unloading. There was some testimony that there were some timber or skids at hand, which, if they had been placed as guards on the sides of the piece of sheet iron used as a gangway, would have prevented the horse from slipping and falling between the car and the platform, as happened; but, if the use of the slick sheet iron for that purpose without such guards was negligent, it was the negligence of the defendant, present and with the assistance of the plaintiff attempting to perform its duty as a carrier.

9. The seventeenth exception raises the question that, if Carswell, the shipper of the horse for plaintiff, signed the alleged special contract 10 days after the shipment and injury to the horse, that would bind plaintiff as a ratification of the contract. We have already alluded to the testimony as to the circumstances under which Carswell signed the contract, viz., that it was after the injury and upon representation by defendant's agent that plaintiff's case would not be prejudiced thereby. It would have been error to have instructed the jury in accordance with appellant's contention.

10. The eighteenth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in refusing the defendant's eleventh request to charge, as follows: 'If plaintiff, after receiving knowledge that the horse was shipped under a special contract limiting the liability to $60, and with knowledge that such horse was so shipped, accepted the reduced rate of freight and thereby obtained for himself an advantage, he cannot repudiate the contract without paying or offering to pay the full rate of freight. In other words, he cannot accept the advantages under said special contract, with a knowledge of its terms, and repudiate the liabilities of such contract.' It is submitted that, if the plaintiff with such knowledge accepted the reduced rate of freight, he thereby ratified the contract of shipment upon which it was based, and it would be unjust, unreasonable, and illegal to allow him to recover more than the amount specified in said contract." The request was properly refused, as it assumed the vital question in issue as to whether there was any such special contract.

Such exceptions as may not have been specifically mentioned herein have been duly considered, and are controlled by the principles herein announced.

All exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

POOLER et al. v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 27, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

An objection to evidence, not stating the ground, will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 1141; vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 194-210.]

2. WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT.

Though a party has been taken by surprise by testimony of his witness, he cannot contradict him by asking him if he had made a contradictory statement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 1268-1270.]

3. APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a judge fails to state the issues correctly to the jury, it is the duty of the attorney of the party objecting to call his attention to the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 1141, 1309-1314.]

4. PARTITION—EVIDENCE OF TITLE.

In partition, defendant can show that title to the land was in a third person not a party to the record.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partition, § 69.]

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where plaintiff desires fuller instructions, it is his duty to present requests to the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 628.]

6. APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS.

Where an exception alleges no error, it will not be considered.

7. MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

An allegation of marriage must be proved by the preponderance of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Marriage, § 79.]

8. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

If a request is substantially given, it is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 665.]

9. SAME—CHARGE ON FACTS.

An instruction that, if S. was the widow of E., she would not be in unlawful possession of certain property, was not a charge on the facts, as assuming that she was a widow in lawful possession.

10. NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where there is evidence to sustain a verdict, the refusal of a new trial is not error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 142-148.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; Aldrich, Judge.

Action by James Pooler and others against Phyllis Smith. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs appeal on following exceptions:

"(1) His honor erred in admitting, over plaintiffs' objection, upon cross-examination of the witness Pooler, evidence of cohabitation and general repute of the defendant and the intestate Edwin Ervin: (a) Because it was collateral testimony, and not responsive to anything drawn out in chief examination. (b) Because it was irrelevant and incompetent as proof of marriage between Edwin Ervin and Phyllis Smith.

"(2) His honor erred in admitting, over plaintiffs' objection, upon cross-examination of the witness Pooler, testimony to the effect that the intestate acknowledged Henry and Ed. Ervin, Jr., as his sons: (a) Because it was incompetent as proving their legitimacy, so as to inherit his estate. (b) Because they are not parties to this action, and are claiming no interest. (c) Because it is not responsive to anything stated by the witness in chief, nor is responsive to any of the issues raised by the pleadings.

"(3) It being clearly shown that the witness William Harvey was sacrificing the plaintiffs and was hostile, his honor erred in not allowing plaintiffs to show that the witness had made contrary statements just before the trial, to wit, by not allowing him to answer the following question: 'Didn't you at that time say that your recollection was clear that these children were born prior to their marriage?'—the error being this: He denied the plaintiffs the right of protection before the jury, showing that the witness had recently been brought under the influence of the defendant, and was testifying contrary to what the plaintiffs expected. (b) Because it led the jury to believe that the witness' version was substantial, regardless of any contradictory statements he had made.

"(4) His honor erred in admitting, over plaintiffs' objection, upon cross-examination of the witness Pooler, evidence of cohabitation and general repute of the intestate Edwin Ervin and Phyllis Smith, as proof of marriage between them: (a) Because the principal fact of such marriage had not been established by any testimony before the jury. (b) Because it led the jury to believe that cohabitation and general repute was sufficient to show the existence of marriage in a case of this kind. (c) Because it led the jury to believe that, even though an actual marriage may have never occurred, yet the jury may infer it from such testimony. (d) Because it was merely hearsay, and not admissible.

"(5) Because his honor erred in charging the jury the following: 'Phyllis Smith, according to the allegations of the complaint, was not the widow of Edwin Ervin, the intestate. Phyllis Smith alleges that she was, or denies the allegations of the complaint. She denies the charge that she was not his wife and his widow.' (a) Because, it is respectfully submitted, there is no such allegation in the complaint and no such denial in the answer. (b) Because it is a charge upon an assumed fact.

"(6) Because his honor erred in charging the jury the following language: 'There is an allegation, you recollect, that he left no children. The answer of the defendant denies that. Now, that is a question that you must pass upon.' (a) Because there is no such allegation in the complaint or answer. (b) Because if there were such children, they were not claiming and are not parties to the action. (c) Because there was no competent testimony to base such charge upon.

"(7) His honor erred in charging the jury in the following language: 'As to the legitimacy of a child, if you bring up that question, it is simply a question of fact; but the law in this state is, for the peace and repose of families, and for the good of society, that a child, the issue of a man and woman lawfully married to each other, are presumed to be legitimate children. And that presumption prevails.' (a) Because it ignored the necessity of considering whether such children were born prior or subsequent to the marriage. (b) Because it led the jury to believe that although the children were born prior to marriage and illegitimately, yet, by a subsequent marriage of the parties, such children became legitimate. (c) Because the whole and undisputed testimony in this case showed that the children were born long before marriage, if there were ever any marriage. (d) Because it was, at least, in effect, a charge upon the facts, and in violation of Const. 1895, art. 5, § 26.

"(8) His honor erred in refusing to charge the plaintiffs' first request to charge: Because it embodies a sound proposition of law and was applicable to the case. The request was as follows: '(1) That, where facts are shown which are sufficient to throw doubt upon the reality of a transaction, the burden of proof is shifted to those who know the truth, and where they fail to furnish information within their knowledge the presumptions of law are against them.'

"(9) He committed error of law in stating to the jury the following isolated words: 'That, in some instances, may be a correct statement of the law, but an allegation of marriage or an allegation of title is one of those allegations that when plaintiffs put them in their pleadings, they must prove them by a preponderance of evidence.' Because all statements in the complaint relating to marriage could at most amount to a negative averment of a fact wholly within the knowledge of the defendant, of which slight proof only would be sufficient.

"(10) He erred in reading to the jury, then refusing to charge them, plaintiff's fourth request to charge. Because it embodied a sound proposition of law, and was applicable to the case. The request was as follows: '(4) That if the jury conclude from the testimony that the defendant, Phyllis Smith, is in the unlawful possession of this land, took all the rents and profits exclusively to herself, the jury should find such rents and profits for the plaintiffs from the time she went into such possession till the present time. But if the jury should conclude that she was married to the intestate Edwin Ervin, but bore no children to him under the marriage, then the jury should find one-half of such rents and profits for the plaintiffs in the proportions set out in the complaint, and the remaining one-half to the defendant.'

"(11) He erred in charging the following isolated statement: 'If Phyllis Smith was the widow of Edwin Ervin, she would not be in unlawful possession.' Because such language assumed and led the jury to believe that she was the widow, in lawful possession, and is, therefore, a charge upon the facts, and in violation of Const. 1895, art. 5, § 26. The assumed fact is denied, and there is no competent testimony to the contrary.

"(12) His honor erred in not granting a new trial on motion of plaintiffs, for the reason that the jury had found nothing for the plaintiffs: (a) Because the whole and undisputed testimony shows that the two children, Henry and Ed., were born long before the marriage of the intestate, Edwin Ervin, and Phyllis Smith, if such marriage ever occurred. (b) His honor, recognizing that the testimony was undisputed on that point, erred in refusing the motion, simply because the jury passed upon it. (c) Because the verdict was against his honor's charge. (d) There being no evidence, judge had no discretion to refuse new trial.

"(13) His honor erred in refusing to set aside the verdict, in that there is no testimony to support it: (a) Because there is no testimony going to show that Edwin Ervin and Phyllis Smith ever came together, taking each other for, and declaring themselves man and wife, in the presence of witnesses or any one. (b) Because, while there is no testimony of marriage, plaintiffs offered testimony going to show that the intestate was not married."

S. S. Davis, for appellants. E. Keith Dargan and W. F. Dargan, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for partition of land. The complaint alleges that Edwin Ervin died intestate seised and possessed of the land therein described, and leaving as his heirs at law his brothers and sisters described in the complaint; that the defendant Phyllis Smith is in the unlawful possession of said land and claims the same under a pretended marriage with intestate. The defendant denied the material allegations of the complaint. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed upon exceptions which will be set out in the report of the case. The exceptions will be referred to by their numbers.

First, second, and fourth exceptions: The appellant did not state the grounds of objection to the testimony. The exceptions cannot, therefore, be sustained. The ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, is sustained by the following authorities: Perry v. Massey, 1 Bailey, 32; Farr v. Thompson, Cheves, 44; Bank v. Shier, 4 Rich. Law, 240; Bauskett v. Keltt, 22 S. C. 187.

Fifth and sixth exceptions: These exceptions relate to the issues presented by the pleadings. If the presiding judge did not state the issues correctly, it was the duty of the appellant's attorneys to call attention to such fact. Furthermore, the defendant had the right to show that the title to the land was in a third person not a party to the record. Sutton v. Clark, 59 S. C. 440, 38 S. E. 150, 82 Am. St. Rep. 848.

Seventh exception: His honor not only charged in the manner set forth in the exception, but added: "It may, however, be rebutted, where you bring positive proof to show that the child could not be the lawful child of a man and his wife." This was a correct proposition of law, and, if the plaintiff desired fuller instructions, it was their duty to present requests to that effect.

Eighth and ninth exceptions: The language of the presiding judge refusing the request is set forth in the ninth exception, and states a satisfactory reason for refusing to charge the same.

Tenth exception: No errors are specified.

It does not appear from the record that the request was refused, but, on the contrary, it was substantially charged.

Eleventh exception: The request embodied a sound proposition of law, and was properly charged. If the appellants desired a more specific charge, it was incumbent on them to prepare a request to that effect.

Twelfth and thirteenth exceptions: These exceptions relate to the refusal of the motion to grant a new trial. There is testimony tending to sustain the verdict of the jury, but we do not deem it necessary to cite it at length.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not participate in this opinion because of illness.

TOWNSEND et al. v. NORFOLK RY. & LIGHT CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, Jan. 18, 1906. On Rehearing Feb. 23, 1906.)

1. NUISANCE—PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATIONS—MATTERS OF PRIVATE NATURE.

A railway and light company, though a public service corporation, stands on the footing of an individual as respects its power house, so that, it being a nuisance, injurious to adjoining property by reason of the vibration of the machinery, the smoke therefrom, and the escaping electricity, the company is liable for the injury; the authority conferred on it by Acts 1897-98, pp. 495, 1020, cc. 463, 989, to construct and operate plants for the generation of electricity, for its own use and for sale, not being imperative, but permissive, and not conferring statutory sanction for the commission of a nuisance, so that it cannot be said that the Legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury.

On Rehearing.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR—GRANTING WRIT—REVIEW.

While, on a petition for writ of error, the Supreme Court must grant the writ unless the decision questioned is plainly right, it will not disturb the decision and grant an injunction which the lower court has refused, unless the error in refusing it be manifest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3970.]

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Thomas Townsend and others against the Norfolk Railway & Light Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Tazewell Taylor and Th. A. Williams, for plaintiff in error. White, Tunstall & Wilcox and W. H. Venable, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The plaintiffs in error brought an action of trespass against the Norfolk Railway & Light Company, and their declaration states: That they were seised and possessed, as joint owners, of a certain lot of land, with the buildings and improvements thereon, situated on the west side of Cumberland street, in the city of Norfolk, Va.; that the Norfolk Railway & Light Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Virginia, owned a certain lot in the city of Norfolk, fronting on Cove street; that the defendant had erected on this lot a power house, equipped with large and heavy machinery, consisting of boilers, engines, dynamos, condensers, and generators, for the purpose of generating electric power, and as a part of its equipment of said power house had erected in connection with its buildings three or more metal stacks; that it was the duty of the defendant so to maintain and operate its power house and plant as not to injure or interfere with the comfort, use, and enjoyment by the plaintiffs of their property, but, disregarding its duty in this behalf, on the 1st day of August, 1902, and on divers other days prior thereto and continuously up to the present time, the defendant did so wrongfully and unjustly operate and conduct its plant, or power house, that large columns of smoke, dust, cinders, sparks, and soot had been emitted from the stacks of the defendant, and thrown, propelled, and hurled against, upon, and through the houses of the plaintiffs on the property aforesaid, thereby preventing its proper and useful enjoyment by the plaintiffs; that their property had been made untenable, and that its rental and salable value had been depreciated; that the houses of the plaintiffs upon their property, as aforesaid, had been and were being greatly shaken and damaged, in such a manner as to cause the same to become and be uncomfortable, dangerous, and uninhabitable; that by reason of the premises the property of the plaintiffs had deteriorated in value, both as income-producing and as marketable property; and, further, that the defendant, by allowing the electric current from the wires and conduits, or on return circuit, to escape from its wires, or returning by ground circuit, to run over and through the pipes of metal placed to carry water and gas to the houses of plaintiffs, has caused the metal pipes, thus acting as conductors of electricity, to be eaten up and destroyed, and that although the defendant has been often requested by the plaintiffs to refrain and desist from the wrongful and unjust operation and management of its said plant, or power house, in the several ways hereinbefore described, yet it has refused to desist from the said wrongful and unjust operation and management of its plant as aforesaid, to the damage of the plaintiffs $2,000.

To this declaration the defendant filed a special plea, in which it sets out that, before the time of the committing of the alleged grievances in the declaration mentioned, the General Assembly of Virginia had passed an act to incorporate the Virginia Electric Company, by which it was provided that it should have power to construct, lease, purchase, or acquire by consolidation with any other company or companies, and operate and maintain in the city of Norfolk, suitable works, machinery, or plants for the manufacture of electricity, and for the sale and distribution of the same; that it should have power to sell and distribute the same for public or private illumination, for heating and for power, and for any other purposes which the same might be used for; that it should have power to do such acts and things, and conduct such enterprises as might be convenient in connection with or incidental to the enjoyment of the powers thereinbefore conferred, and that it might, with the consent of the proper authorities of the city of Norfolk, use the streets and roads thereof for laying its mains, pipes, wires, and erecting its poles; that by an act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to incorporate the Old Dominion Electrical Development and Power Company" (Acts 1897-98, p. 1020, c. 989) it was provided that the said Old Dominion Electrical Development & Power Company should have power to erect, maintain, and operate plants in this state for the generation of electricity and the supply of electric current for its own use and for sale to persons, natural or artificial, desiring to use the same for heat, light, or power, or any and all use to which the electric current might then or at any time thereafter be applicable, and might manufacture, use and sell, distribute and furnish the same for said purposes, and all electrical supplies of all kinds, to all and any persons and coporations, upon such terms as might be agreed upon by and between the contracting parties; that by the 7th section (page 1022) of the act last above-mentioned, it was provided that the board of directors of the Old Dominion Electrical Development & Power Company should have the power to change the name of that company and to adopt such other name as they might deem proper upon the fulfillment of certain specified conditions; that in pursuance of said power the board of directors changed the name of the Old Dominion Electrical Development & Power Company, so that it became and was the Norfolk & Ocean View Railway Company; that said last-mentioned company, by virtue of the powers granted to it by its acts of incorporation, acquired the works, property, rights, privileges, and franchises of the Virginia Electric Company; and that said Norfolk & Ocean View Railway Company thereby became and was entitled, empowered, and authorized to do and perform any, all and singular, the acts referred to in the act of incorporation of the Virginia Electric Company, as well as any, all, and singular the acts requisite, necessary, or proper in connection with the powers, privileges, and rights of the said company in the matter of carrying on the business of the said company. The plea further avers that on the 2d day of November, 1899, by an agreement entitled "Agreement of Consolidation of the Norfolk Street Railroad Company and the Norfolk & Ocean View Railway Company under the Name of the Norfolk Railway & Light Company," the said

Norfolk Railway & Light Company became and was possessed, and still is possessed, of any and all and singular the rights, franchises, privileges, powers, works, properties, and all other interests of any sort whatever of the said constituent companies, the Norfolk Street Railroad Company and the Norfolk & Ocean View Railway Company, and especially and particularly the particular powers, privileges, and rights herein before more fully specified as to the operation and maintenance of the plants of the said companies; that under the said consolidation agreement the defendant became and was possessed, and still is possessed, of the said plant, power house, and manufactory, which is the same plant, power house, and manufactory as are complained of in the declaration of the plaintiffs; that not only has it obtained legislative sanction and authority for the operation of the said plant, power house, and manufactory, machinery, and boilers, but that furthermore, at divers times, the defendant has obtained permission and authority from the councils of the city of Norfolk to install the said machinery and boilers in its power house and manufactory; and further avers that, pursuant to the legislative and municipal authority had and obtained as aforesaid, it has ever since operated, and still continues to operate, its said plant, in a proper, careful, reasonable, and suitable manner; that it is necessary to the proper carrying on of defendant's business to operate and maintain the said power house, manufactory and plant in the manner in which it has been and is being operated; and that it has done no damage and occasioned no discomfort that is not the natural, proximate, inevitable, and necessary result of such proper, careful, reasonable, and suitable operation, without this, that the said defendant is guilty of the said supposed grievances, or any of them, in manner and form as the said plaintiffs bath above thereof complained; and of this it puts itself upon the country.

The plaintiffs demurred to this special plea, and that demurrer was overruled by the court. And, the plaintiffs not withdrawing, nor desiring to withdraw, their demurrer, the court gave judgment in favor of the defendant.

Section 153, art. 12, of the Constitution [Va. Code 1904, p. ccclix], declares that the term "public service corporation" shall include "all transportation and transmission companies, all gas, electric light, heat and power companies, and all persons authorized to exercise the right of eminent domain, or to use or occupy any street, alley or public highway, whether along, over, or under the same, in a manner not permitted to the general public."

Under the terms of this definition it is apparent the Norfolk Railway & Light Company is to be deemed a public service corporation.

It will be observed that the declaration nowhere states that the injury of which plaintiffs complain was caused by any negligent act upon the part of the defendant. The contention of plaintiffs is that in the operation of its plant the defendant wrongfully caused smoke, dust, cinders, sparks, and soot from its chimney stacks to be thrown and propelled upon and through the houses of the plaintiffs; that by the operation of its heavy machinery it caused the houses of the plaintiffs to be greatly shaken and damaged; and that by permitting the electric current from its wires and conduits, or on return circuit, to escape from its wires, or returning by the ground circuit, to run over and through the pipes placed to carry water and gas to the houses of plaintiffs, the pipes had been eaten up and destroyed; and the useful and proper enjoyment of the property had been impaired, it had been rendered untenable, and its value diminished.

The defendant replies that it has operated, and continues to operate its plant in a proper, careful, reasonable, and suitable manner, in pursuance of legislative and municipal authority conferred upon it.

The question, therefore, for us to consider, is whether or not the court erred in overruling the demurrer to this plea.

The declaration sets forth a nuisance. The defendant justifies what it has done by pleading legislative authority for its acts.

A public service corporation is to be considered in two aspects. It has duties which it owes to the public, and which it must perform. It has other duties not of a public nature which are incidental to those of a public character, in the performance of which it stands upon the footing of a private corporation. With respect to the duties of the first class, it may be said that, in doing that which under the law it may be required to do, it cannot be considered as doing an unlawful act; and if a lawful act be done without negligence, any injury which it occasions is damnum absque injuria.

This aspect of the case was before this court in Fisher v. Seaboard Air Line Railway Co., 102 Va. 363, 46 S. E. 381, where it was said that a railroad company acting under authority of law, whose road is constructed and operated with judgment and caution, and without negligence, is not liable to an adjacent landowner for damages resulting from noises, jarring and shaking of buildings, or dust and smoke incident to the running of trains; for no action lies for the loss or inconvenience resulting from doing an authorized act in an authorized way. To the authorities relied on in support of this case many others may be added.

Beseman v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 13 Atl. 164, from the Supreme Court of New Jersey, is strikingly in point. That was a suit for damages done to the houses and lands of plaintiff by the running of defendant's trains, to which the defendant replied that it acted under franchises derived from the public grant, and that it had built its road and run its trains, carrying merchandise and freight, near to the lands of the plaintiff, doing the plaintiff no more damage than that which necessarily resulted from the transaction of such acts and business, and that for such incidental and unavoidable damage it was not responsible. The plaintiff contended that, with respect to private property, a railroad is per se a nuisance whenever it throws a detriment, such as would be actionable at common law, on such property. Upon this the court said: "That this proposition, on which the plaintiff's case rests, is a most momentous one, is at once apparent. If it should be sustained, an illimitable field of litigation would be opened. If a railroad, by the necessary concomitants of its use, is an actionable nuisance with respect to the plaintiff's property, so it must be as to all other property in its vicinity. It is not only those who are greatly damaged by the illegal act of another to whom the law gives redress, but its vindication extends to every person who is damaged at all, unless, indeed, the loss sustained be so small as to be unnoticeable by force of the maxim 'De minimis non curat lex.' The noises and other disturbances necessarily attendant on the operation of these vast instruments of commerce are wide-spreading, impairing in a sensible degree some of the usual conditions upon which depend the full enjoyment of property in their neighborhood; and consequently, if these companies are to be regarded purely as private corporations, it inevitably results that they must be responsible to each person whose possessions are thus molested. Such a doctrine would make these companies, touching such landowners, general tort-feasors. Their tracks run for miles through the cities of the state, and every landowner on each side of the track would be entitled to his action; and so, in the less populated districts, each proprietor of lands adjacent to the road would have a similar right, and thus the litigants would be numbered by thousands. It is questionable whether the running of railroads would be practicable if subjected to such a responsibility. Nor is this susceptibility to be sued on all sides the only, or even the worst, consequence of the theory in question; for, if these rights of action exist, it follows, necessarily, that each of the persons in whom they are vested can prevent the continuance of the wrong out of which such rights of action arise. If this plaintiff should recover two or three verdicts against the defendant because of the damage that is inseparable from the running of its trains, there is plainly no ground on which the chancellor could refuse to enjoin a continuance of the nuisance. Nor does there appear to be any relief from such a consequence. The aggrieved landowner would be the master of the situation; for there is no law by force of which the company could take his land in invitum, or compel him to have his damages assessed once for all. In short, the plaintiff's claim involves the assertion that he can put a stop to the business of the defendant at the point in question." In concluding his opinion, the learned judge says: "I find no embarrassment in disposing of the present subject, for I have put railroads in the category of public agents, and have regarded them as possessed of all the immunities, in the particular in question, belonging to such an office."

That railroad corporations—public service corporations—are in many aspects to be regarded as quasi public corporations, can no longer be doubted. Upon that theory their duties are measured and their rights determined; and the control which the state asserts, the exercise of which is becoming more and more necessary with the growth and development of our transportation system, of which railroads constitute so essential a part, rests upon the public character of such corporations. A railroad, in the operation of its trains in the transportation of freight and passengers, is in the exercise of a public duty, and should be permitted to apply the same principles of construction when it pleads, for its protection, the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature, as are urged when the obligations imposed by the same charter are insisted upon in the effort to compel such corporations faithfully to perform the duties which they have assumed with respect to the public.

It would be easy to multiply authorities along this line. Indeed, B. & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 2 Sup. Ct. 719, 27 L. Ed. 739, upon which plaintiffs in error justly rely in another aspect of this case, uses the following language:

"Undoubtedly a railway over the public highways of the District, including the streets of the city of Washington, may be authorized by Congress, and if, when used with reasonable care, it produces only that incidental inconvenience which unavoidably follows the additional occupation of the streets by its cars with the noises and disturbances necessarily attending their use, no one can complain that he is incommoded. Whatever consequential annoyance may necessarily follow from the running of cars on the road with reasonable care is damnum absque injuria. The private inconvenience in such case must be suffered for the public accommodation."

We shall not press this view of the case further, for counsel for plaintiffs in error state in their brief that they do not "seriously contest" the doctrine enunciated by this court in Fisher v. Railway Company, supra.

But was the defendant in error acting in its public capacity when it committed the grievances complained of? Every allegation in the declaration is directed against the injuries inflicted by the operation of the power house of the defendant. It is true that an electric railway cannot be operated without a power house; it is true that an engine house is a necessary adjunct to a steam railway; but they are incidents to the operation of the road, with which the public has no concern.

Pollock on Torts, at page 158 of the second edition of his work, says: "A railway company is authorized to acquire land within specified limits, and on any part of that land to erect workshops. This does not justify the company, as against a particular householder, in building workshops so situated (though within the authorized limits) that the smoke from them is a nuisance to him in the occupation of his house."

In Re Rhode Island R. Co. (R. I.) 48 Atl. 592, 52 L. R. A. 879, it is said: "The common carrier serves both the public and itself. It has its public and private functions. The public part is the exercise of its franchise for the accommodation of the public; the private part is its incidental business, with which the public is not concerned, and which the company manages for its own interest. The company carries passengers over its road as a public duty, but the generation of the power to propel cars is the private business of the company. Whatever is necessary to the exercise of the franchise is for the benefit of the public, but that which pertains simply to means of supply is a private business of the company."

To the same effect is Louisville & Nashville Terminal Co. v. Jacobs (Tenn.) 72 S. W. 957, 61 L. R. A. 192, where it is said: "But over and beyond this, we think a corporation, in selecting a place for its roundhouse, acted in a private capacity, and is responsible for the injurious consequences which may result from its use."

In Beseman v. Railroad Co., supra, the court said: "A railroad company, in selecting a place for repair shops and engine house, acted altogether in its private capacity. Such location was a matter of indifference to the public; and consequently with respect to such an act the corporation stood on the footing of an individual and was entitled to no superior immunities."

In Baltimore & Potomac R. Co. v. Fifth Bap. Ch., supra, the Baptist Church claimed that its services were habitually interrupted and disturbed by the hammering noises made in the workshops of the company, the rumbling of its engines passing in and out of them, and the blowing off of steam; that these noises were at times so great as to prevent members of the congregation, sitting in parts of the church farthest from the shops, from hearing what was said; that the act of blowing off steam occupied from 5 to 15 minutes, and frequently compelled the pastor of the church to suspend his remarks. The main reliance of the railroad company to defeat the action was the authority conferred upon it by the act of Congress of February 5, 1867, to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges in the construction of a road in the District of Columbia, the line of which was afterwards designated, which it could exercise under its charter in the construction of a road in Maryland, with some exceptions not material here. By its charter it was empowered to make and construct all works whatever which might be necessary and expedient in order to the proper completion and maintenance of the road. In its opinion the court says: "It is no answer to the action of the plaintiff that the railroad company was authorized by act of Congress to bring its track within the limits of the city of Washington, and to construct such works as were necessary and expedient for the completion and maintenance of its road, and that the engine house and repair shop in question were thus necessary and expedient; that they are skillfully constructed; that the chimneys of the engine house are higher than required by the building regulations of the city, and that as little smoke and noise are caused as the nature of the business in them will permit. In the first place, the authority of the company to construct such works as it might deem necessary and expedient for the completion and maintenance of its road did not authorize it to place them wherever it might think proper in the city, without reference to the property and rights of others. * * * Whatever the extent of the authority conferred, it was accompanied with this implied qualification, that the works should not be so placed as by their use to unreasonably interfere with and disturb the peaceful and comfortable enjoyment of others in their property. Grants of privileges or powers to corporate bodies, like those in question, confer no license to use them in disregard of the private rights of others, and with immunity for their invasion."

In Ridge v. Railroad Co. (N. J. Ch.) 43 Atl. 278, the Beseman Case, supra, and Railroad Co. v. Fifth Bap. Ch., supra, are considered, and the court says: "In the latter case it was denied by the Supreme Court of the United States that the railroad had been invested with the privilege of building an engine house or repair shop next to a church in the city of Washington. The court held that the grant of power did not authorize the company to place such structure wherever it might think proper in the city without reference to the property or rights of others. The doctrine of that case was approved in the opinion of Beseman v. Railroad Co., supra, upon the ground that in selecting the place for repair shops the railroad company acted altogether in a private capacity. Such location, it was said, was a matter of indifference to the public, and consequently, with respect to such act, the corporation stood upon the footing of an individual, and was entitled to no superior immunities. What was meant was that while the public was concerned that a railroad company should have all the appliances, including repair shops, to make its public service effective, it was immaterial to the public where such appliances were placed, so long as the service was efficient. All that concerns the public is to have an efficient service in the way of transportation of persons and freight. The company is shielded from responsibility for incidental damages resulting from acts which are necessary to bring about such service. In the federal decision it was admitted that the company, by virtue of its franchise, had the right to build repair shops and engine houses, but, having the liberty to choose different sites for its structures, it was bound to select one where they would not inflict an injury upon the property of others."

In Rapier v. London Tramways Company (1893) L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 588, the syllabus of the opinion delivered by Lindley, L. J., is as follows: "The defendants were a tramway company, who were empowered by their act to lay down and construct two lines of tramway according to deposited plans, together with the works and conveniences connected therewith. The act gave no compulsory powers for taking lands, and made no special mention of building stables. The defendants constructed the lines, and built some large blocks of stables near the plaintiff's house for the horses employed in drawing the cars. The plaintiff complained of the smell caused by the stables, and brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using the stables so as to cause a nuisance. Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.) that, although horses were necessary for the working of the tramways, the company were not justified by their statutory powers in using the stables so as to be a nuisance to their neighbors, and that it was no sufficient defense to say that they had taken all reasonable care to prevent it."

Other aspects of this case were discussed before us, upon which we have not deemed it necessary to touch; and without intimating any opinion upon them, except in so far as has been herein expressed, we shall content ourselves for the present with saying that we are of opinion that the circuit court should have sustained the demurrer to the special plea.

On Petition for Rehearing.

In the opinion delivered by the court when the judgment sought to be reviewed by this petition for rehearing was pronounced, it is said:

"The declaration sets forth a nuisance. The defendant justifies what it has done by pleading legislative authority for its acts.

"A public service corporation is to be considered in two aspects. It has duties which it owes to the public, and which it must perform. It has other duties not of a public nature, which are incidental to those of a public character, in the performance of which it stands upon the footing of a private corporation. With respect to the duties of the first class, it may be said that in doing that which under the law it may be required to do, it cannot be considered as doing an unlawful act; and if a lawful act be done without negligence, any injury which it occasions is damnum absque injuria."

This position is earnestly assailed in the petition for a rehearing, where it is broadly asserted that no such distinction between the public and private functions of a corporation exists, and that all is lawful which the Legislature authorizes to be done, although the authority conferred be not imperative but merely permissive. It may be that in the distribution of the duties of a public service corporation into those of a public and those of a private nature, the classification was inaccurate and unscientific, though it has the sanction of courts of the highest respectability. By other courts the same conclusion is reached by a consideration of the language used by the Legislature in the act of incorporation, and by its construction determining whether or not the lawmaking power intended to permit an act to be done, or to require its performance—to confer a privilege, or to impose a duty.

In the case of Fisher v. Seaboard Air Line Railway Co., 102 Va. 363, 46 S. E. 381, the position of this court is well stated in the syllabus: "A railroad company, acting under authority of law, whose road is constructed and operated with judgment and caution, and without negligence, is not liable to an adjacent landowner for damage resulting from the noises, jarring and shaking of buildings, dust and smoke, incident to the running of trains. No action lies for the loss or inconvenience resulting from doing an authorized act in an authorized way." This is to be understood, of course, in the light of the facts presented in that record, where damages were claimed for the noises, jarring and shaking of buildings, dust and smoke incident to the running of trains. We were of opinion that in the absence of negligence, no damages could be recovered, for the reason that the road was obliged to run its trains, which could not be done, whatever the degree of caution exercised, without the inconveniences and injuries enumerated.

In Makely v. Southern Railway Company, complaint was made of the operation of trains of the defendant company, and of a power house maintained by it for the purpose of lighting the various buildings in its yards. There was a bill praying an injunction filed in the circuit court of Alexandria, which the learned judge of that court refused, but without prejudice to the right of plaintiff to seek her remedy at law. There was no question made as to the solvency of the railway company or its ability to respond in any damages which might be adjudged against it. We concurred with the judge of the circuit court in the opinion that, at least in the preliminary stages of the case, before the right had been established at law, it would be improper to enjoin the defendant company. And just here it may be proper to state that while, upon a petition for a writ of error or appeal, this court is required to grant the writ prayed for unless the decision called in question be plainly right, we should not overrule the decision of the lower court, and grant an injunction which it has refused, unless the error in refusing it be manifest.

We have mentioned the Fisher Case and the Makely Case, not with any view to vindicating our consistency, but because we felt that it would be well to clear up any doubt that might exist as to the attitude of this court with respect to those decisions.

Coming back to the petition for rehearing, we find the position of the petitioner thus stated: "The application of this doctrine of 'private capacity' is wholly inconsistent with the principles enunciated in the Fisher Case. We think that the fact that the doctrine is wholly erroneous can easily be demonstrated by stating it in the form of a syllogism, thus:

"The injuries done to property without negligence by a public service corporation, for which it will be held liable, are those done by it in its private capacity.

"All injuries done to property without negligence by a public service corporation are done by it in its private capacity; i. e., by the means and methods employed.

"Therefore a public service corporation is liable for all injuries to property done by it without negligence.

"The conclusion is manifestly incorrect, and at least one of the premises must therefore be erroneous. The second premise we think we have demonstrated to be correctly stated; that is, that injuries to property are the result of the means and methods employed, and not of the public service performed. The error lies, therefore, in the first premise.

"The vice in this premise, and the simple answer to the various illustrations which we have given above, is demonstrated by a statement of the true principle, which is that a public service corporation, acting without negligence, is not liable for injuries which are the necessary consequence of the performance of its authorized functions. And we need go no further in search for authority for this position than the Fisher Case itself, where the court, quoting from Pollock on Torts, said: 'It is settled that no action can be maintained for loss or inconvenience which is the necessary consequence of an authorized thing being done in an authorized manner.'"

We must again advert to the principle that all opinions are to be considered in the light of the facts to which they apply, for the transition from an authorized to an unauthorized act—from that which is lawful to that which is unlawful—is oftentimes by easy and almost imperceptible gradations, so that in the enunciation of a principle the eye must always be kept upon the precise facts upon which it is to operate.

Almost all the questions upon which the law is doubtful or obscure arise at the vanishing point between contradictory and irreconcilable principles, and mark the effort "to deduce harmony from the reciprocal struggle of discordant powers." Burke.

Law is not an exact science. It has no invariable standard by which rights may be measured. It does not submit to inflexible rules of logic, nor can it, in its application to the varied affairs of men, always clothe itself in the form of a syllogism; and while we might hesitate to go to the full length of the view expressed by the great moralist we have just quoted, it is to a large extent true that "every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act, is founded on compromise and barter."

We should not, therefore, have been disposed to abandon our position, even though it had failed when subjected to the syllogistic test; but we are not prepared to admit that the test has been correctly applied. We do not admit the truth of the minor premise. We do not admit that all injuries done to property without negligence by public service corporations are done by them in their private capacity.

All injuries done to property without negligence by a public service corporation for which it will be held liable, it may perhaps be conceded, are done by it in its private capacity; but there are injuries done by it in its public capacity for which it will not be held liable, and in that distinction is to be found the very gist of this controversy.

Nor can we concur in the answer which the petitioner suggests to the illustrations which it had given. We cannot admit that a public service corporation, acting without negligence, is, under all circumstances, irresponsible for injuries which are the necessary consequence of the performance of its authorized functions. There must be something more than authority to do the act complained of. It must be an act which the corporation is required to perform—a duty which it owes and which has been imposed upon it by the legislative act granting the charter by which it exists—or at least it must appear that the particular act complained of and immunity from its consequences were within the contemplation of the Legislature. It is true that in Pollock on Torts, quoted in the Fisher Case, supra, it is said that "no action can be maintained for loss or inconvenience which is the necessary consequence of an authorized thing being done in an authorized manner." But Pollock also says, in his second edition, at page 158: "A railway company is authorized to acquire land within specified limits, and on any part of that land to erect workshops. This does not justify the company, as against a particular householder, in building workshops so situated (though within the authorized limits) that the smoke from them is a nuisance to him in the occupation of his house." The two statements by the same author are apparently opposed to each other, and yet may be in entire harmony as applied to varying conditions of facts.

In Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. L. R. 193, the metropolitan poor act, authorizing the formation of districts and district asylums for the care and cure of sick and infirm poor, created corporations for that purpose, and gave authority to the poor law board to issue directions to these corporations, enabled them to purchase lands and erect buildings for the purposes of the act, and made the rates of parishes and unions liable for the outlay thus incurred. But it does not by direct and imperative provisions order these things to be done, so that if, in doing them, a nuisance is created to the injury of the health or property of persons resident in the neighborhood of the place where the land is purchased or the buildings erected, it does not afford to these acts a statutory protection. And therefore, where such nuisance was found as a fact, it was held that the district board could not set up the statute, nor the orders of the poor law board under it, as an answer to an action, or to prevent an injunction issuing to restrain the board from continuing the nuisance; and in continuing his opinion Lord Blackburn states this principle: "On those who seek to establish that the legislature intended to take away the private rights of individuals, lies the burden of showing that such an intention appears by express words or necessary implication." And per Lord Watson it was said: "Where the terms of a statute are not imperative, but permissive, the fair inference is that the Legislature intended that the discretion, as to the use of the general powers thereby conferred, should be exercised in strict conformity with private rights."

That case finely illustrates the effect of a statute merely permissive in its terms.

In London, Brighton & South Coast Ry. Co. v. Truman and Others, 11 App. Cas. L. R. 1886, a railway company were authorized among other things to carry cattle, and to purchase by agreement, in addition to the lands which they were empowered to purchase compulsorily, any lands, not exceeding in the whole 50 acres, in such places as should be deemed eligible, for the purpose of providing additional stations, yards, and other conveniences for receiving, loading, or keeping any cattle, goods, or things conveyed or intended to be conveyed by the railway, or for making convenient roads or ways thereto, or for any other purposes connected with the undertaking which the company should judge requisite. The company were also empowered to sell such additional lands and to purchase in lieu thereof other lands which they should deem more eligible for the aforesaid purposes, and so on from time to time. The act contained no provision for compensation in respect of lands so purchased by agreement. Under this power the company, some years after the expiration of the compulsory powers, bought land adjoining one of their stations, and used it as a yard or dock for their cattle traffic. To the occupiers of houses near the station the noise of the cattle and drovers was a nuisance which, but for the act, would have been actionable. There was no negligence in the mode in which the company conducted the business. Held, that the purpose for which the land was acquired being expressly authorized by the act, and being incidental and necessary to the authorized use of the railway for the cattle traffic, the company were authorized to do what they did, and were not bound to choose a site more convenient to other persons; and that the adjoining occupiers were not entitled to an injunction to restrain the company, distinguishing between the case of Metropolitan Asylum Dist. v. Hill, just cited. Among those who delivered opinions in this case was Lord Blackburn, from whom we have just quoted, who says, in part: "I do not think there can be any doubt that if, on the true construction of a statute, it appears to be the intention of the legislature that powers should be exercised, the proper exercise of which may occasion a nuisance to the owners of neighboring land, and that this should be free from liability to an action for damages, or an injunction to prevent the continued proper exercise of these powers, effect must be given to the intention of the legislature"—again resting the case upon a proper construction of the act of incorporation. In this case the House of Lords reversed the decisions of the Court of Appeal, and of North, J., which is to be found in 25 Ch. Div. 428. It undertakes to distinguish, while it does not overrule, Metropolitan Asylum Dist. v. Hill, supra, and seems to rest upon the express terms of the act of Parliament under consideration. It is at most merely persuasive authority, and if it decides that a merely permissive authority from the Legislature confers complete immunity from acts which constitute a nuisance, if not negligently performed, it would be irreconcilable with other English cases of high authority—indeed, of equal authority with itself—with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and with those of state courts, to which we shall presently advert.

In Cogswell v. Railroad Co., 103 N. Y. 10, the syllabus is as follows:

"Whether the Legislature can authorize a railroad corporation to maintain an engine house, under circumstances which, if maintained by an individual, would by the common law constitute a nuisance to private property without providing compensation, quære.

"But if this should be conceded, nevertheless the statutory sanction which will justify an injury by a railroad corporation to private property without making compensation therefor, and without the consent of the owner, must be express or given by clear and unquestionable implication from the powers expressly conferred so that it can fairly be said that the Legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury; it may not be presumed from a general grant of authority.

"Where the terms of a statute giving authority to such a corporation are not imperative, but permissive, this does not confer license to commit a nuisance, although what is contemplated by the statute cannot be done without."

In Bohan v. Port Jervis Gaslight Company, 122 N. Y. at page 18, 25 N. E. at page 246, 9 L. R. A. 711, it is said that:

"Although the acts complained of are inseparably connected with the carrying on of the business itself, and the resulting damages a necessary consequence, if those acts constitute a nuisance per se, it is not necessary to show negligence in order to sustain a recovery.

"Every person is bound to make a reasonable use of his property, having respect for his neighbor's right. A use which produces destructive vapors and noxious smells, resulting in material injury to the property and the comfort of those dwelling in the neighborhood, is not reasonable, and is a nuisance per se.

"As a general rule, corporations authorized by statute to carry on a business, although it may be of a quasi public character, are under the same obligations to make a reasonable use of their property and to respect the rights of others as are citizens.

"While the Legislature may authorize acts, which would otherwise be a nuisance, when they affect or relate to matters in which the public have an interest or over which they have control, the statutory authority which affords immunity for such acts must be express, or a clear and unquestionable implication from powers expressly conferred, and it must appear that the Legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury."

This whole subject is considered by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Baltimore & Potomac R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 2 Sup. Ct. 710, 27 L. Ed. 739, which was decided in 1883, and has met with general approval. The Baltimore & Potomac Railroad Company was authorized by act of Congress to lay its track within the limits of the city of Washington, and to construct other works necessary and expedient to the proper completion and maintenance of its road. It erected an engine house and machine shop on a parcel of land immediately adjoining the church, and used them in such a way as to disturb, on Sundays and other days, the congregation assembled in the church, to interfere with religious exercises therein, break up its Sunday Schools, and destroy the value of the building as a place of public worship. Suit was brought against the railroad company to recover damages, and among other defenses the company relied upon statutory authority; and its counsel undertook to maintain that "no action will lie and no recovery can be had for doing that which the law authorizes the party to do, and that cannot be adjudged a nuisance and be held unlawful which the law declares to be lawful." Answering that contention, Mr. Justice Field says:

"The authority of the company to construct such works as it might deem necessary and expedient for the completion and maintenance of its road, did not authorize it to place them wherever it might think proper in the city, without reference to the property and rights of others. As well might it be contended that the act permitted it to place them immediately in front of the President's house or of the Capitol, or in the most densely populated locality. Indeed, the corporation does assert a right to place its works upon property it may acquire anywhere in the city. Whatever the extent of the authority conferred, it was accompanied with this implied qualification, that the works should not be so placed as by their use to unreasonably interfere with and disturb the peaceful and comfortable enjoyment of others in their property. Grants of privileges or powers to corporate bodies, like those in question, confer no license to use them in disregard of the private rights of others, and with immunity for their invasion. The great principle of the common law, which is equally the teaching of Christian morality, so to use one's property as not to injure others, forbids any other application or use of the rights and powers conferred.

"Undoubtedly, a railway over the public highways of the District, including the streets of the city of Washington, may be authorized by Congress, and if, when used with reasonable care, it produces only that incidental inconvenience which unavoidably follows the additional occupation of the streets by its cars with the noises and disturbances necessarily attending their use, no one can complain that he is incommoded. Whatever consequential annoyance may necessarily follow from the running of cars on the road with reasonable care is damnum absque injuria. The private inconvenience in such case must be suffered for the public accommodation."

It is said in the petition that the latter part of this quotation is a dictum. We hardly think so; but even if it were, it is the dictum of a judge whose great ability entitles his every utterance to the highest respect, and is sanctioned by the concurrence of the entire court. We may safely consider that opinion as expressing the fixed views of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the questions discussed.

The legislative authority relied upon in this case—Acts 1897-98, pp. 495, 1020, cc. 463, 989, respectively—is as follows:

At section 2, p. 496, occurs the following language: "The said company shall have power to construct, lease, purchase or acquire by consolidation with any other company or companies, and operate and maintain in the city of Norfolk, or both, and in any other city, town or village in the said county, suitable works, machinery and plants for the manufacture of electricity, and for the sale and distribution of the same; and it shall have power to sell and distribute the same for public and private illumination, for heating, for power and for any other purposes which the same may be used for, and it shall have power to do such acts and things, and conduct such enterprises as are convenient in connection with or incidental to the enjoyment of the powers hereinabove conferred, and may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the city of Norfolk, and of such other city or county as are named above, use the streets and roads thereof for laying its mains, pipes and wires and erecting its poles."

And at section 3, p. 1020, it is declared that: "The said company is authorized to promote, establish and maintain the business of a general railway and electrical company. To erect, maintain and operate plants in this state for the generation of electricity and the supply of electric current for its own use and for sale to persons, natural or artificial," etc.

In these quotations is found the sole authority of the defendant to permit or to require, to excuse or to justify it in the performance of the acts complained of in this suit. The case is, therefore, plainly to be classed with B. & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, and other cases which we have cited, in which the effect of legislative authority has been discussed. It will be seen that the language is not imperative, but permissive, and that it does not confer statutory sanction for the commission of a nuisance in any way whatever, and most assuredly cannot be said to confer it in express terms, "or by clear and unquestionable implication from the powers given," so that it cannot be fairly said that "the Legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury," and immunity is not to be presumed from a general grant of authority.

But it is said that the decision in this case, if permitted to stand, will "practically debar the use of many of the most important and developing features of our modern growth."

It would be a source of regret if, in the administration of justice by the establishment and enforcement of sound principles, the prosperity of our people should be hindered or checked, but it would be not only a source of regret, but of reproach, if material prosperity were stimulated and encouraged by a refusal to give to every citizen a remedy for wrongs he may sustain, even though inflicted by forces which constitute factors in our material development and growth. Courts have no policies, and cannot permit consequences to influence their judgments further than to serve as warnings and incentives to thorough investigation and careful consideration of the causes submitted to them. Those duties being faithfully performed, courts may await the result with patience, if not always with confidence, and say, with the great Lord Mansfield, "Flat justitia, ruat celum."

The petition to rehear is denied.

(105 Va. 867)

SATTERFIELD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 8, 1906.)

1. INDICTMENT — ALLEGATION OF PREVIOUS CONVICTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for petit larceny alleged that accused had been twice before sentenced for a like offense and described the warrants issued against him for the prior offenses, which charged that accused did unlawfully take, steal, and carry away certain property, without averring that the taking was felonious. Held, that the indictment showed prior convictions of petit larceny, under Va. Code 1904, § 3907, prescribing a punishment for one convicted of petit larceny after prior convictions of a like offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 304.]

2. SAME.

The procedure provided by Va. Code 1904, § 3907, declaring that when a person is convicted of petit larceny, and it is alleged in the indictment and found by the jury that he has been before sentenced for a like offense, he shall be confined in jail not less than 80 days nor more than 1 year, etc., is cumulative, and leaves unimpaired the authority to prosecute an offender independently for successive offenses of petit larceny; and when that is done the punishment for the crime is unaffected by the fact that he may have been previously sentenced, and in such case the punishment is that prescribed by section 3707, and an indictment for the third offense of petit larceny is not bad because it alleges that accused was fined only for the second offense.

3. SAME.

As courts will take judicial notice of the charter of the city of Danville and the jurisdiction which chapter 5, § 5, thereof, as amended by Acts 1895-96, p. 596, c. 562, confers on the mayor's court, an allegation in an indictment for petit larceny that accused, formerly convicted of a like offense in the mayor's court of Danville, had been convicted by a court of competent jurisdiction, was sufficient, without showing the fact that it had jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 304.]

4. SAME.

An indictment, alleging, for the purpose of subjecting accused to additional punishment, that he had been previously convicted of crime, is good for the crime charged, though the former conviction cannot be shown.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 307.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW—VERDICT—SUFFICIENCY.

Va. Code 1904, § 3907, provides that for a third offense of petit larceny accused shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one year, nor more than two years. An indictment for larceny charged that accused had been twice before convicted of a like offense. The verdict was: "We * * * find the prisoner guilty as charged in the * * * indictment, and fix his punishment at one year in the state penitentiary." Held, that the verdict impliedly showed that the jury found that accused had been twice before convicted of a like offense, and was sufficient.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Lynchburg.

James Satterfield was convicted of petit larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

James H. Guthrie, for plaintiff in error. Wm. A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. At the December term, 1905, of the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg, the plaintiff in error, James Satterfield, was indicted for petit larceny. The indictment also alleged that the accused had been "twice before sentenced in the United States for the like offense," and proceeded to set out in totidem verbis two warrants against him, with the judgment of conviction and sentence of the mayor of the city of Danville, Va., before whom he was tried, imposing a fine for the commonwealth and city, respectively, indorsed on each.

There was a demurrer to the indictment, which the court overruled. Thereupon the accused pleaded not guilty, and upon the trial of that issue the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and fixed his punishment at one year in the state penitentiary. The court likewise overruled a motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence, and rendered the judgment under review, sentencing the prisoner in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

The grounds of demurrer to the indictment may be considered in the order in which they are stated in the petition for the writ of error.

It is insisted, in the first place, that, the accused having been indicted for petit larceny, the additional allegation that he had been twice before sentenced in the United States for the "like offense" is, standing alone, an insufficient averment in a prosecution under section 3907, Va. Code 1904, and that the warrants described in the indictment are not warrants for petit larceny, because they fail to charge the felonious taking of the property alleged to have been stolen.

The precise question involved in this assignment was passed on by this court in the recent case of Jones v. Morris, 97 Va. 43, 33 S. E. 377. At page 48 of 97 Va., page 378 of 33 S. E., the court observes: "For like reasons we are of opinion that the objection to the form of the warrant cannot be maintained. 'A warrant,' says Bishop (volume 1, p. 187), 'need not set out the crime with the fullness of an indictment, but it should contain a reasonable indication thereof. Minor defects will not render it inadequate as a justification to the officer.' It is true that the warrant in this case charges that Morris unlawfully did take, steal, and carry away money of the value of $40. It omits to charge that it was done feloniously, and we are not concerned to say that that word ought not properly to have appeared in it, or, if objected to by Morris, the warrant might not, for that reason, have been considered defective. The fact remains that no objection was taken, that the whole subject was investigated, and judgment of acquittal rendered. That judgment, we repeat, is a complete bar for any further prosecution for the same offense."

Wharton, in his work on Criminal Pleading and Practice (section 260), states the doctrine as follows: "The word 'feloniously' was at common law essential to all indictments for felony, whether at common law or statutory, although, the reason for the term being purely arbitrary, it is no longer necessary unless prescribed by statute, or unless describing a common-law or statutory felony." See, also, 1 Bishop's Crim. Law, § 260.

The term "felonious" is not used in the Virginia statute defining petit larceny, and the charge in the warrant that the accused did unlawfully take, steal, and carry away the property of another distinguishes the offense from a mere trespass, and stamps it as petit larceny.

The definition of Webster and other lexicographers of the verb "to steal" is "to take and carry away feloniously"; and the words "steal" and "larceny" are synonymous.

We are of opinion that the foregoing authorities are conclusive as to the sufficiency of the warrants in question, more especially when they are made the subject of collateral attack.

It is further insisted that the indictment is insufficient as an indictment for the third offense of petit larceny, because it alleges that the accused was fined for the second offense, the punishment for which, it is said, is not by fine, but by confinement in jail not less than 30 days nor more than 12 months. Va. Code 1904, § 3907.

This objection is founded upon the erroneous hypothesis that the accused was only amenable to prosecution for the second offense of petit larceny under section 3907. But the procedure provided by that section is not intended to be exclusive. The redress afforded by it is cumulative merely, and leaves unimpaired the authority of the commonwealth to prosecute and punish an offender independently for successive offenses of petit larceny, and when it so elects to proceed the punishment for the crime is unaffected by the fact that he may have before been sentenced in the United States for a like offense, and the punishment in such case is confinement in jail not less than 15 days nor more than 6 months, or by fine of not less than $5 nor more than $100, or both. Va. Code 1904, § 3707.

The third and last objection to the indictment is that it does not allege that the conviction of the accused was by a court of competent jurisdiction; that, the mayor's court of the city of Danville being a court of special and limited jurisdiction, there is no presumption in favor of its jurisdiction; and the fact that it has jurisdiction must affirmatively appear.

We are of opinion that this assignment is also without merit.

By section 5 of chapter 5 of the charter of the city of Danville, as amended by the act approved March 2d, 1896 (Acts 1895-96, p. 596, c. 562), it is provided that, "in criminal cases under the laws of the state, he [the mayor] shall exercise all the power and authority of a justice of the peace, not only within the corporate limits of said city, but for the space of one mile without and around the same." The courts will take judicial notice of such a city charter and the jurisdiction which it confers without averment or proof. Duncan v. City of Lynchburg, 2 Va. Dec. 700, 34 S. E. 964, 48 L. R. A. 331.

But, if such were not the case, the rule applicable to this species of indictment is thus accurately and succinctly stated in Am. & Eng. Enc. of Pl. & Pr. vol. 10, p. 490: "Where an indictment is drawn with a view to subjecting the defendant to additional punishment by reason of the fact that he had previously been convicted of the same offense, it will not invalidate the indictment itself if the former conviction cannot be shown, or if a former conviction which was not legal is shown, but the indictment will still be good for the offense charged therein without reference to the former conviction."

The trial court, therefore, did not err in overruling the demurrer to the indictment.

The next assignment of error involves the sufficiency of the verdict to warrant the court in rendering judgment upon it, and Thomas' Case, 22 Gratt. 912, is confidently relied on to sustain this assignment.

The prosecution is under section 3907. Va. Code 1904, which provides that, "where a person is convicted of petit larceny, and it is alleged in the indictment on which he is convicted, and admitted or, by the jury or justice before whom he is tried, found, that he has been before sentenced in the United States for the like offense, he shall be confined in jail not less than 30 days nor more than one year; and for a third, or any subsequent offense, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than two years."

In Thomas' Case, supra, the prosecution was for petit larceny, under chapter 199, § 27, of the code of 1860, which reads as follows: "When a free person is convicted of petit larceny, and it is alleged in the indictment on which he is convicted, and admitted, or by the jury found, that he has been before sentenced in the United States, for the like offense, he shall be sentenced to be confined in the penitentiary for one year." The indictment alleged that the accused had before been sentenced in the United States for the like offense. The jury returned a verdict, "We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty as charged in the within indictment," and the court sentenced him to confinement in the penitentiary for one year. Upon writ of error, this court held that in order to justify the punishment inflicted, by express terms of the statute, the fact that the accused had been before sentenced in the United States for the like offense must either have been admitted or found by the jury. That neither requirement of the statute had been complied with, and the judgment of the court, for that reason, was erroneous. The verdict of the jury did not expressly find that the accused had been formerly sentenced for the like offense, nor could that fact be inferred from the language of the verdict of guilty "as charged in the within indictment," for that language was satisfied by finding him guilty of the principal charge of petit larceny merely.

But the question is now presented in quite a different aspect. This prosecution is for the third offense of petit larceny, the punishment for which is confinement in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than two years, and the verdict of the jury is: "We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty as charged in the within indictment, and fix his punishment at one year in the state penitentiary." While the jury, it is true, do not expressly find that the accused had been twice before sentenced for petit larceny, they by necessary implication find that fact by the infliction of a punishment which they could not otherwise have lawfully imposed upon him. This, in our opinion, distinguishes the case in judgment from Thomas' Case, and fulfills the demand of the statute in the particular referred to.

The remaining assignment of error relied on by the prisoner is to the action of the court in overruling his motion for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury.

Of this assignment it is sufficient to say that under the rule of decision prescribed by section 3484 of Va. Code 1904, the evidence justified the finding of the jury, and the motion was properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

(59 W. Va. 1.)

STATE v. CLIFFORD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 13, 1906.)

1. HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—THREATS.

On the trial of an indictment for murder, evidence of threats, made by the deceased or his co-conspirator, previously communicated to the accused, is competent and proper for the purpose of shedding light upon the mental attitude of the prisoner toward the deceased at the time of the homicide, and of explaining the possession of the weapon with which the killing was effected, as tending to rebut any inference of malice which might be drawn from the fact of its possession on the occasion of its use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 338, 399.]

2. SAME.

When, in such case, there is evidence tending to establish a conspiracy on the part of the deceased and other persons to kill the accused, or do him grave bodily injury, and to show that the accused believed, and had reasonable ground to believe, that such conspiracy existed and the deceased was a party thereto, and the killing ensued immediately after an unprovoked assault upon, and severe beating of, the accused, by such other persons, the deceased standing by at the time, and there being evidence tending to show that he joined in the assault, evidence of threats made by such other persons and communicated to the accused before the assault, is admissible.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS—SETTING FORTH FORMS OF VERDICT.

An instruction setting forth six forms of verdict, proper for findings on an indictment for murder, and telling the jury that under the indictment they can return any one of said verdicts, is defective in failing to direct the attention of the jury to the requirement that any verdict so returned must be based upon their belief from the evidence; but, if it appears from other instructions given at the same time that the attention of the jury was repeatedly directed to this requirement, the giving of such instruction is not error.

4. HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS — INTENT — DELIBERATION.

It is not error to give, as an instruction to the jury in a criminal trial, the following legal proposition: "The court instructs the jury that to constitute a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, constituting murder of the first degree, it is not necessary that an intention to kill should exist for any particular length of time prior to the actual killing; it is only necessary that said intention should come into existence for the first time at the time of such killing, or any time previous."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 14, 586.]

5. SAME—DEGREES OF OFFENSE.

On the trial of an indictment for murder, it is not error to give instructions presenting the theories of guilt of murder of the first and second degrees, and directing the attention of the jury to the presumption of guilt arising from certain facts, in case the jury should believe them to be established by the evidence, if there is any evidence tending in any appreciable degree to prove such offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 642-646.]

6. SAME—MANSLAUGHTER.

When the homicide, in respect to which the accused is on trial, immediately followed an unprovoked assault upon, and severe beating of, him, and the evidence tends to prove the offense of manslaughter, the court may properly give instructions based upon the theory of guilt of murder, if there is any evidence in the case tending to prove the commission of such crime.

7. SAME—DEFENSES—ACCIDENT.

The defense of accidental and unintentional killing does not preclude the giving of instructions embodying the law relating to any offense charged in the indictment which the evidence tends to prove.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 638-641.]

8. CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

To determine whether the trial court has erred in the giving of instructions, all the instructions must be read together, and, if being so read and interpreted, according to the plain common sense meaning of the terms used, they state the law correctly as applied to the evidence, and it appears that the jury could not have been thereby misled to the prejudice of the accused, the verdict will not be disturbed, because they disclose a mere technical conflict in terms.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1990.]

9. SAME—APPEAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Refusal of the court to permit a witness to answer a question which, by its own terms and subject-matter, taken in connection with facts and circumstances already in evidence, shows its relevancy and materiality, is not available as error on a motion for a new trial, if the expected answer of the witness was not disclosed to the court at the time of the ruling. An appellate court, in reviewing a judgment on writ of error, cannot assume in such case that an answer favorable to the exceptor would have been given. So much of the decision in Gunn v. Railroad Co., 14 S. E. 465, 36 W. Va. 165, 32 Am. St. Rep. 842, as conflicts with this principle is disapproved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2932.]

10. HOMICIDE — MANSLAUGHTER — EVIDENCE — KILLING IN HEAT OF BLOOD.

A sudden intentional killing with a deadly weapon, by one who is not in any way at fault, in immediate resentment of a gross provocation, is prima facie a killing in heat of blood, and therefore an offense of no higher degree than voluntary manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 59-64.]

11. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

When in such case the evidence discloses that no time intervened between the giving of the provocation and the act of killing, within which passion could have subsided and reason regained its dominion, and the fatal act itself was not attended by circumstances of extreme cruelty and inhumanity, nor preceded by conduct from which malice can be inferred, a conviction of murder in the second degree should be set aside and a new trial allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 59-64, 502, 522.]

12. CRIMINAL LAW—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

A motion for a new trial, based on alleged insufficiency of evidence, is an appeal from the jury to the court on a question of law.

13. SAME — PASSING ON MOTION—FUNCTIONS OF COURT.

In passing on such a motion the court does not retry the case on the evidence nor disturb any findings made by the jury on evidence sufficient in law to sustain them. It simply determines whether, in law, the facts found, or which could have been found, constitute the right in action or the offense charged.

14. HOMICIDE — MALICE — QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In homicide cases, the question of malice is for the jury, when there is sufficient evidence to sustain a finding of its existence. Whether there is any evidence of it is a question for the court in giving or refusing instructions. Whether there is sufficient evidence of it to sustain a verdict is for the court on a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 562, 563.]

15. SAME—ACCIDENTAL KILLING.

In cases where the blow intended for one person by accident falls upon and kills another, the thing done follows the nature of the thing intended to be done, and the guilt or innocence of the slayer depends upon the same considerations that would have governed had the blow killed the person against whom it was directed. Hence the homicide is murder, or manslaughter, or excusable homicide, for precisely the same reasons that would have determined its character had the event conformed to the intent; and the principle is the same whether the misadventure proceeded from the misdirection of the blow or from a mistake in the identity of the victim.

Brannon, P., dissenting.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Paul Clifford was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Faulkner, Walker & Woods, for plaintiff in error. C. W. May, Atty. Gen., Frank Lively, and Allen B. Noll, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. Paul Clifford, under sentence by the circuit court of Berkeley county of imprisonment for the period of 10 years, upon conviction of the murder of Jacob Turner, has brought his case here on a writ of error.

The deceased came to his death by a shot from a pistol in the hands of the accused, but the circumstances of the killing were peculiar and unusual in some respects. Clifford was set upon and beaten in the nighttime by Charles and Joseph Cook, by way of punishment for an alleged insult to Jennie Cook, the wife of Joseph Cook, in the afternoon of the same day. No provocation was given by Clifford at the time of the assault. Having been accosted by the Cooks and charged with the language imputed to him, he denied it and attempted in every way to avoid any trouble with them. At that time Jennie Cook was absent and the conversation continued until she came up and charged Clifford with having used the language in question, and thereupon Charles Cook struck him with his fist, and Joseph joined in the assault. At the time of the blow thus given, Clifford was standing with a pitcher of milk in his left hand, while his right hand held the pistol in the pocket of his pantaloons. There is evidence tending to show that the Cooks were aware of his possession of the pistol at that time, but, if they were not, they immediately discovered it and attempted to wrest it from him. In the struggle which ensued over the possession of the pistol, and during which the beating of Clifford continued, the pistol was discharged and the ball injured one of the fingers of Charles Cook. Soon afterwards a second discharge of it sent a ball through the thigh of Joseph Cook. While the struggle was in progress, J. R. Clifford, father of the accused, came upon the scene with a repeating shotgun and called upon his son's assailants to let go of him, threatening, in the event of their refusal, to shoot them. Thereupon they broke away from him, Charles Cook being the last to do so; but, before doing so, he threw the accused backwards and then ran. Immediately after this the pistol was discharged a third time and the ball struck Turner in the head, killing him instantly. Whether it was fired by design or accident is a matter of controversy, as is also the exact position in which the accused was at the time of the shot. Another matter as to which there is contradictory evidence is whether Turner participated in the assault. Charles Cook testifies that his brother Joe, after having been shot, called upon Turner to assist in taking the revolver from the accused. The accused and one other witness testify that, after the second shot, Turner did join in the assault and continued to engage in it until the arrival of J. R. Clifford. J. R. Clifford testified that his son was engaged with three men when he came up, but he was unable, owing to the darkness, to recognize any of them. Turner was found dead at a point about 10 feet distant from that at which the accused was released, and J. R. Clifford says he saw a man fall a short distance from his son and in that direction, at the time of the third shot. Charles Cook says he ran in that direction, upon leaving the accused, and in this he is corroborated by another witness. Several witnesses swear that the accused rose to his feet and fired the fatal shot after taking a step forward in the direction of Turner. One says he not only did this, but looked at the deceased for about a minute before he fired. The father of the accused says the shot was fired as the latter arose from the backward position in which he had been thrown by Cook. The accused says he is unable to tell whether the pistol was discharged as he was thrown backward or as he was in the act of rising, and that he saw nobody and shot at nobody at the time, and is unable to state whether he discharged it by accident or design. Two of the officers who took him into custody on the night of the shooting, testify to an admission by him to the effect that he shot Turner, in which he said, by way of justification, that the deceased was coming towards him with a razor in his hand.

To show justification for possession of the pistol by the accused at the time of the affray, as well as to excuse the killing, on the theory of a conspiracy on the part of the deceased and the Cooks to kill the accused or do him great bodily harm, or, in case the jury should find the shooting to have been intentional, to mitigate the offense and reduce it to manslaughter, the facts relating to the transaction out of which the affray arose, and the conduct of Turner and the Cooks in the time intervening between that transaction and the affray, have been brought into the record. Some time in the afternoon of April 6, 1905, the day of the killing, a dispute arose between two children, a brother of the accused and a son of the deceased, near the house in which the accused resided. This house and the one in which Joseph and Charles Cook resided stood almost opposite each other on West Martin street, in the city of Martinsburg. Jennie Cook, the wife of Joseph, was a niece of Jacob Turner. The accused separated these two children, and, in doing so, did or said something that offended Jennie Cook, in consequence of which there was verbal altercation between him and her. She claims he called her a vile name. He admits that, but says he was provoked to it by an opprobrious epithet applied to him by her; and, after he had done so, she informed him that she would tell her husband who would shoot him like a dog, and later repeated the threat in different form, in the presence of Dr. Gray and a sister of the accused, saying: "That's all right; you wait till Joe catches you; he'll fix you. He'll kill you, you dirty nigger." He says he was further warned by a little boy, Walter Johnson, who said: "Mr. Paul, Mr. Cook's going to shoot you." Charles Cook worked at a hotel in Martinsburg, where he was called for by Joe Cook at about 5 o'clock that evening. Just what passed between them in the conversation there he did not state. He first said he was busy and had no time to talk, but later admitted that he did talk to him, and said, in response to a question as to whether he made an engagement: "I told him would be up home after a while." As soon as his work at the hotel was completed, he did go up to Joseph Cook's house, where he made his home, and where he found Jacob Turner and his brother Joe, standing near the front door. He either went in the house or started to go in, and very soon thereafter the two Cooks and Turner started out the street in the direction of the place at which the shooting occurred. Turner did not live on that street, but on a 15-foot alley, 198 feet south of said street back of the lot at the front of which he was killed on that street. The place of the killing was about 410 feet west of the house in which the Cooks resided. Charles Cook says Turner remarked as he started with them, "I am going over home," and that he and his brother were going out on the hill, in the same general direction. Whether Jennie Cook accompanied them all the way is not clear, but, if not, she followed them at no great distance, for she appeared on the scene very soon after the quarreling began. Just before this procession started from the house of Joseph Cook, the accused had left his house and gone in the same direction to the house of one Smith, which stood outside of the corporate limits, for a pitcher of milk, and, on the advice of his father, who knew of the threats, he took the pistol with him. He staid at the house of Smith only long enough to obtain the milk, and, on his return, when but a short distance from Smith's house, he was met by the two Cooks, and, according to his testimony, Jacob Turner. Thereupon the quarreling began, as hereinbefore detailed, and continued until they reached the point at which the assault was made. The distance from Cook's house to Smith's is 650 feet. According to all the testimony, the assault was made in front of the house of William Brown, standing on the north side of the street, 470 feet from Cook's house, and Turner's body was found at a point about 410 feet distant therefrom, on the south side of the street. The street at that point is about 60 feet wide.

The assignments of error are six in number, the first of which relates to instructions given at the instance of the state; the second, third, fourth, and fifth, to the refusal of the court to permit a witness to answer certain questions; and the sixth, to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

In the interest of clearness, the second, third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error will be disposed of first. In the course of the examination of J. R. Clifford he was asked if he knew the occasion for Paul Clifford having a revolver on his person that night; if he had heard any threats communicated to his son by Joseph and Charles Cook; if he had heard any threats communicated to his son that evening from Jennie Cook, the wife of Joseph Cook; and what, if anything, he knew of his own personal knowledge of any threats communicated to his son, made by Joseph and Charles Cook, or either of them, to do him great bodily harm. The court refused to permit the witness to answer any of these questions, but did allow the accused himself to testify to his knowledge of such threats, and then allowed witnesses to contradict him in respect thereto. This evidence was admissible. It is proper to prove communicated threats to shed light upon the mental attitude of the prisoner toward the deceased when the homicide occurred, and for the purpose of explaining the possession of the weapon and establishing justification for carrying it, and thus rebutting any inference of malice which might arise from the fact of its possession on the occasion of its use. State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792; State v. Clark, 51 W. Va. 457, 41 S. E. 204. By way of sustaining the action of the court in refusing to admit this evidence, it is urged that the threats did not emanate from Turner, but only from the Cooks. But, as they constituted parts of the series of events which led up to the killing of Turner bearing materially upon the situation of the accused at the time, and are logically inseparable from that event, they could not properly be excluded. The deceased was the father of the child concerning whom the difficulty arose. He, in company with Jennie Cook, had called upon the accused in the afternoon of that day for an explanation of his conduct toward the child. He was the uncle of Jennie Cook.

In consequence of these two relationships of the parties concerned, the accused might well suppose that he felt a deep interest in the controversy and might very naturally participate in any attempt which the Cooks might make upon him. No threat on the part of the accused against any one is proved until after the killing of Turner, and, at the time of the assault upon him, he declined combat and endeavored to avoid it. These facts, accompanied by proof of the previous threats against him, tended to show his possession of the weapon to be consistent with a lawful purpose and to negative any motive of revenge or other ill feeling towards his assailants or the deceased, which might arise from the possession thereof.

The evidence of communicated threats, although purporting to have been made by Jennie Cook, or all the Cooks, but not by Turner, was admissible for another reason. The evidence of conspiracy among the Cooks is amply sufficient to take the case to the jury on the question whether they confederated and conspired to injure the accused. State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 43 S. E. 230. Turner accompanied them from their home toward the place at which the assault was made, very shortly before it occurred, and was found at the place which the evidence indicates was appointed by the Cooks for their rendezvous. He was present while the assault and beating were in progress, and near enough to render assistance. His relation to the Cooks, being the uncle of Joseph Cook's wife, was such as was calculated to make him feel an interest in the matter. He was the father of the child concerning whom the original trouble had arisen. Two witnesses swear that he actually participated in the assault. All these circumstances tend to prove that he had knowledge of the common design and purpose of the Cooks, and, if having such knowledge he joined in that purpose and design, he made himself their co-conspirator and was as much at fault as the Cooks themselves. The threats previously communicated to the accused, if any, together with the assault, constituted evidence of ground for a reasonable belief on his part that he was then and there the victim of a conspiracy, and, if the deceased joined in the assault, that he was their co-conspirator. Upon this evidence, it was the right and duty of the jury to inquire whether the provocation involved in the attack upon the accused was provocation given by Turner as well as by the Cooks. The legal effect of such provocation touches and bears upon the nature of the offense, if the shooting of Turner was intentional, as the testimony of some of the witnesses indicates, and not accidental. The intentional taking of life in hot blood and under excitement, occasioned by sufficient provocation, is not murder, but manslaughter. State v. Beatty, 51 W. Va. 232, 41 S. E. 434. Voluntary manslaughter is the intentional, unlawful, and felonious, but not deliberate or malicious, taking of life. The common-law definition of involuntary manslaughter is an unintentional killing, resulting from an unlawful act on the part of the accused, not amounting to a felony or from a lawful act, negligently performed. Whar. Hom. §§ 4-6. As the shot was fired immediately after the assailants of the accused had released him, it was the duty of the jury, upon their oaths and honest belief, from all the evidence, to say, in view of this provocation, if they believed there was a conspiracy of which the accused had knowledge, whether the firing of the shot which killed the deceased was intentional, and, if so, whether it was the result of passion, anger, and excitement, occasioned by the assault of the conspirators, and, if so, to return a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. But, if on consideration of all the evidence they believed the shot was unintentional, they should have acquitted, and, if from all the evidence they believed the shooting was deliberate and malicious, as well as intentional, their verdict should have been guilty of murder.

Since the degree of the offense, when the killing is intentional and the evidence tends to establish provocation, as known in the law of manslaughter, depends upon the mental condition of the accused, he is entitled to prove all facts and circumstances that tend to show reasonable ground for belief on his part that the deceased was a party to the assault made upon him. If Jennie Cook had made the threats, and Turner had accompanied her when she came to him to obtain satisfaction and then appeared at the place of the assault with the Cooks, these were circumstances tending to produce belief, on the part of the accused, that Turner had joined them in purpose and design. The evidence of the threats, therefore, became material, although the jury might disbelieve the testimony as to Turner's having joined in the assault. "Where two conspire to kill or inflict grave bodily injury on a third person, and in carrying out this purpose one of them fires a pistol at such person, who immediately pursues them and kills the one who did not fire the pistol, it is manslaughter." State v. Gaskins, 93 N. C. 547. To the effect that in determining the degree of the offense the jury must consider the knowledge and belief of the accused, as to the attitude of the deceased towards him during the assault, and are not controlled by his actual attitude, see 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 185. "If two be fighting, and another interfere with intent to part them, but does not signify such intent, and he be killed by one of the combatants, this is but manslaughter; for the latter might think that he came in aid of his opponent, unless he had notice of his real intent." 1 East, P. C. 292. "The statute does not require the actual occurrence of an insult, either by words or conduct, but it is sufficient that the accused acted on information given by another, if he believed it, and the killing was done in consequence of passion thereby aroused, though in fact no insult had been given. The homicide must be viewed from the standpoint of the accused." 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 181.

It has been suggested that failure of the attorneys for the accused to state to the court, when objection was made to the questions, what they expected to prove in response thereto, precludes a reversal for this error. To make such an error cause of reversal, it is only necessary that the relevancy and materiality of the evidence offered shall appear. When this is not disclosed by the nature of the question, it is necessary that it be made to appear in some other way, and this is usually done by statements of counsel, showing what he expects to prove and how it becomes relevant to the issue. Until a comparatively recent date, there was no suggestion of necessity for the statement of the anticipated answer of the witness, when the question, viewed in the light of its subject-matter, the evidence in the case, and the issues, disclosed its relevancy and materiality. Commencing with Kay v. Railroad Co., 47 W. Va. 467, 35 S. E. 973, this court has, from time to time, added this requirement, relying for its authority, for the most part, upon Childress' Adm'r v. Railway Co., 94 Va. 186, 26 S. E. 424; Insurance Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 146, 26 S. E. 421, 36 L. R. A. 271, 64 Am. St. Rep. 715; Kimball v. Carter, 95 Va. 77, 27 S. E. 823, 38 L. R. A. 570; and Railway Co. v. Reiger, 95 Va. 418, 28 S. E. 590. It is asserted in Sesler v. Coal Co., 51 W. Va. 318, 41 S. E. 216, and Thomas v. Electrical Co., 54 W. Va. 395, 46 S. E. 217. In the older Virginia decisions, having binding authority upon this court, this requirement is not found. In Carpenter v. Utz, 4 Grat. (Va.) 270, the court say it must appear, from a statement of the evidence offered and excluded, that error has been committed, in order to reverse a judgment; or, if its relevancy depends upon other facts in the cause, the party alleging the error should present such a case on the record as shows the relevancy of the evidence rejected. They further say testimony which does not appear of itself, or upon the facts stated in the record, to have been relevant, will be held in the appellate court to have been properly excluded. In that case the court undoubtedly heard the evidence offered and then passed upon its relevancy. It did not refuse to allow the party to disclose by his witness what he desired to prove. In other words, it did not sustain objections to proper questions asked, nor is there anything in the opinion which in any degree sustains the position that the court may refuse to permit a witness to answer a question, which, on its face, discloses the relevancy and materiality of its subject-matter. Johnson's Ex'r v. Jennings' Adm'r, 10 Grat. (Va.) 1, 60 Am. Dec.

323, only requires the bill of exceptions to show relevancy of the excluded evidence; and an examination of the opinion discloses that the evidence was before the court, but there was nothing in it from which the court could see that it was relevant. Those parts of the syllabus and opinion which say the bill of exceptions must show the answer of the witness, as well as the question, relate to the admission of alleged improper evidence. Of course, where evidence has been admitted, the court cannot say it is prejudicial without knowing what it is. That is the ruling in Belrne v. Rosser, 26 Grat. (Va.) 537. This court held the same in Nease v. Capehart, 15 W. Va. 299. This rule is invariable in all courts. Mays v. Deaver, 1 Iowa, 216; Speers v. Fortner, 6 Iowa, 553; Mosier v. Vincent, 34 Iowa, 478; Willey v. Hall, 8 Iowa, 62; Campbell v. Chamberlain, 10 Iowa, 337; Hanan v. Hale, 7 Iowa, 153; Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 121, 5 N. W. 84; Somerville v. Richards, 37 Mich. 299; Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. 840; Smith v. Insurance Co., 60 Vt. 682, 15 Atl. 353, 1 L. R. A. 216, 6 Am. St. Rep. 144; Carpenter v. Corinth, 58 Vt. 214, 2 Atl. 170. In this class of cases the party loses the benefit of his exception by no improper action of the court, but by his own failure to have a record made of what transpired. McDowell's Ex'r v. Crawford, 11 Grat. (Va.) 377, decided by a divided court, held it error in the trial court to refuse to permit a witness to be recalled and to have produced certain books which had never been tendered as evidence in the court below, but the nature of the contents of which had been disclosed by oral testimony.

In Gunn v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 165, 14 S. E. 465, 32 Am. St. Rep. 842, this court said: "Where the form of the question propounded to the witness on the stand indicates of itself that it is framed and intended to elicit in reply something said at the time and place of the accident as part of the res gestæ, held, it is error to refuse the question, but the answer should be heard or seen, and then its competency passed upon." This has never been overruled by any express reference to it. In Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. 575, it is recognized and the two cases distinguished in the following language: "This question does not itself, like that in Gunn v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 165, 14 S. E. 465, 32 Am. St. Rep. 842, import proof of anything but that single fact, which itself would be immaterial." The question in Jackson v. Hough related to an isolated fact, which, without other evidence connecting it with the issue, would have been irrelevant. The ground of its exclusion was not failure to say what the answer would be, but want of anything in the question to show its materiality. The distinction marked in Jackson v. Hough seems to have been lost sight of in Kay v. Railway Co., 47 W. Va. 467, 35 S. E. 973, where the syllabus in the former is quoted as importing that the answer must be given in order to show materiality, when the question is itself disclosed. Then that case is followed by the other late cases to which reference has been made. The result is that we have two rules, in consequence of which it becomes necessary to determine which is the correct one.

Many cases from other states hold that, in order to make an exception to the action of the court in refusing to allow a witness to answer a question, the record must show what the answer would have been, if permitted. See Spaulding v. Jennings, 173 Mass. 65, 53 N. E. 204; Springer v. Pritchard, 22 Nev. 313, 39 Pac. 1009; McGowan v. Railroad Co., 95 N. C. 417; Railroad Co. v. Cheek, 152 Ind. 663, 53 N. E. 641; Paddleford v. Cook, 74 Iowa, 433, 38 N. W. 137; Small v. Navigation & Mining Co., 40 Me. 274; Sullivan v. Schultz, 22 Mont. 541, 57 Pac. 279; Le May v. Brett, 81 Minn. 506, 84 N. W. 339; Kraxberger v. Rolter, 91 Mo. 404, 3 S. W. 872, 60 Am. Rep. 262; Fire Ins. Co. v. Berg, 44 Neb. 522, 62 N. W. 862; Hummel v. State, 17 Ohio St. 628; Railroad v. Stonecipher, 95 Tenn. 311, 32 S. W. 208; Felker v. Grant, 10 S. D. 141, 72 N. W. 81; Avery v. Wilson, 47 S. C. 78, 25 S. E. 286; Roach v. Caldbeck, 64 Vt. 593, 24 Atl. 989. After careful consideration of Carpenter v. Utz and McDowell's Ex'r v. Crawford, I am convinced that they are not in conflict with this rule. In the former, the excluded evidence appeared in the record. It was not a case of refusing merely to allow a proper question to be answered. In the latter, the offered evidence was documentary, and the record disclosed its existence and character. Gunn v. Railroad Co. is the only Virginia or West Virginia case enunciating the rule therein stated. As authority for it, Scotland Co. v. Hill, 112 U. S. 183, 5 Sup. Ct. 93, 28 L. Ed. 692, was cited. At that date, it seemed to be about the only case of its kind. As the opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Waite, it was entitled to great respect, although he cited no precedent or authority for it, and admitted that other courts had held the contrary. In Patrick v. Graham, 132 U. S. 627, 10 Sup. Ct. 194, 33 L. Ed. 460, the opposite rule was rigidly enforced. The only other case found sustaining Gunn v. Railroad Co. is Commissioners v. Gantt, 78 Md. 286, 28 Atl. 101, 29 Atl. 610. The late decisions of this court are all the other way. In addition to cases already cited, see Snooks v. Wingfield, 52 W. Va. 441, 448, 44 S. E. 277; Williams v. Belmont, etc., Co., 55 W. Va. 84, 46 S. E. 802. This accords with the great weight of authority everywhere. 2 Cyc. 1045; 3 Cyc. 165, citing numerous cases; Elliott, App. Pro. §§ 743, 744. In view of this vast array of authorities, we are bound to say that, if Gunn v. Railroad Co. has not been already overruled, as regards this question of practice, it must now be disapproved and declared to be not law in this state. Error must affirmatively appear in order to reverse. It cannot, in any case, be presumed. To reverse this judgment for refusal to allow these questions to be answered, it would be necessary to assume that the witness could have answered them favorably to the accused. That the court cannot do, however unfortunate the result may be.

The first instruction complained of set forth six forms of verdict—guilty of murder in the first degree without recommendation, guilty of murder in the first degree with recommendation of imprisonment, guilty of murder in the second degree, guilty of voluntary manslaughter, guilty of involuntary manslaughter, and not guilty—and told the jury that, under the indictment, they could return any one of said verdicts. Instructions Nos. 2, 3, and 4 are as follows: (2) "The court instructs the jury that to constitute a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, constituting murder of the first degree, it is not necessary that an intention to kill should exist for any particular length of time prior to the actual killing; it is only necessary that said intention should come into existence for the first time at the time of such killing, or any time previous. (3) The court instructs the jury that, where a homicide is proved, the presumption is that it is murder in the second degree. If the state would elevate it to murder in the first degree, she must establish the characteristics of that crime, and, if the prisoner would reduce it to manslaughter, the burden is on him. (4) The court instructs the jury that a man is presumed to intend that which he does, or which is the immediate or necessary consequence of his act; and, if the jury believe from the evidence in this case that Paul Clifford, the prisoner, with a deadly weapon in his possession, without any, or upon a very slight provocation, gave to the deceased, Jacob Turner, a mortal wound, then the said Paul Clifford is prima facie guilty of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and the necessity of proving extenuating circumstances is thrown upon the prisoner; and, unless the prisoner has proved such extenuating circumstances, or such circumstances arise out of the case made by the state, the jury must find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree."

The objection to instruction No. 1 is that it contains no reference whatever to the evidence. Failure to qualify it by saying that, in order to return any one of said verdicts, the jury must believe the defendant guilty of the offense named in the verdict, is the basis of criticism. The court, no doubt, intended nothing more than to advise the jury as to their power, if from the evidence they believed the defendant guilty of any one of the offenses charged in the indictment, to find accordingly. The other instructions given for the state do not supply this defect, if defect it be, by saying any verdict the jury should find must rest upon their belief from the evidence, but, in the instructions given for the defendant, three in number, the attention of the jury is specifically and repeatedly directed to the requirement of the law that their verdict must rest upon the evidence and their belief therefrom of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. Though instruction No. 1, standing alone and unaided by other instructions, might be erroneous, it is correct as far as it goes, and, the defect in it having been supplied by other instructions, the defendant cannot be deemed to have been prejudiced or injured thereby. A similar instruction was given in State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 154, 43 S. E. 230, and an assignment of error was predicated thereon, but the court refused to disturb the verdict on account thereof. If an instruction correctly states the law as far as it goes, and is defective only in failing to state all that should be said in reference to its subject-matter, the court commits no error in giving it, provided the defect is supplied by another instruction given. State v. Clark, 51 W. Va. 457, 462, 41 S. E. 204; State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 43 S. E. 230.

The last clause of instruction No. 2, relating to the element of intent in the crime of murder, says: "It is only necessary that said intention should come into existence for the first time at the time of such killing, or any time previous." The existence of such intent at the time of the killing is a necessary ingredient of crime, and it is clearly not enough that the prisoner intended such purpose at some previous time. The jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that, though he entertained such purpose before the killing, it must have continued and moved him in the act of the killing. The instruction correctly quotes the law as laid down in Wright's Case, 33 Grat. (Va.) 880, and approved in State v. Morrison, 49 W. Va. 210, 217, 38 S. E. 481, and, no doubt, other cases decided by this court. But, in these decisions, it is given as abstract law, addressed to the legal profession, and not as a formula for the guidance of a jury of laymen in the trial of a case, and is not as accurate as it might be for that purpose. However, it seems to have been deemed, by the prisoner and his counsel as well as by the attorney for the state, unnecessary to advise the jury of the necessity of the existence of criminal intent at the very moment of the killing. Two instructions relating to the element of intent were given at the instance of the accused, in neither of which was the attention of the jury directed to this point. The irresistible inference is that it was so plainly and palpably obvious to the jury as to render such action useless. The plain object of the instruction is set forth in the first clause thereof. It was to relieve the jury of any difficulty they might encounter from finding that the conception of a design to kill and the act of killing were contemporaneous. The last clause pursues the same object. It relates to the time of forming the intent, assuming it to have continued until the time of the killing. This is the plain sense and meaning of the instruction, and the court cannot assume that a jury of reasonable and prudent men would probably be misled by it. A judgment cannot be reversed except for some act of the court which may have prejudiced the party complaining though there be inaccuracy of statement of an instruction, it does not amount to an error, unless it is calculated to mislead the jury and may have done so, and did, for aught that the court can see. In determining whether it may have had such effect, the court must view the language as having been addressed to men of, at least, average intelligence. There is no other standard by which to test it. So viewing this instruction, we are unable to say it could reasonably have had such effect, and it is evident that counsel on both sides, looking at the instruction from the same point of view, having the advantage of personal presence at the scene of the trial, knowledge of the jurors, the tenor and course of the argument, and all that transpired before the jury, were of the same opinion. Therefore we hold that no error was committed in giving it.

The objections to instructions 3 and 4 are substantially the same as were urged against them in the case of State v. Taylor, 50 S. E. 247, 57 W. Va. —. A further contention against the propriety of these instructions is the lack of evidence that the accused was the aggressor, or in any way in fault, at the time the assault was made upon him, and the presence of evidence tending to show that the discharge of the pistol was accidental and unaccompanied by any criminal intent. After a careful inquiry as to the propriety of giving such instructions, this court declared, in State v. Taylor, as follows: "When the state of the evidence in a criminal case tends to prove facts, from which presumptions of guilt arise, under rules of evidence, established by a long and uniform course of judicial determination, the trial court may properly bring them to the attention of the jury by instructions, aptly and correctly stating them. Such instructions, if properly framed, neither assume the existence of the facts, from which the presumptions arise, nor interfere with the province of the jury as to the weight of the evidence." Their application, therefore, depends upon the state of the evidence. If there is any evidence tending to prove the offense of murder of the second degree and murder of the first degree, the court did not err in giving these instructions. Upon one view of the evidence, its tendency is to prove the Cooks to have been the only actors and Turner an innocent bystander. Certain witnesses testify that he stood at the place at which he was found dead, from the beginning until the end of the affray, with his hands in his pockets, and one witness, at least, says his hands were still in his pockets when found dead. If he did not participate in the assault, as stated by the accused and another witness, the evidence as to his connection with the conspiracy is purely circumstantial. One witness testifies that the accused, after rising, took one step toward the deceased, stopped, looked at him a minute, and then fired. The testimony tending to prove these things as circumstances constitutes evidence of intentional, deliberate, and malicious shooting, although the jury must, in the same connection, consider whether the accused had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, the deceased was a co-conspirator and present as an aider and abettor, but taking no actual part in the assault, in order to determine whether the accused is guilty of anything more than manslaughter. It therefore affords foundation and justification for the giving of these instructions. Other instructions in the case present other and different theories, founded upon different and conflicting tendencies of other portions of the testimony and circumstances shown. In determining what instructions shall be given the court does not consider the weight of any evidence. It simply lays down rules for the analysis and application thereof by the jury. It is enough that there is evidence appreciably tending to prove or establish a certain theory of a case, however slight the degree of its weight. And a court need not withhold an instruction for paucity of evidence, if there be any, tending in any appreciable degree to establish the hypothesis embodied in the instruction.

In Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Grat. (Va.) 485, Judge Lee, speaking for the court, said: "In a plain case of a total absence of evidence tending to make out the supposed case, the court may well refuse to give any instruction based upon it. But where there is such evidence, of however little weight it may appear to the court, or however inadequate in its opinion, to make out the case supposed, it is best and safest for the court not to refuse to give the instruction asked for, if it propound the law correctly." See, also, Early v. Garland's Lessee, 13 Grat. (Va.) 1; Honesty v. Commonwealth, 81 Va. 283; Fire Association v. Hogwood, 82 Va. 342, 4 S. E. 617. Certain decisions of this court may seem to be in conflict with the above-quoted doctrine of the early Virginia decisions. Certain it is that some general expressions used in them indicate deviation from the rule declared by them. Blloyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75, holds that a court should not give an instruction based upon an hypothesis, though supported by some evidence, if the evidence is so weak that the court would set aside a verdict based thereon. State v. Belknap, 39 W. Va. 427, 19 S. E. 507, says the evidence must fairly tend to prove the facts upon which the instruction is based. Parkerson Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 48 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255, holds that the hypothesis embodied in the instruction must be fairly presented by the evidence. McDonald v. Cole, 46 W. Va. 186, 32 S. E. 1033, holds that the evidence must fairly present the hypothesis and be sufficient to sustain a verdict predicated thereon. No authority whatever is cited in the first three of the above decisions for the propositions asserted in them. The last one cites Bloyd v. Pollock and Industrial Co. v. Schultz. In Carrico v. Railroad Co., 39 W. Va. 86, 19 S. E. 571, 24 L. R. A. 50, the ruling in Bloyd v. Pollock was virtually condemned, and those of the early Virginia cases above cited approved, to this extent, that this court will not reverse because the court below gave an instruction predicated upon evidence, "though that evidence be very weak in the opinion of this court." Carrico v. Railroad Co. would be sufficient authority for refusing to disturb the verdict on account of the giving of instructions 3 and 4, as not having been based upon sufficient evidence. But a new trial is allowed on another ground, and the case must go back. Therefore this court must say whether it is the duty of the trial court to determine, in passing upon the propriety of the instruction complained of, to weigh the evidence and see whether it will sustain the hypothesis presented by the instruction. To so hold would put it in the power of the court to take any case from the jury, when the evidence on one side seems to be too weak to sustain a verdict in favor of that side, and this, without any motion or application for such action by either of the parties. Since the parties are content to proceed in the exercise of their constitutional right of trial by jury, however weak their respective cases may be, it seems that an interference by the court, upon its own motion, would be a virtual denial of such right. Until the court is asked to interfere, its duty is merely to preside over the trial by the jury. Decision after decision says the weight of the evidence during the progress of the trial, and until after verdict, is for the jury and not the court, and any instruction or other action of the court, invading the province of the jury, by direction as to the weight of the evidence, is cause of reversal. After verdict, when the jury has completed its work and the parties have had the benefit of the constitutional guaranty, the function of the court begins, upon a motion to set aside the verdict for insufficiency of evidence. The law regards jurors as being better calculated to weigh evidence than judges. A suitor may prefer the judgment of twelve men upon the weight of his evidence to that of one man upon the bench, and, however weak or strong his case may be upon the evidence, he has the right to proceed with it before the jury until, upon some proper application, such as a motion to direct a verdict, a motion to exclude evidence, or a demurrer to the evidence, the court has no right to interfere. The cases which seem to be in conflict with this view are only so in the generality of expressions used in the syllabi and opinions. An analysis of the evidence shows that it did not really tend, in any appreciable degree, to sustain the hypothesis stated in the instructions. In some of them, there was none. "It is not for the court, in ruling upon evidence, or in framing instructions, to determine the probative force of evidence. If the evidence is material, relevant, and competent, it is for the jury, and instructions bearing upon the evidence, without respect to its weight or credibility, cannot be deemed irrelevant. Accordingly, an instruction cannot be deemed erroneous if there be any evidence on which to base it, no matter how slight and inconclusive that evidence may be." 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 181, citing decisions from Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia. The very excellent work just quoted from qualifies this only to the extent of saying an instruction should not be given upon evidence which raises at the most a mere conjecture, nor upon evidence which is so slight as to amount merely to an assumption. Nowhere does it state that the evidence to warrant an instruction must be sufficient to support a verdict founded upon it. This constitutes no exception to, or qualification of, the general rule above stated, and that rule seems to be universally observed, except in the general expressions found in some of the decisions of this court and heretofore referred to.

Freedom from fault on the part of the accused, at the inception of the assault upon him, is a circumstance in his favor on the issue as to whether he is guilty of any offense graver than that of manslaughter, but it is clearly not conclusive in his favor, and therefore does not preclude the giving of instructions predicated upon the theory of murder. One who is attacked without cause, and having the greatest provocation, may nevertheless be guilty of murder. "Where the killing, although intentional, is done in passion, in heat of blood, upon sudden provocation by gross indignity, out of tenderness for the frailty of human nature, the law reduces the offense to manslaughter, but, however great the provocation may have been, if there has been sufficient time for passion to subside and for reason to return, the homicide is murder." State v. Beatty, 51 W. Va. 232, 41 S. E. 434; McWhirt's Case, 3 Grat. (Va.) 594, 46 Am. Dec. 196; Whar. Hom. § 443. The time intervening between the cessation of the beating and the firing of the shot which killed the deceased was very short, according to all the testimony, but there was an intervening period, and whether there was sufficient time for reason to regain its sway depends upon other circumstances, such as the temperament of the accused, the nature of the provocation, his surroundings, etc., as well as lapse of time. Whar. Hom. § 449. Another element entering into the case is whether there was any provocation on the part of the deceased, within the meaning of the law, a matter concerning which a good deal has been said herein.

Does the defense of accidental killing render these instructions improper? It is urged, upon the authority of State v. Cross, 42 W. Va. 253, 24 S. E. 996, that it does. The theory upon which the majority of the court reached a conclusion in that case is made very plain by the opinion. They said: "There was no evidence of premeditated or intentional killing." If not, no instructions based upon such theory could properly be given, and every instruction that presented any hypothesis of guilt of such offense was held improper. In the course of the opinion, want of evidence is repeatedly adverted to, and on page 257, 42 W. Va., page 497, 24 S. E., it is said: "This instruction was improper, in this case, for the same reason that all the others were improper." This case, as practically all others, presents a number of issues and theories. Some of them are inconsistent necessarily. If they were not, there could be but one view of the case. The defendant himself presents inconsistent theories, and has a perfect right to do so, and it is the duty of the jury to adopt that one, whether presented by the state or the prisoner, which, upon their oaths, they believe, beyond a reasonable doubt from the evidence, to be the true hypothesis. A proper instruction upon one theory should not be refused because it is inconsistent with a proper instruction based upon another. What modification of the two instructions here under consideration would be necessary to keep before the jury, without the aid of any other instruction, the defense of accidental killing? Nothing more than to insert in instruction No. 3 the word "intentional" before "homicide," and in No. 4 the word "intentionally" before the word "gave." If this had been done, what basis would there be for the contention against the propriety of these instructions? Absolutely none that could be founded upon their language or terms. Not a word in these instructions countenances the view that the killing would be murder in the absence of the element of intent. They assume nothing except that the jurors, as intelligent men, know that accidental killing is not criminal. Two instructions given for the defendant impressed upon the jury in the strongest terms the necessity of the existence of intent, on the part of the accused, to kill the deceased, as a prerequisite to their finding him guilty of any offense. All these instructions taken together, and the jury had them all before them at the same time, cannot be so read as to leave the jury without instruction or guidance on the question of intent; nor, when read together, is there any contradiction in their meaning, though there may be a technical one in terms. "The instructions given to the jury must be taken together; and it is not necessary to insert in each separate instruction all the exceptions, limitations, and conditions which are inserted in the instructions as a whole." State v. Dodds, 54 W. Va. 289, 46 S. E. 228. "Instructions to the jury must be taken and read as a whole, and, if, upon being so read and construed, they state the law correctly, and do not misstate it in any particular, and no proper instruction asked for has been refused, the verdict will not be disturbed on the ground that additional proper instructions could have been given, or that some particular instruction, standing alone, might tend to mislead the jury." State v. Kellison, 56 W. Va. 690, 47 S. E. 166.

A motion made to the court for a new trial, on the ground of insufficiency of evidence, presents an entirely different question from that which arises upon a request for an instruction. Upon such motion the court has more extensive powers to deal with the evidence. The jury trial is complete. The function of the jury has been performed, and that of the court begins. By his motion, the accused appeals from the decision of the jury to the court on a question of law. He prays the judgment of the court as to whether the evidence upon which the jury has founded its verdict is sufficient in law to sustain it. By his own act, he brings the question before the court. In entertaining this motion, the court does not officiously meddle with the province and function of the jury, or the rights of parties, respecting jury trial, but simply takes under advisement and consideration the legal question presented, and, after argument and mature consideration, disposes of the motion. In this way, all confusion in, and danger of prejudicing, the jury trial, by hasty and ill-considered rulings, are avoided. In sustaining a motion to set aside a verdict on this ground, the court does not undo anything the jury has legally performed. It simply restores to the party what the jury, in contemplation of law, has deprived of him, or withheld from him. It is in no sense a retrial of the case by the court on the evidence, as the jury tried it. The court merely ascertains, from all the facts which were found by the jury, or could have been found, whether the elements necessary to make out title to the right in action, or to constitute the crime charged, are shown, and then declares the law accordingly.

It was held in State v. Henry, 51 W. Va. 283, 41 S. E. 439, that in criminal cases the court, in passing upon a motion for a new trial, will reject all the conflicting oral evidence of the exceptor, and give full faith and credit to that of the adverse party, as was formerly done in civil cases. Whether there is any reason for discriminating between civil and criminal cases in this respect, it is not necessary to determine now; for nothing presented by the evidence in this case would produce a result, under the operation of the new rule, different from that which is produced by the application of the old one. Having disregarded the conflicting oral evidence adduced on behalf of the accused, it still appears that there was gross provocation to the accused, growing out of the transaction between him and the son of the deceased. The deceased was present at the assault, and the accused knew the relationship existing among all these parties, as well as the purpose for which the Cooks had accosted him. As Turner was present, it is not to be assumed that the accused did not know he was there. Therefore he had reasonable ground for believing that the purpose of this assemblage was to inflict bodily injury upon him. This was done in a most unequal contest, as regards physical strength; two men assailing one. For the purposes of this inquiry, it must be assumed that the fatal shot was intentionally fired toward the deceased. If the shooting had occurred during the progress of this fight, the jury could not have said, without disregarding the evidence, that the accused was not then in a high state of passion and excitement, such as to preclude a finding of deliberate shooting. It did not occur until after his assailants had left him, but it did occur immediately after. J. T. Carter, one of the witnesses for the state, says: "He made about one step towards Jake, and then shot." On cross-examination, the same witness said the accused had fired "just as quick as he could get himself together." Robert Spears made the following statement in answer to a question: "Why Paul made one step toward Jake, and he looked at him for about a minute, and he fired." On cross-examination he said: "Paul made one step towards Jake, and shot." This is all the evidence that could be regarded as tending to show time for the subsidence of passion. According to Carter's testimony, there was no act on the part of the accused indicating reflection. The other witness' testimony is very indefinite. "About a minute" is absolutely devoid of any certainty, for it is a phrase very commonly used to denote a mere point of time, and not the lapse of any certain period. This testimony rather implies that there was a halt, as if for deliberation, before the firing of the fatal shot, but it is wholly uncertain as to the purpose. It all occurred in the darkness of night. Was it for deliberation or for the purpose of locating the man who had been beating him? However this may be, it was almost imperceptible, and indicated no departure from the struggle which had preceded it. There was no turning aside to some other and distinct matter, such as a social or business transaction, indicative of relaxation of the passion which confessedly had dominated the mind of the accused up to that point. This is too slight to sustain a finding of such subsidence or relaxation.

In State v. Beatty, 51 W. Va. 232, 41 S. E. 434, it was held that: "When time has intervened between the date of provocation and the date of the killing, the question whether the killing was done in the heat of blood is for the jury." The application of this law requires evidence of the lapse of some period of time within which the jury might deem it reasonable to say either that reason had regained her sway, or, if not, it is reasonable to suppose that the accused had nursed and fed his anger and deliberately kept it alive. What is the rule where there has been no such lapse of time? Is the question of intent one for the jury under all circumstances, without regard to the existence or nonexistence of a "cooling period"? It is often said by the authorities that intent is a question of fact, the determination of which is peculiarly within the province of the jury. It is to be observed, however, that this most frequently occurs in the discussion of the action of the court in giving or refusing instructions. As has been indicated, these rulings are made without reference to the weight or probative force of the evidence, and the declarations made by the courts of review respecting them are not applicable, when it is the duty of the court to deal with the weight of the evidence. A great many decisions hold that it is the duty of the court to grant a new trial when the facts disclosed by the evidence are not such as to justify the finding of the jury. Is it true that in every case in which it appears that the accused has taken the life of his fellow man, and the jury has found him guilty, after weighing the evidence, under proper instructions by the court, neither the trial court nor the appellate court can grant a new trial, because the question of intent is, under all circumstances, one of fact for the jury? The authorities answer this in the negative. In numerous instances, convictions of murder have been reversed because the evidence did not justify them. Gulford v. State, 24 Ga. 315; Thompson v. State, 1 Tex. App. 56; State v. Brown, 15 Rich. Law (S. C.) 59; People v. Kohler, 49 Mich. 324, 13 N. W. 608; Hayward v. People, 96 Ill. 492; Holly v. State, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 141; Leake v. State, Id. 144; Ake v. State, 31 Tex. 416; Harris v. State, 36 Ark. 127; Miller v. State, 74 Ind. 1; Petty v. State, 65 Tenn. 610; Brown v. State (Miss.) 7 South. 359.

The better opinion seems to be that in criminal as well as civil law there are certain limits within which the jury must be confined. They cannot find the elements of murder or any other offense when the evidence wholly fails to establish them. That a grievous provocation immediately resented with violence, resulting in death, reduces the offense from murder to manslaughter, is a rule of law, seems to be asserted by all the books. In McWhirt's Case, 3 Grat. (Va.) 594, 46 Am. Dec. 196, the court entered upon a long and laborious analysis of the evidence, on the motion for a new trial, for the purpose of determining whether sufficient time had elapsed between the provocation and the killing to allow the passion of the accused to subside. Had it been a mere question for the jury and not for the court, why did not the court dispense with such a useless performance as a review of the evidence on the motion for a new trial? Though this court has not, in many instances, if any at all, set aside verdicts in cases of homicide because of insufficiency of evidence, the decisions do not deny to it the power to do so in any case in which it ought to be done. In State v. Scott, 36 W. Va. 704, 15 S. E. 405, this court said: "It is quite true that the fatal blow struck by the prisoner with an unlawful weapon of deadly character was given in what might be termed a chance medley or affray, which occurred in an unpremeditated manner. If the prisoner had been able to prove that he himself was entirely blameless in the quarrel which thus fatally resulted, and that his assailant was bent upon inflicting great bodily harm, these circumstances ought to have reduced his offense to manslaughter. But the evidence of the state would seem to justify the jury in concluding that the prisoner started the quarrel by very boisterous and unseemly behavior, where the deceased and his companions, including two women, were engaged in drinking beer; that, when asked to desist, the prisoner retorted with foul and abusive epithets; and that he thus provoked the quarrel, and concluded it by throwing a two-pound iron weight with deadly aim at his antagonist, who could not have been distant from him more than 8 or 10 feet. Furthermore, he himself, in his testimony, states that before throwing it he 'steadied' himself; and further evidence of the state tends to show that he must have advanced two or three steps towards his adversary. The commencement of the quarrel by him, and the violence of his resentment out of proportion to the provocation, tended to prove that malignity of disposition which the law defines to be malice towards mankind." The principle here asserted is that a homicide on a gross provocation is manslaughter only; but the prisoner put himself beyond that rule by provoking the quarrel, inducing a provocation to himself and resenting it by means wholly disproportionate to the injury thus brought upon himself. This conduct shed light on the intent. In State v. Clark, 51 W. Va. 457, 41 S. E. 204, the court refused to set aside a verdict of murder, where the killing had resulted from a quarrel or controversy, but it was expressly held that the deceased had not done any act which the court could say, as matter of law, amounted to such provocation as would reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter. It was therefore a question for the jury. In other words, there was evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict.

In Rex v. Ayes, R. & R. 166, the 12 Judges of England, in the year 1810, on a question reserved by the trial court, expressly decided that the question of malice is not one solely for the jury. The syllabus of the case briefly states the decision and facts of the case as follows: "After mutual blows between the prisoner and the deceased, the prisoner knocked the deceased down, and, after he was upon the ground, stamped upon his stomach and belly with great force. Held, manslaughter only." The statement of the case shows that the prisoner had first pushed the deceased down on his back, after which the latter arose and struck the prisoner two or three times with his fist. Then the prisoner pushed him down again on his back, and, as he lay there on his back, gave him two or three stamps with great force with his right foot, and after he had gotten up kicked him in the face. The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder, and the judges, on a question reserved, ordered the verdict set aside. In Wharton on Homicide, at section 446, the following is stated as sound law: "In an English case, given by Lord Hale, A. and B. were walking together in Fleet street, and B. gave some provoking language to A., who thereupon gave B. a box on the ear, upon which they closed, and B. was thrown down and his arm broken. Presently B. ran to his brother's house, which was hard by; and C., his brother, taking the alarm, came out with his sword drawn and made towards A., who retreated 10 or 12 yards; and, C. pursuing him, A. drew his sword, made a pass at C., and killed him. A. being indicted for murder, the court directed the jury to find it manslaughter, not murder, because it was upon a sudden falling out, not se defendendo, partly because A. made the first breach of the peace by striking B., and partly because, unless he had fled as far as might be, it could not be said to be in his own defence; and it appeared plainly upon the evidence that he might have retreated out of danger, and that his stepping back was rather to have an opportunity to draw his sword, and with more advantage to come upon C. than to avoid him; and accordingly, at last, it was found manslaughter." Another illustration appears in Wharton on Homicide, in section 454, which reads as follows: "Upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased, who had been upon terms of intimacy for three or four years, had been drinking together at a public house till about 12 o'clock at night. About 1 they were together in the street, and had some words, and a scuffle ensued, during which the deceased struck the prisoner in the face with his fist, and gave him a black eye. The prisoner called for the police, and, on a policeman coming, went away; he, however, returned again, between 5 and 10 minutes afterwards, and stabbed the deceased with a knife on the left side of the abdomen. The knife, a common bread and cheese knife, was one that the prisoner was in the habit of carrying about with him, and he was rather weak in his intellect, but not so much as not to know right from wrong. Lord Tenterden, C. J.: 'It is not every slight provocation, even by a blow, which will, when the party receiving it strikes with a deadly weapon, reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter; but it depends upon the time elapsing between the blow and the injury; and also whether the injury was inflicted with an instrument at the moment in the possession of the party, or whether he went to fetch it from another place.' It is uncertain, in this case, how long the prisoner was absent—the witness says from 5 to 10 minutes, according to the best of his knowledge. Unless attention is particularly called to it, it seems to me that evidence of time is very uncertain. The prisoner may have been absent less than five minutes. There is no evidence that he went anywhere for the knife. The father says it was a knife he carried about with him. It was a common knife, such as a man in the prisoner's situation in life might have. For aught that appears he might have gone a little way from the deceased and then returned, still smarting under the blow he had received. You will also take into consideration the previous habits and connection of the deceased and the prisoner with respect to each other. If there had been any old grudge between them, then the crime which the prisoner committed might be murder. But it seems they had been long in habits of intimacy, and on the very night in question, about an hour before the blow, they had been drinking in a friendly way together. If you think there was not time and interval sufficient for the passion of a man, proved to be of no very strong intellect, to cool, and for reason to regain her dominion over his mind, then you will say the prisoner is guilty only of manslaughter. But if you do think the act was the act of a wicked, malicious, and diabolical mind (which, under the circumstances, I should think you hardly would), then you will find him guilty of murder."

It may be supposed that the uncertainty in the evidence as to whether the prisoner fired at the deceased, thinking him to be Charles Cook, who, just about that time, ran in the direction of the deceased, or fired knowing the party to be the deceased, constitutes an insuperable obstacle to the reversal of this judgment. If the accused fired at Cook in a transport of passion, and by mistake killed Turner, many cases, holding that the degree of the offense would be the same as it would have been had Cook been killed, are to be found among the reported decisions. "And so, in cases where the blow intended for one person by accident falls upon and kills another, the thing done follows the nature of the thing intended to be done, and the guilt or innocence of the slayer depends upon the same considerations that would have governed had the blow killed the person against whom it was directed. Hence the homicide is murder, or manslaughter, or excusable homicide, for precisely the same reasons that would have determined its character had the event conformed to the intent; and the principle is the same whether the misadventure proceeded from the misdirection of the blow or from a mistake in the identity of the victim." 21 Am. Eng. Ency. Law, 105, citing a number of decisions which fully sustain the text. See, also, 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 334; Plummer v. State, 4 Tex. App. 310, 30 Am. Rep. 165; Aaron v. State, 31 Ga. 167. If the accused knew he was shooting Turner, as is indicated by the testimony of the two witnesses whose testimony has been quoted, the conclusion must be the same, for he had reason to believe that Turner was a party to the conspiracy and was present for the purpose of aiding and abetting the assault made upon him. He knew the relations existing between Turner and the Cooks, and that the assault was the result of the transaction which had taken place between himself and Turner's little boy. The trouble had all grown out of that incident. Jennie Cook had become involved in it, and all the parties concerned were together at the time and the place of the assault. The trivial, insignificant affair had been developed by them, the Cooks and Turner, as their presence indicated, into a sort of family feud against the accused, and all were present for the purpose of visiting, or seeing visited, upon him, a very severe chastisement. Under these circumstances, the jury were bound to find that the accused was justified in regarding the provocation as having emanated from all of them, or to disregard the evidence and make an arbitrary finding. The prisoner knew himself to be the victim of a conspiracy. Turner had stood by and seen him assaulted by two men, on account of a matter which had its origin in the transaction between himself and the son of Turner. They were all related. He knew, too, that Turner had been displeased on account of that matter and had consorted with Jennie Cook concerning it. They had come together to him about it. A reasonable view, from the standpoint of the prisoner at the time, was that Turner was a party to the conspiracy, and the jury had no right to proceed upon a fanciful theory, having no basis in the evidence.

In view of these principles and conclusions, we think the evidence is not sufficient to sustain a conviction of murder in the second degree, nor of any offense greater than voluntary manslaughter, and that the circuit court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

BRANNON, P. (dissenting). I dissent because the court reverses only because the evidence is not, in its opinion, strong enough to support the verdict. It thus assumes the office of a jury—or rather takes from a jury its functions. I cannot conceive that this case presents in this point a question of law. It is purely a question of fact under evidence. Two witnesses say that the accused, when the Cooks had left him and were running away, looked at Turner standing 10 feet away and fired upon him, while standing with his hands in his pockets. One says the accused looked at Turner a minute and fired. The accused and his father deny this. They do not deny that Turner was 10 feet away; but the father says the accused fired as he was in the act of rising from the ground. Here is conflict. There is no conflict as to the exact position of Turner when shot. Nobody says he was beating the accused when shot. This is a critical point in the case. On it turns the degree of the crime, whether murder or voluntary manslaughter. Some evidence says that Turner joined in the battery on the accused; other evidence denies this. On much evidence the jury found, on these test questions of fact, that Turner was not a conspirator with the Cooks, was not a party to the battery, was not assailing Clifford when shot, but standing off silent. This court, on this conflict, finds that the evidence of the state, in these important matters, is unworthy of belief, virtually takes the evidence of the father, because, if the state's evidence is truthful, the jury could find as it did. There was as much evidence for the state in these vital matters as for the accused, if not more. In fact, in some of them the evidence of the prisoner's father alone controls. Once it was law that the court need not certify conflicting evidence for appeal, so final was regarded the verdict approved by a judge. Now, it is different; but, when such evidence gets into this court, the rule prevails that we cannot defeat a verdict, except we reject all evidence of the party against whom the jury decided conflicting with that of the adverse party, and give full faith and credit to the evidence of the latter, and, if the remaining evidence tends to or goes fairly to support the verdict, it must stand, unless it is clearly not sufficient. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 46 Am. Rep. 550; Kimmins v. Wilson, 8 W. Va. 584; State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 319, 10 S. E. 639, Syl., pt. 4. We treat it as we treat a demurrer to evidence. In State v. Sullivan, 55 W. Va. 597, 47 S. E. 267, we said, on what we thought was sound authority, that the evidence must be considered most favorably to the verdict. But in this instance evidence to support the verdict is discredited, and full faith given to the evidence to overthrow the verdict. Whilst this court possesses power to defeat a verdict, though the evidence is conflicting, still it should rarely do so, and only do so with extreme caution, and only where the verdict is plainly contrary to right and justice. Robertson v. Harmon, 47 W. Va. 500, 35 S. E. 832. This court cannot set aside the verdict, in conflict, "merely because it thinks there is a preponderance of evidence against it, or doubts its correctness, or would itself have found a different verdict." Morlen Case, 102 Va. 622, 46 S. E. 907. Indeed, where evidence conflicts, it may be seriously questioned, even at this date, as a matter of strict legal principle, whether an appellate court can grant a new trial; for it has been held that, "upon familiar principles, recognized and approved in numerous cases, when there is a conflict of evidence, an appellate court will never set aside a verdict where the court which tried the case and heard the witnesses concurs with the jury and has refused a new trial." Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Grat. (Va.) 186; note to Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. (Va.) 712; Michie v. Cochran, 93 Va. 641, 646, 25 S. E. 884; Seibright v. State, 2 W. Va. 596; State v. Thompson, 21 W. Va. 741, 756; Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 124, 29 Am. Rep. 452; Andrews Case, 100 Va. 801, 40 S. E. 935. In Grayson's Case, cited, it is held: "Where the evidence is contradictory, and the verdict is against the weight of evidence, a new trial may be granted by the court which presides at the trial; but its decision is not the subject of a writ of error or supersedeas, or examinable by an appellate court." In 14 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 780, it is laid down that the trial court can weigh conflicting evidence and grant a new trial, but an appellate court cannot. In strict principle I doubt whether a verdict should ever be set aside on evidence materially conflicting, but this court has sometimes done so, especially under the acts found in the Codes of 1891 and 1899 (chapter 131, § 9). See Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. 688. The opinion by Judge Dent, in Akers v. De Witt, 41 W. Va. 229, 23 S. E. 669, does not seem to give this statute force to change much the rule of treatment of evidence in the appellate court on a motion for a new trial. I do not think it revolutionizes and tears down established rules in this matter, as I said in the Johnson-Burns Case. But what is above said will at least show that rarely, only in extreme cases, will this court reverse a jury trial on conflicting evidence. But even where there is not involved a conflict of evidence, but the question is one of weight of evidence, this court has said in many cases that: "In Virginia and this state the courts have always guarded with jealous care the province of a jury. If the question depends on the weight of testimony or inferences and deductions from the facts proved, the jury, not the court, are exclusively and uncontrollably the judges. This conclusion is based upon the well-established rule that the jury are the sole judges of the evidence, the credibility of all admissible testimony, and the inferences from the facts and circumstances proved." State v. Cooper, 26 W. Va. 338; State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 335, 10 S.

E. 639. And this rule has been often said to apply with stronger force in this court than in a circuit court. Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. (Va.) 712; Sheff Case, 16 W. Va. 307. Why? Because the jury and judge saw the witnesses face to face and are much more competent to judge of their veracity and demeanor and weight of their evidence than are we. The opinion of Judge Faulkner, a judge of long experience and competency, is therefore better than that of any judge on this bench. So is that of the jury. For this reason we said, in Baker's Case, 33 W. Va. 336, 10 S. E. 639, upon authority then regarded by the court good: "Where a case depends on the tendency and weight of evidence, and the jury and judge who tried the case agree in the weight and influence to be given the evidence, it is an abuse of the appellate powers of this court to set aside a verdict because the judges of this court, from the evidence as it is written down, would not have concurred in the verdict." Gilmer Case, 42 W. Va. 52, 56, 57, 24 S. E. 566; Hill's Case, 2 Grat. (Va.) 594. Now, the corpus delicti is proven beyond question. It only remains to find whether the accused is excusable by way of self-defense, or, if not excusable, what is the degree of his crime? Who will question that this is peculiarly a question for the jury, dependent on the credit of witnesses and the weight of their evidence? State v. Welch, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. 419. It does appear to me that this court has taken up scales and not only passed on the credit of witnesses, but undertaken to weigh their evidence with nicety just as a jury would. A circuit court can do this, but an appellate court cannot weigh evidence. Norfolk v. Spencer (Va.) 52 S. E. 310 (Syl., pt. 8); 14 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 770.

I dissent because I cannot consent to defeat and frustrate the administration of criminal justice by overruling verdicts approved by circuit courts after full and fair trial, when there is much evidence to sustain the verdict, simply because this court thinks the jury and judge erred. My understanding is that, where different men may form different conclusions upon the weight of a mass of evidence, especially if credit of witnesses is involved and the evidence is conflicting, an appellate court should not annul the trial. I venture to repeat, touching the force of verdicts, language in State v. Bowyer, 43 W. Va. 180, 27 S. E. 301: "The witnesses were face to face before the judge and jury. The prisoner was before them. They saw him in the ordeal of examination. They scrutinized his countenance, his demeanor, his words, his tone. They were to judge of his veracity. They discredited his denial of guilt. They saw and heard all the witnesses, all the circumstances of the trial—often silent, but potential, evidence of the real truth. That judge and those jurors would average with us, had we been present, in capacity to judge of evidence; and, as we have nothing of the actual appearance of the trial, and only the evidence in cold type, they are vastly more competent than we to pass safe judgment upon the facts. We are not a jury. We have power—mere power—to discredit verdicts; but we must be cautious in so doing. Why have juries, if appellate judges are to go into the business of weighing evidence as if by the ounce and pound? We ought not to do this. It is an abuse of power, and a misconception of our functions and of the jury functions. The jury institution is sacred under our Constitution, and a verdict is to be highly respected. In long experience, I must say that, as a general thing, they evince good sense and do justice. From the frequency of requests to us to set aside verdicts, it seems to be thought that we can and will do so merely because we would not have found, judging from type, the same verdict; but such is not the rule, though instances deviating from these principles may be found, and I am very much averse to looseness in this matter on the part of appellate courts. And then, too, we must not forget that a learned and experienced judge approved the verdict, after witnessing the trial; and his opinion is entitled to great respect in an appellate court. State v. Hunter, 37 W. Va. 744, 17 S. E. 307. We must be careful lest we set ourselves up as judge and jury present at the trial, and usurp their functions." To same effect, State v. Morgan, 35 W. Va. 260, 277, 13 S. E. 385. It is not merely for this case that I write this dissent, but it is to express dissent against a growing tendency to depart from volumes of decisions and treat lightly verdicts approved by trial courts and overthrow them on insufficient grounds. A verdict of 12 men, as competent to judge evidence as we, had we been present at the trial, confirmed by a judge, is overthrown by four men on evidence held as insufficient. Insufficient to prove what? Not the homicide. This is admitted. But to prove that the evidence is not sufficient to prove murder in the second degree, but only voluntary manslaughter, a matter dependent on evidence on which a jury is peculiarly fitted to judge and entitled by law to judge.

BRUNER et al. v. MILLER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 13, 1906.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—EQUITY—JURISDICTION.

Rescission of contracts affecting any estate or interest in land on the ground of fraud in the procurement thereof, or mutual mistake of the parties in effecting the same, belongs to the exclusive jurisdiction of courts of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, §§ 1-7.]

2. SAME—INADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

Courts of law have jurisdiction and power to afford relief in such cases by judgment for money or property, under some circumstances, when a right to rescind exists and has been properly claimed; but the remedy at law is incomplete and inadequate, because of lack of power to affect a rescission by a direct adjudication thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, § 7.]

8. MINES AND MINERALS—OIL LEASE—SALE—RESCISSIION.

Owing to the peculiar nature of oil and gas, both the quantity and location of land covered by a lease thereof for oil and gas purposes are elements going to the substance and essence of a contract of sale of such lease, obligating the vendee to develop the property by drilling a well thereon and deliver to the vendor part of the product thereof, free of cost or expense; and a gross misrepresentation as to either, relied upon by the vendee under the belief that it is true, is ground for rescission of the contract.

4. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—DECREE.

On rescinding a contract, the court should, by its decree, put the parties in statu quo, by requiring each to restore to the other what he obtained by virtue of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, §§ 119-125.]

5. SAME—RECOVERY OF CONSIDERATION.

Money paid as rental to the landowner for delay in drilling a well under a lease held by assignment, in accordance with the terms of the lease, may be recovered back on rescission, when the contract of sale does not bind the vendee to drill, but extends to him the right to pay such rental in lieu of drilling.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, §§ 119-125.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tyler County.

Bill by A. Bruner and others against R. W. Miller. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. P. Jacobs, for appellant. Hall & Hall, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. R. W. Miller has appealed from a decree of the circuit court of Tyler county canceling a contract executed between him, as party of the first part, and A. Bruner and James McCoach, as parties of the second part, whereby Miller assigned and made over to said Bruner and McCoach a lease of certain lands of Nelson Myers for oil and gas purposes; Bruner and McCoach binding themselves, in the contract of assignment, to develop the property in accordance with the terms of the lease. The considerations paid by them to Miller were $600 in cash and an agreement that he should have a one-fourth interest in the first oil well drilled on the property, free of any cost or expense to him. The bill sought rescission of the contract and repayment of said sum of $600, together with an additional $215, paid by Bruner and McCoach as rental for delay in drilling, on the ground of fraudulent representations on the part of Miller as to the location and quantity of the property on which the lease was. It does not appear that any of the parties were very familiar with the land. Miller resided in the city of Wheeling and Bruner and McCoach in the city of Sistersville, Tyler county; while the land was situated in the Wetzel county. For a number of years James Lane, of Wheeling, had held part of the Myers land under lease, and, he having died, Miller became executor of his will. As such executor, he and the devisees or heirs of Lane allowed it to lapse, believing it not to be of any value. In view of development in the neighborhood of the land, Miller obtained a lease of it himself, with a view to disposing of it to one Jennings. He first went to Myers and obtained a sort of option for which he paid $600. Bruner and McCoach, having been informed of this, made to him the proposition, with reference to the lease, afterwards embodied in the contract or deed in question here. The lease from Myers to Miller is indefinite and uncertain as to the description and quantity of the land; no quantity being stated, except in that part which relates to the boundaries, reading as follows: "On the north by the lands of W. M. Wyatt; on the east by the lands of James Ice; on the south by the lands of John Mills; on the west by the lands of N. Myers, containing (215) two hundred and fifteen acres, more or less." In discussing the merits of the property in the negotiations for the assignment of the lease, the parties had before them certain plats of the lands mentioned in the lease and adjoining lands; and, on reading the lease in connection with these plats, the description and the plats did not correspond in respect to the names of the owners of adjacent lands. The plat was prepared upon information afforded by the lease and knowledge of the parties, and especially information communicated by Miller. This plat showed a tract of 215 acres designated as "Nelson Myers No. 1." Then the deed of assignment was prepared describing the land as follows: "Containing 215 acres, more or less, and bounded and described as follows: On the north by the lands of William M. Wyatt; on the east by the lands of James Ice; on the south by the lands of John Mills; on the west by the lands of N. Myers and others; a plat of which said leasehold and surrounding territory is hereto attached marked in red ink 'R. W. M.' and the leasehold above described or intended so to be, and the leasehold that is sold by this indenture is marked on said plat in red ink 'Nelson Myers No. 1.'" The plat was annexed to the deed of assignment. These deeds bore date, respectively, on the 13th and 14th days of February, 1900. The lease required the commencement of drilling within 40 days from its execution, or, in lieu thereof, payment thereafter to Myers of the sum of $215. It further required the completion of a well on the premises within six months from the date of the contract, or payment of a rental of $1 per acre. These obligations Bruner and McCoach assumed in the deed of assignment. In view of the bad condition of the weather and roads, they failed to commence drilling within 40 days, and paid said sum of $215. On examining the property, some time in April, 1900, they found that all of the property described in the plat annexed to the deed, except 25 or 30 acres, was covered by a lease held by the South Penn Oil Company, under which said company was then operating. The clause in the lease saying the land was bounded "on the west by the lands of N. Myers and others, containing (215) two hundred and fifteen acres, more or less," plainly appears now not to have been a statement of the quantity of the land in the lease given to Miller, but the quantity of land belonging to Myers included in the South Penn Oil Company's lease, adjoining and bounding the Miller lease on the west. Upon a proper construction of that lease, in view of the facts then existing, some of which were not known to the parties, the lease from Myers to Miller stated no quantity. It described the lands by boundary only. Under a misapprehension in this respect, the deed of assignment was made to call for a specific quantity, 215 acres, and to cover land not included in the lease. Under it Miller no doubt held a considerable quantity of land, possibly as much as 215 acres, and his right in it passed by the deed of assignment, but it was not the same land, a leasehold in which his deed of assignment purported to pass, nor is it located where said deed of assignment represents it to be.

In a contract of this kind both quantity and location are material. It imposed upon Bruner and McCoach the duty of drilling a well for oil, at an expense of $8,000 or $10,000, partly for the benefit of Miller. Such a well is valuable, not only for its actual product, but as a revelation or disclosure of the mineral value of the territory on which the well is. If the territory be of no greater extent than to justify the drilling of a single well, the obligation to pay over one-fourth of its product would be equivalent to one-fourth of the value of the territory; but if the territory is sufficient to require, or justify, the drilling of 10 wells, one-fourth of the product of the first one would be of slight relative value. The testimony shows that some tests had been made in the community in which the land lies, some of which had disclosed the presence of oil, while others had not. These tests indicated the value, for oil purposes, of the land lying near the wells. A lease on property near a producing well is valuable, while one on property lying in close proximity to a "dry hole" is considered worthless. Hence, in contracts of this kind, the location is peculiarly material.

A misrepresentation concerning the subject-matter of a contract, and especially a contract relating to land, though innocently made, as a result of lack of knowledge, amounts in law to fraud, not actual, but constructive legal fraud, and gives as complete a right of rescission as if it were actual fraud, subject, however, to the limitation or qualification that the representation must relate to some matter or thing which is of the very essence or substance of the contract. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Newman v. Kay (W. Va.) 49 S. E. 926, 68 L. R. A. 908. Ordinarily a deficiency or an excess in the quantity of land sold or leased is not deemed to be a matter of substance. Newman v. Kay, cited; Tucker v. Cocke (Va.) 2 Rand. 51. But a misrepresentation and mutual mistake or a fraud on the one side, accompanied by ignorance on the other, resulting in a sale of property having a different location from that which the purchaser supposed it to have, will always afford ground of relief in equity. The identity of the property or thing sold is always a matter of substance. If, as to it, there is a mistake or one of the parties has been misled by the fraud of the other, the purchaser is not deemed to have gotten the thing he bought. Fearon Lumber Co. v. Wilson, 51 W. Va. 30, 41 S. E. 137; Chamberlaine v. Marsh, 6 Munf. 284; Graham v. Hendren (Va.) 5 Munf. 185; Glassell v. Thomas (Va.) 3 Leigh, 113. Under these principles, if Miller be absolved from the charge of fraud and the case regarded as one of mutual mistake, the right to relief is equally as clear as if there had been a fraudulent representation. The bill sets out the facts, showing the erroneous belief of the plaintiffs as to the location of the land, and prays a cancellation thereof. It shows that the purchasers did not get what they supposed they were buying. Hence, according to its allegations, there was either a mutual mistake or a fraud on the part of the defendant, actual or constructive, and the allegations of the bill are fully sustained by the evidence. The evidence shows that immediately upon a discovery of the misrepresentation or mistake and failure of title the appellees made a demand upon Miller to take back the lease and refund the money paid by them to him as purchase money for the lease and to Myers as rental. Miller was willing to repay the $600 and relieve them from their contract, but unwilling to pay said sum of $215. It is not pretended that he would have been materially injured or prejudiced, aside from the loss of the benefit of his contract, had he accepted a reassignment of the lease and paid back the money. The lease was still alive and no considerable period of time had elapsed. The offer to rescind was made not later than May 3, 1900, and this suit was commenced on the 18th day of July, 1900. The refusal to pay the rental was based upon the theory that its payment to Myers was occasioned by the fault of the appellees themselves; they having agreed to comply with the terms of the lease, one of which was to pay said rental if the drilling of the well should not be commenced within 40 days from the date of the lease. But there was no covenant requiring them to commence the well within 40 days and thus avoid the payment of rental. They were allowed in the deed of assignment the full option in respect to this matter accorded by the lease. They agreed to drill the well, but the covenant contained the following provision: "Such drilling to be done at such time or times as is most convenient to said parties of the second part, but any and all rentals accruing upon said leasehold under and by virtue of the terms of said lease shall be paid for and borne by said parties of the second part in proportion as above stated." Money paid as rental in consequence of delay in drilling was money paid out and expended under the contract and in reference to the property. It was contemplated and provided for by the deed of assignment. It was paid before the appellees had knowledge of the fraud or mistake, and was, therefore, an expenditure resulting directly from a misrepresentation of the appellant. The payment inured to the benefit of Miller, for, had they not paid it, he would have been bound to do so. Had they spent $1,000 in drilling, instead of paying the rent, before discovery of the fraud, would they not have been entitled to be placed in statu quo? Rescission goes to the whole transaction and places the parties in their former positions, when that can be done. We think it clear that the appellees were entitled to have refunded to them upon rescission all they had paid out under the contract. Whatever loss the appellant may have sustained, therefore, by reason of the failure to develop the property, was occasioned by his own refusal to rescind the contract upon the demand of the appellees and their offer to restore the lease to him. He might then have protected himself fully by developing the property or selling the lease to some other person. A subsequent sale of it would no doubt have been less advantageous to him than the one he had made to the appellees, but that was a misfortune of his own, for which they were in no way to blame. It was his lease. He had acquired it, and from the consequences of his own negligence or oversight in procuring it he could not relieve himself by laying them upon the shoulders of other persons. Having refused to rescind when the appellees demanded it of him in the exercise of their clear right to do so, it does not lie in his mouth now to say they have injured him either by refusing to develop the property or preventing him from doing so. They held on to the lease because he refused to take it back and pay them the money to which they were entitled. He contested their right to rescind at his peril, and they were under no obligation to prevent or minimize damages resulting from his act, and which it was his own duty, and in his power, to prevent. Appellees were not in possession of the leasehold. They had expressly notified him of their intention not to drill or otherwise develop it. He could have entered upon and developed it, and at the same time prosecuted an action for the vindication of any rights he had under the contract.

Want of jurisdiction in equity is, however, the proposition mainly relied upon as ground for reversal, and the argument made to sustain it is that an action at law for recovery of the money paid is an adequate remedy. In this connection many authorities are cited, including Gall v. Bank, 50 W. Va. 597, 40 S. E. 390, and Amick v. Ellis, 53 W. Va. 421, 44 S. E. 257. The concrete cases disposed of by these two decisions are not in any respect similar to the one presented in this record. The former was a suit in equity to enjoin an action at law for the recovery of money on a common-law bond, and to cancel the bond, on the ground that it had been satisfied, in a compromise, by payment of a smaller sum than was called for by it. Assuming that there is concurrent jurisdiction in courts of law and courts of equity for the relief of the obligor under such circumstances, the decision is right and in perfect accord with the authorities everywhere, because when there is concurrent jurisdiction, and the law court has acquired jurisdiction of the matter, equity will not ordinarily interfere, although it would have readily taken cognizance, had its aid been first invoked. That is the ground of the decision of that case. The syllabus says, where an action is pending on the law side of the circuit court, equity will not take jurisdiction. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 617; Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, 20 L. Ed. 501; Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 373, 21 L. Ed. 174. The concurrent jurisdiction of equity is very broad. In many instances it gives exactly the same relief that may be had in a court of law—a mere decree for money corresponding to a judgment at law for money. But there is some equitable ground in addition to the right to recover money. Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 171-189, inclusive. In most instances of this kind of jurisdiction the right to go into equity is lost by allowing the law court to assume jurisdiction first. Id. § 179. The case, therefore, is no authority for the proposition that equity will never take jurisdiction where there is a remedy at law. It does not deny the doctrine of concurrent jurisdiction. The legal remedy was entirely adequate, for a judgment in favor of the defendant would have been absolutely conclusive. It could have been pleaded as an adjudication against any right to recover on the bond in any subsequent action. In the other case (Amick v. Ellis) the object was specific performance of an alleged contract, if that could be had, and, if not, then a rescission of the contract and recovery of money paid under it. What was relied upon as the contract was not a contract. It was an absolutely void paper, presenting no contract either to be enforced or rescinded. There was no element of contract in it. Of course, there was no jurisdiction to undo a thing that had never been done. The only right the plaintiff had, if any, was a right of recovery of money from the defendant, a right purely legal and absolutely devoid of any semblance of equitable right. The inapplicability of the other authorities cited is equally clear. Most of them were cases in which mere cancellation of void or voidable obligations was sought. Cancellation is not always the equivalent of rescission. An obligation for the payment of money differs from a contract or covenant to do some collateral thing. A note or bond simply binds one of the parties to pay money to the other. If it is voidable or void for any reason, the mode of getting rid of it is mere cancellation. There is no condition precedent to be performed. A fraudulent or void deed, passing no title, may be canceled and thereby destroyed. Nothing is to be done by the party attacking it as a condition precedent to the relief asked. If a suit at law has been brought on a note or bond that is voidable, because fraudulently procured, there is no reason why equity should intervene. The result of that action will settle forever the question of liability. It is already in suit, wherefore there is no probability that it will be negotiated or used in any other way to harass or annoy. Equity, by cancelling it, could do no more than put an end to the question of liability on it. That a court of law does by its judgment. In cases of deeds and other muniments of title affecting the status of property cancellation is the only adequate remedy, for no court of law can adjudge and order that deed be canceled or set aside. It can only give a judgment for money or for property. In these cases nothing is needed but cancellation.

This case belongs to neither of the two classes above mentioned. The contract involved is not an obligation to pay money, and the appellees did not merely ask, by their bill, to be relieved from a voidable paper obliging them to pay money. They seek a recovery of money against the very letter of the contract, and they ask that the contract be rescinded in order that they may have back the money which they have paid under it. They might have a recovery of that money in an action at law on allegations of fraud and deceit, but that would be only an action for damages for a wrong. They might also recover it as money had and received by the appellant to their use; but that would not obtain an adjudication of the rescission of the contract. A rescission can no more be adjudged in a court of law than a cancellation. Such adjudications are wholly foreign to the law courts and are peculiarly and exclusively equitable in their nature. Rescission may be enforced in a court of law, or, rather, there may be a recovery of money or property in a court of law as the result of a rescission made by the parties. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 643. In such case the plaintiff, before suit, tenders back to the defendant the money or property which he has received under the contract, and then sues for what he has parted with, and his recovery is one of money or property, as the case may be. The rescission is not by the adjudication of the court, but by the act of the party himself. He is not bound, however, to pursue this course, and it is not often done in the case of written contracts. He is entitled to an adjudication, a judicial determination, of the fact of rescission. That he can get only in a court of equity. "A court of equity entertains a suit for the express purpose of procuring a contract or conveyance to be canceled, and renders a decree conferring in terms that exact relief. A court of law entertains an action for the recovery of the possession of chattels, or, under some circumstances, for the recovery of land, or for the recovery of damages, and although nothing is said concerning it, either in the pleadings or in the judgment, a contract or a conveyance, as the case may be, is virtually rescinded. The recovery is based upon the fact of such rescission, and could not have been granted unless the rescission had taken place. Here the remedy of cancellation is not expressly asked for, nor granted by the court of law, but all its effects are indirectly obtained in the legal action. It is true the equitable remedy is much broader in its scope and more complete in its relief, for its effects are not confined to the particular action, but by removing the obnoxious instrument they extend to all future claims and actions based upon it." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 110. Such cases belong to the exclusive jurisdiction of equity. Id. §§ 171-188; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, pp. 613-618, inclusive. From the peculiar nature of the jurisdiction for the purpose of rescission, this court has always recognized the right of a party who is the victim of a fraud or mistake to come into equity for relief, notwithstanding the existence of concurrent jurisdiction in the law courts. See Kelly v. Riley, 22 W. Va. 247; Atkinson v. Beckett, 34 W. Va. 584, 12 S. E. 717; Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. 461; Nichols v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 347; Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 632; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Boggs' Ex'r v. Harper's Adm'r, 45 W. Va. 554, 31 S. E. 943; Newberger v. Wells, 51 W. Va. 624, 42 S. E. 625; Newman v. Kay (W. Va.) 49 S. E. 926, 68 L. R. A. 908. Jurisdiction in equity was asserted in Fearon Lumber Co. v. Wilson, 51 W. Va. 30, 41 S. E. 137, a case almost the exact parallel of this case. A purchaser of real estate was permitted, by way of rescission, to recover back in equity the purchase money paid for the land. The principles upon which the foregoing decisions of this court rest are almost universally recognized by the authorities. Taymon v. Mitchell, 1 Md. Ch. 496; Higgins v. Crouse, 63 Hun (N. Y.) 134, 17 N. Y. Supp. 696; Bruner v. Meigs, 64 N. Y. 506; Crump v. Ingersoll, 44 Minn. 84, 46 N. W. 141; Crump v. Ingersoll, 47 Minn. 179, 49 N. W. 739; Bosley v. National Machine Co., 123 N. Y. 550, 25 N. E. 990; Cocke v. Hardin, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 374; Mayne v. Griswold, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 463; Relf v. Eberly, 23 Iowa, 467; Hosleton v. Dickinson, 51 Iowa, 244, 1 N. W. 550; Davis v. Peabody, 170 Mass. 397, 49 N. E. 750; Caldwell v. Caldwell, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 53.

The decree of the circuit court, however, has departed from the case made by the bill and the evidence in canceling the deed of assignment. By that deed the appellant passed to the appellees title to the lease. As a condition of receiving back their money, they should have conveyed the lease back to him. As hereinbefore shown, the case is not one of mere cancellation. There was something to be done on both sides. The lease was to be restored to Miller and the money to Bruner and McCoach. The decree requires Miller to pay back the money without requiring Bruner and McCoach to restore the lease. It may be of no value by reason of its having expired, but neither its validity nor its status appears from this record. This court cannot say whether it is still alive, nor was the court below in a position to do that. But as no objection to the decree is made on this ground, and this court cannot see that the appellant has been prejudiced in this respect, it cannot be reversed on a mere presumption of error. The presumption is the other way.

For the foregoing reasons, the decree appealed from will be affirmed, with costs and damages to appellees according to law.

LOVERIN & BROWNE CO. v. BUMGARNER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 13, 1906.)

1. GUARANTY — CONSTRUCTION — ACTION AGAINST GUARANTOR.

The following written guaranty made by J. H. B. to L. & B. Co. for the benefit of his infant son H. B., viz.: "For the purpose of enabling H. Bumgarner to purchase goods upon credit from Loverin & Browne Co., of Chicago, I hereby guarantee that said H. Bumgarner shall promptly pay them for all goods which they may hereafter sell to him upon credit until this guarantee is revoked. Said payment to be made within ten (10) days after receiving goods. My liability hereunder shall cover any balance to become due not exceeding five hundred dollars. Goods ordered under this guarantee may be returned within 10 days after receiving same at invoice price if goods are returned in good order properly packed. Dated Elizabeth, W. Va., July 11th, 1903. J. H. Bumgarner. [Seal.]" Held to be a guaranty of payment absolute and unconditional, upon which a suit may be commenced against the guarantor without any previous suit against the principal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Guaranty, § 89.]

2. SAME—TIME OF PAYMENT—BREACH.

When the terms of a guaranty of payment fix the time within which the payment shall be made, if the payment is not made within the time prescribed, there is a breach of the guaranty, and no steps need be taken against the principal, nor need his insolvency be shown in order to charge the guarantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Guaranty, §§ 87-89.]

3. EVIDENCE—LETTERS—GENUINENESS.

The genuineness of a letter is sufficiently established to permit its introduction in evidence, when it is shown that it was received in due course of mail in response to a letter sent to the supposed writer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 1649.]

4. SAME—BEST AND SECONDARY.

And, upon notice having been given to such writer to produce the original of the letter to which his was a reply and his failure to produce such original, a letter-press copy thereof is admissible in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 596.]

5. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR.

The admission of incompetent evidence over objection will not reverse a judgment, when it is clear that such error could have worked no prejudice to the exceptor.

6. PLEADING—EXECUTION OF INSTRUMENT—DENIAL—AFFIDAVIT.

Syllabus point 4, Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528, and syllabus point 1, Maxwell v. Burbridge, 28 S. E. 702, 44 W. Va. 248, approved.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Wirt County.

Action by the Loverin & Browne Company against J. H. Bumgarner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

T. A. Brown and D. C. Casto, Jr., for plaintiff in error. F. T. Lockhart and W. N. Miller, for defendant in error.

McWHORTER, P. This is an action of assumpsit, brought by the Loverin & Browne Company, a corporation, against J. H. Bumgarner in the circuit court of Wirt county upon two guaranties in writing, the first in the following words: "For the purpose of enabling H. Bumgarner to purchase goods upon credit from Loverin & Browne Co., of Chicago, I hereby guarantee that said H. Bumgarner shall promptly pay them for all goods which they may hereafter sell to him upon credit until this guarantee is revoked. Said payment to be made within ten (10) days after receiving goods. My liability hereunder shall cover any balance to become due not exceeding five hundred dollars. Goods ordered under this guarantee may be returned within 10 days after receiving same at invoice price if goods are returned in good order properly packed. Dated Elizabeth, W. Va., July 11th, 1903. [Signed] J. H. Bumgarner. [Seal.]" The second, without date, but made in August, as appears from the record, is an addition to the former, and is as follows: "For the purpose of enabling Harry Bumgarner to purchase goods upon credit from Loverin & Browne Co., of Chicago, we or I hereby guarantee that said Harry Bumgarner shall promptly pay them for all goods which they may hereafter sell to him upon credit until this guarantee is revoked. Said payment to be made within 10 days after receiving goods. We or my liability hereinafter shall cover any balance to become due not exceeding one thousand dollars. Goods ordered under this guarantee may be returned within 10 days after receiving same at invoice prices if freight charges are paid and goods returned in good order properly packed. [Signed] J. H. Bumgarner. [Seal.]”

Plaintiff filed with its declaration a bill of particulars showing that it had sold in all under said guaranties to Harry Bumgarner goods to the amount of $2,001.97, and had been paid by said Bumgarner $1,312.46, leaving a balance due, as claimed, of $681.51, which bill of particulars was duly sworn to and the defendant notified that the plaintiff would rely upon the said stated account as its bill of particulars upon the trial of the action. The defendant filed his counter affidavit that he believed there was no sum due from him to the plaintiff upon said demands stated in plaintiff's declaration, and entered his plea of non assumpsit. The defendant also tendered his special plea that the plaintiff ought not to have or maintain his said action against him, because he says that the contract which the plaintiff was seeking to enforce against him was one in which the defendant was a guarantor for Harry Bumgarner, who was the alleged principal; that said Harry Bumgarner was the principal in said contracts, and that defendant was only guarantor for said principal; that at the time of the making of said contracts and promises and undertakings the said Harry Bumgarner was an infant under the age of 21 years; and for further plea defendant says, as to the several bills and articles of goods, wares, and merchandise mentioned in plaintiff's declaration alleged to have been sold and delivered to said Harry Bumgarner, he, the said Harry Bumgarner, was an infant, and that said goods, wares, and merchandise were not necessities for the said infant. Plaintiff took issue upon said plea, and at the October term, 1904, of said court plaintiff by leave of court withdrew its reply to the special plea filed, and moved the court to strike out said special plea, which motion was sustained, and the said special plea stricken out, to which ruling the defendant objected and excepted. The defendant then tendered a second special plea, which was filed over the objections of the plaintiff, to which ruling plaintiff excepted. Said special plea was to the effect that the contract upon which the plaintiff's action was based was a contract of guaranty that Harry Bumgarner, the principal, should be first required to pay the same, and that plaintiff should have exhausted its remedy against him before looking to the guarantor; that plaintiff had been negligent in not pursuing its remedy against Harry Bumgarner, and that Harry Bumgarner was solvent at the time of making the said accounts, and at the time of the institution of the action against defendant; and that, if

Harry Bumgarner was insolvent, he had become so since default made in the payment of the said claim—to which plea plaintiff replied generally. On the 8th of February, 1905, a jury was sworn in the case, and, not being able to agree upon a verdict, were discharged. On the 10th of May, 1905, another jury was impaneled and sworn, and, after hearing all the evidence and the arguments of counsel and the instructions of the court, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at $630.90. The defendant then moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion was overruled by the court, and judgment entered upon said verdict. In the progress of the trial the defendant took several bills of exceptions, which were signed, sealed, and saved to the defendant. The case was brought to this court upon writ of error and supersedeas.

The first cause of error assigned is in overruling the motion of defendant to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant him a new trial. This assignment will be disposed of in connection with other assignments hereinafter treated relative to the admission of testimony objected to by the defendant. The second assignment is that the court erred in giving to the jury instructions Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6, asked for by the plaintiff and set out in bill of exceptions No. 5; and the third assignment, in refusing to give to the jury defendant's instruction No. 2, as set out in bill of exceptions No. 6. These instructions involve the character and effect of the two written guaranties made by the defendant, J. H. Bumgarner, and filed with the plaintiff's declaration.

The plaintiff's instructions as set out in bill of exceptions No. 5 are to the effect that if the jury should believe from the evidence that the defendant signed and executed to the plaintiff the guaranty contracts sued upon and shown in evidence, and that upon the faith of such guaranties Harry Bumgarner or H. Bumgarner obtained the goods sued for from plaintiff and did not pay for some of the same within 10 days thereafter, as provided for in said contracts, then the defendant became at once liable to pay for the said goods up to the limit of his guaranty contracts, and plaintiff was not bound to first pursue the principal before instituting this suit on said guaranty contracts, and should find for the plaintiff the value of all such goods as they should find from the evidence had not been paid for by the principal within such limits. These instructions are given on the theory that the guaranties sued upon are unconditional guaranties for the payment of the money for Harry Bumgarner within 10 days after the delivery of the goods to said Harry Bumgarner on the default or failure of the principal to pay the same. Harry Bumgarner was the infant son of the defendant, J. H. Bumgarner, who was anxious to start him in business, and for that purpose made the guaranties sued upon in this case. The goods furnished to Harry Bumgarner under these guaranties were not shipped to any place of business of the said Harry Bumgarner, but were sold by him to his customers, and put up in packages to fill the orders received by plaintiff from Harry Bumgarner, and the goods shipped in packages convenient to be delivered, and consigned to the plaintiff itself at such places as would be most convenient for the delivery by the said Harry Bumgarner, and the bills of lading were sent indorsed over by the plaintiff to Harry Bumgarner, and in a few instances indorsed by plaintiff over to defendant, to be by him indorsed over to Harry Bumgarner to enable him to get the goods. The circumstances of this case clearly indicate that the defendant intended by his guaranty to be primarily liable for the goods so delivered to his son, who was a mere boy, not competent under the law to contract or do business for himself, and it was evidently contemplated that the 10 days after the receipt of the goods were given as time for Harry Bumgarner to deliver the goods and collect the money and make immediate payment thereof to the plaintiff, less the profits to the said Harry Bumgarner. It is not reasonable to suppose that plaintiff would have knowingly entered into a business arrangement with an infant and furnished him goods to sell and collect the proceeds, and it take all the risk of being defeated in the collection of the price of the goods on his plea of infancy. The proposition is too unbusinesslike to be entertained for a moment, and defendant, knowing this, fully intended that his guaranty should be absolute and unconditional, and his correspondence with the plaintiff, at least such of it as was properly admitted as evidence at the trial, clearly shows his intention in the premises to that effect. It is shown that he furnished money to his son, Harry Bumgarner, on at least one occasion a check for $400 to pay on his indebtedness to plaintiff, of which Harry paid to plaintiff only $300. In Arents v. Commonwealth, 18 Grat. (Va.) 750, it is held that although, in general, the contract of a guarantor is to pay if, after due diligence, the debt cannot be made out of the principal, yet the intention of the parties must govern, and if it was the guarantor's intention to make himself liable on the default of the principal debtor, without the use of the ordinary means to compel payment by him or proof of his insolvency, he will be held accordingly. That his contract in such a case is a guaranty of payment or of punctual payment by the principal debtor, and not merely a guaranty of solvency or of ultimate payment after the usual means of enforcing it are employed. In the case in 18 Grat. 750, cited above, Joynes, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, at page 770, after discussing the differences between the contract of a guarantor and that of a surety, says: "But while this distinction exists, in general, between the contract of a surety and the contract of a guarantor, we must in every case look to the terms of the guaranty and to the circumstances under which it was made to ascertain by the rules of construction the character and extent of the undertaking. If it thus appears to have been the intention of the guarantor to make himself liable on the default of the principal debtor without the use of the ordinary means to compel payment by him, or proof of his insolvency, he will be held liable accordingly. This contract in such a case is a guaranty of payment, or of punctual payment, by the principal debtor, and not merely a guaranty of solvency, or of ultimate payment after the usual means of enforcing it are employed." See, also, Douglass v. Reynolds, 32 U. S. (7 Pet.) 113, at page 126 [8 L. Ed. 626]. In City of Memphis v. Brown, 20 Wall. 239 [22 L. Ed. 264], the contracts there under consideration contained a provision as follows: "The city of Memphis will and does hereby guaranty to the contractor the payment of said accounts as so assessed against the property owner, or owners for the payment according to the plans and specifications." The opinion of the court, at page 311 of 20 Wall. [22 L. Ed. 264], referring to this provision, says: "It will be perceived that this is a guaranty of payment and not of collection merely, and upon which upon general principles of law a suit may be commenced against the guarantor without any previous suit against the principal"—citing Railroad Company v. Howard, 7 Wall. 407 [19 L. Ed. 117]; Zabriskie v. Railroad Company, 23 How. 381 [16 L. Ed. 488]; Leggett v. Raymond, 6 Hill [N. Y.] 641. In Campbell v. Baker, 46 Pa. 243, it is held: "A guaranty of the payment of a note 'when due' is broken by nonpayment at maturity; and the guarantor is then liable upon his contract to the creditor, who is not bound either to pursue the principal or show his insolvency." And so in Roberts v. Riddle, 79 Pa. 468: "A guaranty of the payment of a written obligation 'according to its terms' is broken by nonpayment when the time for payment arrives, and the guarantor is liable without pursuing the debtor to insolvency."

The defendant, to maintain his proposition that the guaranties sued upon were the ordinary collateral and secondary guaranties of payment only after plaintiff's remedy against the principal should be exhausted, relies upon the case of Building & Loan Association v. Engle, 45 W. Va. 588, 31 S. E. 921, and Kearnes v. Montgomery, 4 W. Va. 29. In the Engle case the guaranty was upon a loan of $800 from the loan association to Frank Engle, to secure which Engle had executed a mortgage on certain property, and had given bond, and the guaranty was: "The payment of said sum of $800 by the said Engle to the said company on the terms and in the manner set out in said bond and mortgage." The bond and mortgage were according to the forms and terms peculiar to building and loan association contracts, and the guaranty could only mean that in case the mortgaged property failed to pay the debt, in case it had to be resorted to, and, further, that the bond of Engle should prove insufficient to supplement it by the payment of any balance remaining unpaid after exhausting the mortgaged property, the guarantors would then be liable; their guaranty not being for the payment of money absolutely at or within a specified time, but "on the terms and in the manner set out in said bond and mortgage," so that it was clearly the intention of the parties that they should not only exhaust the mortgage, but pursue the bond, when the guarantors would be liable for any deficiency after the mortgage and bond were proven insufficient. In case of Kearnes v. Montgomery, as stated by the court, at page 40: "Whether the defendant is guarantor or maker depends on the understanding of the parties. * * * If a stranger indorse his name in blank on the back of paper not negotiable, he is prima facie guarantor; but this presumption may be rebutted by showing the original understanding of the parties, by showing an express agreement otherwise, or by showing circumstances from which one may be inferred." Brandt on Suretyship, p. 256, § 116, says: "When the terms of a guaranty of payment fix the time within which the payment shall be made, if the payment is not made within the time prescribed, there is a breach of the guaranty, and no steps need be taken against the principal, nor need his insolvency be shown in order to charge the guarantor." See cases there cited. In Tobacco Company v. Held [D. C.] 62 Fed. 962, the court quotes with approval from Rand. Com. Paper, § 850, where it is said: "A guaranty may be absolute or conditional. One who guarantees payment becomes absolutely liable on any default of payment by his principal." In Moore v. Holt, 10 Grat. [Va.] 284, it is said, at page 294: "But as a guaranty is regarded as a mercantile instrument, it is not to be interpreted by any strict technical rules of construction, but by what may be fairly presumed to have been the intention and understanding of the parties"—citing Douglas v. Reynolds, 7 Pet. 113 [8 L. Ed. 626]; Bell v. Bruen, 1 How. 169 [11 L. Ed. 89]; Lee v. Dick, 10 Pet. 482 [9 L. Ed. 508]. Stearns, Suretyship, § 61: "If the liability of the promisor is fixed by the mere default of the principal, it is an absolute guaranty; but, if the promisor's liability depends upon any other event than the nonperformance of the principal, it is a conditional guaranty. * * * It is not necessary to first pursue and exhaust the principal before proceeding against the guarantor in cases where the guaranty is absolute." See, also, 25 Cent. Dig. col. 191, § 89. It seems unnecessary to cite further authorities upon this proposition. That the defendant's guaranties in this case are absolute and unconditional, from the circumstances of the case and the authorities, is unquestionable. This being so, the instructions asked by the plaintiff and given by the court were properly given; and, because this is so, and the instruction asked for by the defendant and refused by the court being based upon the opposite theory that the guaranties were conditional and required the principal to be pursued to insolvency, the same was properly refused.

Bills of exceptions Nos. 1, 2, and 3 go to the rulings of the court in admitting certain testimony over the objection of the defendant. The first objection is an objection to the reading of the deposition of Arthur Coon taken in Chicago on the 5th day of April, 1905, first, because of the insufficiency of the notice and the service thereof. The notice seems to be very full as to when and where the same should be taken and ample time given. The notice was served by a deputy sheriff of Wirt county by delivering a copy of the same "into the hands of J. H. Bumgarner in Wirt county, W. Va., March 20, 1905." It is further objected to because it is not properly certified. The objector points out no deficiency in the certification, and it appears to be sufficient. A third general objection is "because the notice shows that the deposition taken under it shows that the same were to be read on behalf of the witness, and not on behalf of the plaintiff." It is only necessary in reply to this objection to say that the notice shows no such thing, but says the depositions to be taken are "to be read in evidence in my behalf in the trial of a certain action at law now pending in the circuit court of Wirt county, state of West Virginia, in which action the undersigned is plaintiff and you are defendant." This notice was addressed to J. H. Bumgarner, and signed by Loverin & Browne Company, plaintiff, by counsel. Upon the introduction and reading of the depositions of Arthur Coon at the trial we have a labyrinth of objections and exceptions, being almost without number. The plaintiff undertook to prove by the witness Arthur Coon the written correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendant, as well as that between the plaintiff and Harry Bumgarner, concerning the shipment and delivery of goods and the receipt of orders for same, and inclosing bills of lading, which were always made to plaintiff, consignee, and either indorsed over to Harry Bumgarner to enable him to receive the goods shipped, or indorsed over to defendant, to be by him indorsed over to Harry Bumgarner. Some of these exceptions are well taken, because they fail to show with particularity the inclosing of letters in envelopes and stamping them, and placing the same in the postoffice, but content themselves with such proof as the following as a sample. The witness testified that "on the 31st day of August, 1903, Loverin & Browne Company sent a letter to Harry Bumgarner, inclosing a statement of his account, showing a balance due to Loverin & Browne Company of $468.94, and asking him to remit," etc., without saying how the letter was sent, whether by mail, private messenger, or otherwise, and then offer the letter-press copies of such letters as secondary evidence; the original letters not being in possession of the plaintiff or under its control. In most of such cases on such objections the letter itself was permitted to go in evidence, and so much of the witness' testimony as related to the contents of the letter was stricken out. On the 25th day of November, 1904, the plaintiff caused to be served on the defendant a notice, dated October 24, 1904, to produce on the trial of said action certain letters written to the defendant by the plaintiff in relation to the matters here in controversy, giving the dates thereof, and notifying him that upon his failure to produce such letters it would offer secondary evidence of the contents thereof. On the 23d of September, 1903, plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant, notifying him of the balance due on account of Harry Bumgarner to that date, $684.32, that there would be a credit on such balance of about $40 on account of goods returned as soon as they were in, and informing him that they had written Harry Bumgarner several times, requesting him to keep his account paid up to date, but he seemed to be getting behind, which was the reason of this notice, and asked defendant to take up the matter with him, and have him settle the matter as soon as possible, as they could not have the matter run so long. October 6, 1903, the plaintiff received from J. H. Bumgarner a letter requesting a statement of Harry Bumgarner's account, which letter, witness stated, was mislaid, and plaintiff was unable to produce the same on trial. At any rate, on the same day, October 6th, plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant, replying to said request, inclosing statement of Harry Bumgarner's account, showing balance then due plaintiff of $890.37, called his attention to the fact that they had repeatedly requested Harry Bumgarner to settle this account, but that he had kept putting it off from time to time, and that the account ought to be all settled by that time, "with the exception of the last shipment, which we presume has not yet been delivered," and informing him that a credit would go on the account of about $60 or $70 for merchandise that was not yet in, and asking him to take up the matter at once and arrange for an immediate settlement. On the 8th of October, 1903, plaintiff received a letter from J. H. Bumgarner, dated October 7th. In which he says: "I wrote you about a week ago for a statement of Harry Bumgarner a/c with you, as he is my son and I am on his bond I think it justis to me to have a full statement of all the Business he has don, the total amount of goods shipped to him & also the Commission he would be entitled to." On the same day, the 8th of October, plaintiff wrote defendant that it had mailed him statements on the 7th and presumed that he had received them by that time, stating that the amount of shipments itemized in those statements was simply the net cost of the goods shipped, and was the balance due the plaintiff; that it had nothing to do with the commission. Witness stated that on October 15th plaintiff wrote to defendant that it had received $300 from Harry Bumgarner since sending statement to J. H. Bumgarner, which had been credited to his account. On the same day, October 15th, J. H. Bumgarner wrote plaintiff, inclosing freight bill of $2.25, for which he asked plaintiff to give his son, Gay Bumgarner, credit, and says: "I don't want my boys to owe anybody when it ought to be paid but they have sold a good many goods but it seems they come out behind at every shipment and I have to make up the deficiency." Then in a postscript he adds: "Please let me know at once how Harry Bumgarner stands with his a/c. I sent him a check for $400 that he said he had fell behind, and that he could square up with that amount."

On the 19th day of October plaintiff received from defendant a letter, dated October 17, 1903, as follows: "Elizabeth, W. Va., Oct. 17, 1903. Loverin Browne Co. Dear Sirs: I rec. your letter stating that Harry Bumgarner had sent $300 to be credited on his a/c, when I had sent him my check for $400, which was to be sent to you. It does seem to me that he either spends all the money he gets for goods or keeps it & if he is not reducing his a/c I don't want you to send him any more goods on my a/c so send me a statement of all the money he has ever sent you since he commenced business with you & in the mean time don't send him any more goods on my bond until you hear from me." This letter is in answer to the letter of plaintiff informing him of the receipt of $300 from Harry Bumgarner. It will be seen that in the postscript of defendant's letter of October 15th he had mentioned sending a check to Harry Bumgarner for $400. When he finds that he had paid over to plaintiff only $300 of the $400 sent to him by the defendant, he is inclined to not further guaranty payment for him. Witness stated that on the 20th of October, 1903, plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant in reply to his letter of October 15th inclosing the freight bill for $2.25, and his letter of October 17th countermanding his guaranty of Harry Bumgarner, which would take effect of that date and inclosing statement of account showing balance due of $737.90; that a little shipment of $9.76 was made on that day before his countermand was received; that the bill of lading was mailed to Harry Bumgarner and charged to his account. This letter goes on to reply to defendant's letter in relation to the business of his sons, when he says: "They have sold a good many goods but it seems as though they come out behind on every shipment and I have to make up the deficiency," and states that that was not any fault of the business they were in, but, as they learned on good authority, it was the fault of the disbursement of the funds they received, and expressed a regret that his sons had not been careful about their habits; that they would be very sorry to close their business relation with defendant and his sons, but would not advise that it be continued in the manner it was then done. On the 22d of October plaintiff wrote to defendant that it had received a check from Harry Bumgarner for $313.76, which it had credited, together with $20.40 on account of freight, also $32 for goods returned from Nelsonville, to the introduction of which last-named letter no objection was made. On the 26th day of October plaintiff wrote to J. H. Bumgarner that it had received an order from Harry Bumgarner for delivery October 30th at Nelsonville, Ohio, amounting to $375, stating that it would ship the goods to its order, and hold the bill of lading until it should hear from defendant, and ask whether it should send the bill of lading to Harry Bumgarner for the shipment and charge same under the guaranty given by defendant for his account, and asking for a reply at once.

In reply to this letter, on the 30th of October, plaintiff received from defendant the following letter, dated October 28th: "Your letter of the 26th Rec. & in reply—Well you can let Harry Bumgarner have the goods shipped to Nelsonville, $375, on my bond, and in the meantime urge him to send his collections as fast as he can. I want to do all I can for the boys, but don't want him to get too far behind, there is one thing about Harry, he is thorley honest, but he let a lot of his workers get away with him & has been reckless with his money, but has lots of business about him & any advice you will give him to hold him down will be highly appreciated by me." Upon receipt of said letter plaintiff mailed the bill of lading and invoice to Harry Bumgarner at Nelsonville, Ohio. On the 6th day of November plaintiff wrote inclosing to him bill of lading for shipment consigned to plaintiff at Buchtel, Ohio, amounting to $23.15, for Harry Bumgarner, informing him that M. C. Clarke was there, and stated that it was his understanding and Harry Bumgarner's that defendant would stand good for future shipments to Harry Bumgarner, but that plaintiff did not understand it that way, as defendant only instructed it to turn over the Murray City shipment and the Nelsonville shipment, which it had done, and asked whether he would stand good for future shipments to Harry Bumgarner up to the amount of his guaranty, and ask for a definite reply, so there would be no delay in mailing the bill of lading to Harry Bumgarner, and if it was his intention to stand good for future shipments to please indorse the inclosed bill of lading over to Harry Bumgarner, and mail to him at Nelsonville, so that he could get the goods, and would charge to his account. Witness stated that on November 9th plaintiff made a shipment to Harry Bumgarner to Glouster, Ohio, for $58.52, invoice of shipment mailed to Harry Bumgarner at Glouster, and bill of lading was indorsed over to J. H. Bumgarner, and mailed to him at Elizabeth, W. Va., and asking defendant to indorse the bill of lading over to Harry Bumgarner, and mail to him at Glouster in case he wished to have the goods charged to him under his guaranty, and inquiring of him about the bill of lading mailed to him a few days before for the same purpose. By letter dated November 9, 1903, to plaintiff, defendant acknowledged the receipt of this letter of November 6th, and "in reply will say I want to do what is best to help Harry Bumgarner and am willing to stand on his bond for $800, which I think is best for all parties concerned, and will mail him the bill of lading for $23.13 and you can let him have the goods. Please let me know how his a/c stands and oblige." On the 13th of November plaintiff wrote defendant, among other things, as follows: "We have your letter of Nov 9th and note what you say about standing good for future shipments made to Harry Bumgarner to the amount of $800.00 and we will be governed accordingly. We enclose statement of his account to date, showing balance due $859.72. This will be reduced somewhat by goods returned. We have also sent him statement, requesting him to arrange to settle without further delay, so that we can mail him bills of lading for future shipments." On November 12th, defendant wrote plaintiff: "I just recd. a letter from Harry Bumgarner stating that Mr. Clarke would make the orders for goods in the future and he would work for him and that he would not want to ship any more goods on my bond until further orders." On the 14th of November plaintiff wrote defendant: "We have your letter of November 12th, countermanding guarantee given for account of Harry Bumgarner, and we will not ship any more goods under your guarantee until further instructions from you. We wrote you yesterday, sending statement of balance due on his account, which we trust will be settled up as soon as possible." On the 10th of December plaintiff wrote defendant: "As guarantor for the account of Harry Bumgarner, we hand you herewith statement of his account to date, showing balance due $689.51. This account has been running some time, and as we do not see any prospects of getting it out of Harry Bumgarner we shall have to ask you to settle same. Kindly send us draft by return mail to balance, and oblige." This is the amount of plaintiff's claim, as shown by its bill of particulars filed with its declaration, which is an itemized statement of all the shipments made to Harry Bumgarner, as well as all payments made by him during the whole time of their dealings, showing goods shipped in all to amount of $2,001.97, and credits to the amount of $1,312.46, leaving balance due plaintiff said sum of $689.51, which account was proved by the deposition of Arthur Coon, bookkeeper of plaintiff, as true and correct, and showing the true balance unpaid.

A notice hereinbefore mentioned given by plaintiff to defendant to produce certain letters written by plaintiff to defendant named specifically letters dated September 23, October 6, October 8, October 15, October 20, October 22, October 26, November 6, November 9, November 13, November 14, December 10, and December 30, 1903, respectively. The correspondence between plaintiff and defendant introduced in evidence with the deposition of Arthur Coon shows the letters of defendant in reply to letters of plaintiff asking and receiving statements of account of his son, Harry Bumgarner, all the time acknowledging his liability to plaintiff on his guaranties, usually calling it his bond; that he was on the bond for Harry. Carbon copies of these letters from plaintiff to defendant from its letter-book became admissible as secondary evidence under the notice to defendant to produce the originals of such letters, taken together with replies thereto written by defendant, which reply letters are admissible without proof of the handwriting. In 2 Whart. on Ev. § 1828, it is said a letter in answer to one written is presumed to be genuine. Bank v. Geisthardt (Neb.) 75 N. W. 582: "The genuineness of a letter is sufficiently established to permit its introduction in evidence, when it is shown that it was received in due and regular course of mail in response to a letter addressed to the supposed writer." In Davis v. Robinson, 67 Iowa, 255, 25 N. W. 280, it is held: "Letters written with a typewriter and received by defendant through the mail, and purporting to be answers to letters written by him to plaintiffs, were admissible in evidence against plaintiffs without further proof that they were written by them." And Scofield v. Parlin, 61 Fed. 804, 10 C. C. A. 83: "A letter received in due course of mail in response to a letter sent by the receiver is presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to be the letter of the person whose name is signed to it." 1 Greenleaf on Ev. 575 (c), and cases cited; 3 Wig. on Ev. p. 2893 (d); 1 Ell. on Ev. 107; Cobb v. Glenn Boom & Lumber Co. (W. Va.) 49 S. E. 1005. In Ovenston v. Wilson, 2 Car. & Kir. 1, cited by 1 Greenleaf above, it is held that, where a letter was written by the managing clerk of plaintiff's attorney to the defendant, a letter received in answer was admissible in evidence without proof of the defendant's handwriting; and it was also held that a letter proved to be received of an earlier date, in the same handwriting as the last-mentioned letter, was likewise admissible, and also a copy of a letter written by the said clerk of plaintiff's attorney of a still earlier date, to which the last-mentioned letter was an answer, was also given in evidence (the original not having been produced after a notice to produce) without any proof that the original had been put in the post, or had reached the defendant. Boykin v. State (Fla.) 24 South. 141; Plow Co. v. Munger, 52 Kan. 371, 35 Pac. 11.

In defendant's letter of October 28th to plaintiff, in reply to plaintiff's letter of two days before, informing him that it had an order from Harry Bumgarner for delivery of goods at Nelsonville, Ohio, amounting to $375, and that it would hold the bill of lading until it heard from defendant, he gave plaintiff explicit directions to ship them "on my bond, and in the meantime urge him [Harry Bumgarner] to send his collections as fast as he can." Some two or three times defendant would temporarily suspend his guaranty, or his bond, as he termed it; then would again authorize goods shipped to his son thereon. Plaintiff would sometimes send the bills of lading indorsed by it to defendant, and by him to be indorsed over to Harry Bumgarner in case the defendant was willing to stand liable on his guaranty to plaintiff for the shipments, which were always made to plaintiff and could only be received by the holder of the bill of lading. The last time defendant renewed his guaranty was on the 9th of November, 1903, in response to plaintiff's letter of November 6th, as above stated. Defendant, J. H. Bumgarner, was present in person at the trial, and was placed upon the witness stand by plaintiff for the purpose of showing, and did prove, that his principal, Harry Bumgarner, had become insane and was an inmate of an hospital for the insane, and also for the purpose of accounting for papers supposed to be in his possession relating to this case, which he obtained from Harry Bumgarner. He admitted to having a large bundle of papers in the courthouse at the term of court before that relating to the case, but stated that he had turned them over to his attorney, Mr. Casto. He gave no testimony in relation to the correspondence between either himself and the plaintiff, or between Harry Bumgarner and plaintiff. While the fact that defendant was present in person at the trial and did not as a witness for himself deny the authenticity of the letters purporting to be signed by him, nor the fact that he had received the letters of the plaintiff put in evidence, may not be conclusive of anything, it strengthens the presumption that the letters were received and sent by him as shown. Railroad Co. v. Roberts, 10 Colo. App. 87-91, 49 Pac. 423. The defendant offered no evidence in the case. In addition to the evidence of Arthur Coon, who proves the account of plaintiff, J. G. Clarke, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he was with Harry Bumgarner, saw the orders, and helped to deliver the goods; went with him on the wagon when he was delivering them; saw the invoices that were sent to him; that he was showing Harry how to take the goods out, and they were put in piles, and then taken and delivered to the customers, the different packages of goods with the orders on. Harry had several men working for him in selling and delivering the goods, orders were taken by all the men, and the goods would all come together to Harry. Clarke says Harry got the goods, that he saw him get them, and that he collected the money for them; says there might have been one order he did not see Harry get—he is not sure about that—“but the other orders I was with him, and helped him receive them, and check them out, and distribute them, and deliver them, and collect the money for them; that is, he did the collecting.” J. W. Woodyard also testifies to Harry Bumgarner receiving quite a large delivery of goods; did not know how much. Howard Showalter also helped Harry make delivery of two lots of goods and Harry collected the money for them. Arthur Coon testifies to the actual delivery of the goods, all the shipments, to the common carrier, and the presumption is that they were delivered in due course of business. I have said above that the exceptions of defendant to the rulings of the court in many instances in admitting certain letters of plaintiff to Harry Bumgarner and inclosures therewith, and Harry Bumgarner's letters to plaintiff, over the objections of defendant, were well taken, because of insufficient proof of mailing and identification. While this is true, they were immaterial errors not prejudicial to the defendant. If all such objections had been sustained, and the evidence excluded, still the plaintiff had ample proof to sustain its action and to entitle it to its verdict. In Railroad Co. v. Roberts, 10 Colo. App. 87, 49 Pac. 423, it is held: “The admission of incompetent evidence over objection should not reverse a case when it is clear such evidence could have worked no prejudice.” And in Plow Co. v. Munger, 52 Kan. 371, 35 Pac. 11, it is held: “Immaterial errors, not prejudicial to the rights of the defeated party, are no ground for a new trial.”

During the trial the defendant demanded the production of the plaintiff's books of original entry, and excepted to the ruling of the court in overruling his motion. The production of the books at the time they were so demanded would have been a great inconvenience, and could not have been done except at much delay in the trial, and they should have been called for, if wanted, at the taking of the deposition of Arthur Coon, the bookkeeper, which deposition was taken in the city of Chicago, where the plaintiff's place of business was. The account from the books, made by said bookkeeper and filed with the declaration, and proved by him from entries made in the due course of business, was proved in the usual way of proving accounts in assumpsit according to the universal practice in our courts, and was sufficient. Vinal v. Gilman, 21 W. Va. 301. Counsel for defendant says plaintiff failed to show that notice was given to defendant of the failure of his principal, Harry Bumgarner, to pay for the goods purchased within a reasonable time after default. It is shown that statements were furnished him of the status of his son's account time after time and several times at his request.

Counsel for defendant further claims that the declaration was not good, but seems to forget that he failed to demur to the declaration. Section 3, c. 134, Code 1899, provides that no judgment shall be stayed or reversed for any defect, imperfection, or omission in the pleadings, which might have been taken advantage of on a demurrer or answer, but was not so taken advantage of. Land & Improvement Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589.

Counsel for defendant says it was error to admit in evidence the guaranties mentioned in the declaration, and excepted to the ruling of the court in refusing to strike them out as evidence. Section 40, c. 125, Code 1899, says: “Where a declaration or other pleading alleges that any person made, endorsed, assigned or accepted any writing, no proof of the handwriting of such person shall be required, unless the fact be denied by an affidavit with the plea which puts it in issue.” Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528; Maxwell v. Burbridge, 44 W. Va. 248, 28 S. E. 702, in which last case it is held that, unless the affidavit is filed denying such paper, it is error to admit testimony attacking the genuineness thereof.

For the reasons stated, there is no reversible error in the judgment of the circuit court, and the same is affirmed.

LEE et al. v. HUMPHRIES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. EJECTMENT—MESNE PROFITS—WHAT CONSTITUTE.

When, in an action of ejectment, the defendant is a bona fide possessor under a claim of right, the mesne profits are to be assessed upon the value of the property as it stood when the defendant's title accrued, and the plaintiff is prohibited from recovering as mesne profits the increase of income resulting from improvements made by the defendants in good faith.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Ejectment, §§ 438, 446.]

2. TRIAL—VERDICT—AMENDMENT.

When a jury returns a verdict which is incomplete on account of a failure to embrace therein a finding on a material issue, it is not error for the court to call the attention of the jury to the fact and require them to return to their room and complete the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 867.]

3. EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and no sufficient reason has been shown for granting a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by Thomas Lee and Sarah Sheffield against Charlotte Humphries and others. Verdict for plaintiffs. From an order denying a new trial, they bring error. Affirmed.

Thomas Lee and Sarah Sheffield brought suit against Charlotte Humphries and others for a certain described tract of land and mesne profits. The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs the land and mesne profits $3.00 per annum for rent of land. We find for defendant the value of the improvements $188.50. April 21, '05. J. R. Bowdre, Foreman." Whereupon the court immediately ordered the jury to return to their room and make a verdict in accordance with the form given in his charge, and the jury retired and returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs the premises in dispute. We find the value of the lands to be $100. We find the value of the improvements to be $175.00. We find the mesne profits per year to be $3.00, offset by taxes. April 21, '05. J. R. Bowdre, Foreman." To this verdict the plaintiff objected, and moved the court to set it aside; but the motion was overruled, and it was ordered that the verdict be recorded. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, upon the general grounds, and because of the following charge of the court: "The plaintiffs concede that the defendants put the improvements upon the land in good faith. I charge you that in considering the question of mesne profits that you cannot find for the plaintiff against the defendants the mesne profits arising by virtue of the increased value of the premises for renting purposes by reason of any improvements put thereon by the defendants; and in determining the amount of mesne profits you are not authorized to find for the plaintiffs the mesne profits based upon the value of the land as improved by the defendant, but only such mesne profits as represent the value of the premises for rent without the improvements made by defendant." To the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, and to the action of the court in ordering the jury to find the second verdict and ordering that it be recorded, the plaintiff excepted.

M. W. Bayne, for plaintiffs in error. Steed & Ryals, for defendants in error.

COBB, P. J. The charge of the court excepted to correctly set forth the law governing the recovery of mesne profits in an action where the defendant is a bona fide possessor under a claim of right. In estimating mesne profits in such a case, the basis must be the rental value of the land without the improvements placed thereon by the defendant. In the case of Dean v. Feely, 69 Ga. 822, this court approved the following from Sedgwick & Wait on Trial of Title to Land: "The principle of law which prohibits the true owner from recovering as mesne profits the increase of income resulting from improvements made by the occupant is manifestly just and equitable. It cannot be said that the additional profits are taken from the owner's land; on the contrary, they spring from practically an independent source. While it is true that the improvements pass to the owner by a recovery in ejectment, yet they are the property of the occupant until set off against mesne profits, or, in some states, until after their value is ascertained and the occupant's lien upon the land therefor is satisfied." See, also, Beverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 440, 54 Am. Dec. 351. The act of 1897 changed the law with regard to the recovery of mesne profits, to the extent that, in the event the improvement exceeded the sum total of mesne profits found for the plaintiff, the excess might be set off against the value of the land itself; but what constitutes mesne profits, and the method of arriving at what should be allowed as mesne profits, were not affected by that act.

2. The first verdict of the jury rendered in this case did not cover the issues. The act of 1897 distinctly provides that the verdict shall embrace a finding as to the value of the land. Acts 1897, p. 80. It was therefore the duty of the court to order the jury to retire and make their verdict conform to the law. Jordan v. Downs, 118 Ga. 546, 45 S. E. 439.

3. The foregoing disposes of all of the special assignments of error. There was no specific complaint against that portion of the verdict which reduced the mesne profits by the amount of taxes paid by the defendant, nor is there anything in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error on this subject. We express no opinion as to whether this was proper reduction, but see in this connection Clewis v. Hartman, 71 Ga. 813, Austell v. Swann, 74 Ga. 281, and Tripp v. Fausett, 94 Ga. 330, 21 S. E. 572 (3). The evidence, though conflicting, was sufficient to authorize the verdict, and we see no reason for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

POPE v. PRINCE'S ADM'R.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 15, 1908.)1. ADMINISTRATORS — CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE — PREFERRED CLAIMS.

Where two persons were appointed commissioners to sell the real estate of an infant with power in either to act, but only one gave bond and acted as commissioner of sale, selling the land and reporting his sale to the court, and the decree ratifying the sale directed him to collect the purchase money and make deeds to the purchaser, and on making such collections he turned over a large part of the fund to the other person who had been appointed commissioner, the latter is not liable as commissioner of the court for the funds turned over to him, so as to render his deed to the infant a preferred debt of the fourth class, under Code 1904, § 2660, prescribing the order in which debts of a decedent are to be paid.

2. SAME.

A guardian of an infant, having no authority to receive proceeds of sale of the infant's real estate by a court commissioner, is not liable as guardian either de jure or de facto to the infant for the amounts paid to him by the commissioner, so as to render his debt to the infant a preferred debt of the guardian's estate of the fourth class, under Code 1904, § 2660.

3. TRUSTS — CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS.

Where a commissioner for the sale of real estate of an infant transferred proceeds of a sale to a third person, the latter became a constructive trustee holding the amount transferred to him for the benefit of the infant, and was not merely indebted to the commissioner for the amount so transferred.

4. ADMINISTRATORS — CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE — PREFERRED CLAIMS.

An infant's claim against a constructive trustee, holding a fund for his benefit, is not a preferred claim against the trustee's estate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Southampton County.

Creditors' bill by J. B. Prince, Sr., guardian of Abner S. Pope, infant, against J. B. Prince, Jr., administrator of the estate of J. B. Prince, deceased. Judgment was rendered against the infant, and, on his becoming of age, he appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Jas. H. Corbitt and J. U. Burgess, for appellant. J. C. Parker and E. E. Holland, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This is a general creditors' bill, brought for the purpose of convening the creditors and settling up the estate of J. B. Prince, deceased.

The sole question presented by the record involves the right of appellant to have audited in his favor the sum of $6,383.93, claimed to be due from the decedent in a fiduciary capacity, as a preferred debt of the fourth class, under section 2660 of the Code of 1904. It is insisted that the decedent held this sum, either as commissioner of the court, or as guardian of the appellant.

We are of opinion that the fund was not, as contended, in the hands of the deceased, in his lifetime, as commissioner of the court. It appears that in a suit brought to sell the lands of appellant, who was at the time an infant, J. B. Prince and J. L. McLemore were appointed commissioners to sell such real estate, with power in either to act; that J. L. McLemore alone gave bond and acted as commissioner of sale under this decree, selling the land and reporting his sale to the court, which was confirmed. The decree ratifying the sale directed McLemore alone to collect the purchase money and make deeds to the purchasers. This was done; McLemore settling his accounts before the court, showing a balance in his hands of $9,321.75, to the credit of the cause. No decree was made authorizing or directing the distribution of this fund to any one, but McLemore, without authority and in violation of his trust, turned over at different times a large part of the fund to J. B. Prince, who was his law partner, taking in one instance the bond of Prince therefor, and in other instances paying debts of Prince out of the fund without taking any evidence of such payments. It is clear that these moneys did not go into the hands of Prince as commissioner of the court, and that he cannot be held liable as such.

We are further of opinion that this fund did not go into the hands of Prince, either as guardian de jure or guardian de facto. It appears that J. B. Prince was in his lifetime the statutory guardian of appellant, but as such he had no right to receive funds arising from the sale of his ward's real estate. The court itself would have had no authority to order the proceeds of the sale of these lands to be paid to the statutory guardian of the infant. It could have only had it paid for the purposes of investment into the hands of some person, who may or may not have been the guardian, upon special bond being given for the care of the same, as prescribed by section 2622 of the Code of 1904. J. B. Prince, having no right to receive this fund as guardian de jure, cannot be held liable for it as guardian de facto.

It follows from these conclusions that the claim in question is not entitled to preference under the statute, but that it belongs to the class with other general creditors.

The circuit court held that the debt constituted a mere personal claim of J. L. McLemore, commissioner, against the estate of J. B. Prince, deceased. This we think was error. The fund was certainly not in the hands of J. B. Prince as an express trustee, but we are of opinion, upon well-settled principles, that, to the extent the funds belonging to appellant were traced to his hands, Prince will be treated as a constructive or de facto trustee holding the same for the benefit of appellant. This fact does not, however, advance the claim from the general class of creditors, as the statute does not contemplate a preference in favor of constructive trustees. Brown v. Lambert's Adm'r, 33 Grat. 256.

It being conceded that the estate of Prince is insolvent, and that its assets will not pay the preferred debts, it is a matter of no practical importance whether the claim in question is audited in favor of McLemore, commissioner, or of the appellant. We will, however, modify the decree appealed from so as to hold the estate of J. B. Prince liable to appellant, as constructive trustee, for this claim; and thus modified the decree must be affirmed.

NEWPORT NEWS & O. P. RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. CLARK'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 15, 1906.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREETS — OBSTRUCTIONS—LIABILITY OF THIRD PERSONS.

Where a railway and electric company was required by municipal authorities to remove its poles inside the curb line of the sidewalk, and while the company's linemen were engaged in repairing and swinging wires on the poles they stretched a rope across the sidewalk about four feet above it to warn pedestrians not to pass under the poles on which the men were at work, it was not negligence rendering the company liable for the death of a child from coming in contact with the rope which passed under her chin as she was running along the sidewalk, and threw her backward on the pavement.

Error to Circuit Court, Elizabeth City County.

Action by W. F. Clark, as administrator of Elizabeth Clark, against the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

S. Gordon Cumming, for plaintiff in error.
O. D. Batchelor and W. H. Power, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The circumstances leading up to the accident which terminated in the death of plaintiff in error's intestate are as follows:

In compliance with the requirement of the municipal authorities, the plaintiff in error had removed its poles inside the curb line of the sidewalk along Mallory street, in the town of Phoebus. Subsequently, on the morning of the accident, while the company's linemen were engaged in repairing and stringing wires on the poles, by its order, a rope three-fourths of an inch in diameter was stretched across the sidewalk, one end of which was attached to the blind hinge of a building, and the other to one of the company's poles, about four feet above the surface of the pavement. The object in erecting this barrier was to warn pedestrians not to pass under the poles on which the men were at work, and thus to protect them from molten lead used in repairing wires, and from tools carried up on the poles by the linemen, which were liable to fall upon and injure persons passing along the sidewalk beneath.

Between 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning, shortly after the rope had been adjusted, plaintiff's intestate, a girl between 9 and 10 years of age, while running with a companion on her way to school, came in contact with the rope, which passed under her chin, and she was thrown backward upon the pavement, sustaining injuries from which she died two days after the accident.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which the judgment under review was rendered.

From this outline of the salient facts of the case, it is obvious that the plaintiff has failed to establish actionable negligence on the part of the defendant. Though it involved a temporary obstruction of the sidewalk at the time of the accident, the company was engaged in lawful business. Indeed, it was discharging a duty imposed upon it by the town authorities. The work was attended with some danger to those who might pass along and use the sidewalk at that point, and the law devolved upon the company the duty of exercising ordinary care for their protection. Elliott on Roads & Streets (2d Ed.) § 717; Modern Law of Mun. Corp. (Smith) § 1310g; Nolan v. King, 97 N. Y. 565, 49 Am. Rep. 561.

The instrumentality (a three-quarter rope) employed for the purpose of warning the public was not per se a dangerous appliance. It was manifest to the ordinary observer, and in the light of experience the accident which befell the child could not reasonably have been anticipated. The uncontradicted evidence and collective experience of all the witnesses who testified on the subject is that they had never known or heard of such an accident before.

In the case of Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274, 278, 18 N. W. 812, Judge Cooley observes: "The fact that it [the accident] was avoidable does not prove that there was fault in not anticipating and providing against it. If a farm laborer falls from the hay mow, the fall does not demonstrate that the farmer was culpable for not railing the mow in. A man stumbling in a blacksmith shop might have his hand or even his head thrown under the trip hammer, but it would not follow that there had been any neglect of duty on the part of the blacksmith in leaving the hammer exposed. So far as there is a duty resting upon the proprietor in any of these cases, it is a duty to guard against probable dangers, and it does not go to the extent of requiring him to render accidental injury impossible. * * * If the fact that prevention was possible is to render the employer liable, then he may as well be made an insurer of the safety of those in his service in express terms, for to all intents and purposes he would in law be insurer, whether nominally so or not."

It plainly appears that the instruction of the court and verdict of the jury were founded upon a misapprehension of the evidence of a single expert witness, who testified that, in addition to stretching a rope across the sidewalk, it was customary to station a guard there also to warn the public. But the warning contemplated by the witness was manifestly against the danger of walking under the poles where the men were at work and being struck and injured by falling substances, and not the remote contingency of injury from contact with a rope plainly visible to any one using ordinary care for his own safety.

In view of the lack of evidence to sustain the verdict in any aspect of the case, it is not deemed necessary to notice the remaining assignments of error.

The judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

NEWPORT NEWS & O. P. RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. BICKFORD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 8, 1906.)

1. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

On a motion by a lessor for a judgment for rent due under the lease, the lessee set up a claim for damages arising from wrongful acts of the lessor. The lessee had previously instituted a suit for specific performance, in which the lessor was compelled to renew the lease for another term. The suit was terminated before the acts complained of by the lessee had been committed. Held, that the decree in the suit in equity was not res judicata on the question of the lessee's claim for damages.

2. SAME.

On motion by a lessor for judgment for rent, it appeared that a suit had been previously filed by the lessee asking that the lessor be enjoined from placing guards at the gates to the fence around the leased premises, etc. A temporary injunction was granted, which was subsequently dissolved in vacation on the ground that the matters involved were within the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Held, that the suit did not prevent the lessee from setting up a claim for damages arising from the lessor's wrongful interference with the leased premises.

3. PLEADING—BILL OF PARTICULARS—AUTHORITY TO REQUIRE.

Where, on a motion by a lessor for a judgment for rent, the lessee set forth in detail acts of trespass committed by the lessor on the leased premises whereby the lessee's business was destroyed, it was not error to refuse to require the lessee to file a statement giving the particulars of his defense: the object of Code 1887, § 3249 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1709], authorizing the court to require the filing of a statement of the particulars of the ground of defense, being to give plaintiff notice of the defense relied on.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT—MOTION FOR JUDGMENT FOR RENT—SET-OFF.

On a motion by a lessor for judgment for rent due under the lease, a claim by the lessee for damages growing out of trespasses committed by the lessor on the leased premises is directly connected with and grows out of the contract forming the basis of the lessor's action, and the lessee may assert the claim as an offset, under Code 1887, § 3299 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1740], authorizing defendant in an action on contract to file a plea of set-off for any matter which would entitle him to damages from plaintiff.

5. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM—ACTION IN WHICH REMEDY IS AVAILABLE—MOTION FOR JUDGMENT FOR RENT.

A motion by a lessor for a judgment for rent is an action at law, within Code 1887, § 3299 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1740], authorizing defendant in an action on a contract to file a plea of set-off.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Set-Off and Counterclaim, § 16.]

6. WRIT OF ERROR—ERROR IN VERDICT—RIGHT OF DEFEATED PARTY TO COMPLAIN.

The error in a verdict for a sum less than its face shows that the prevailing party is entitled to is no ground of complaint on the part of the defeated party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4060, 4061.]

7. SAME—BRIEFS—SUGGESTION OF ERRORS—REVIEW.

Error to Circuit Court, Elizabeth City County.

Motion for judgment by the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company against J. V. Bickford. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

S. Gordon Cumming, for plaintiff in error.
B. A. Lewis, S. J. Dudley, and Ashby & Read, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The foundation of this motion for judgment is an open account which grows out of a lease contract between the plaintiff as lessor and the defendant as lessee, dated March 21, 1903, supplemented by additional terms dated April 16, 1904.

In addition to the general issue, the defendant pleaded an eviction from the leased premises, and also filed three special pleas. These pleas aver that the plaintiff's motion is based upon a written lease for certain hotel premises known as "Buckroe Beach," situated about three miles from the town of Hampton, Va.; that under the terms of the lease the defendant was to have absolute control of the premises as a summer resort, and to be free from any molestation or interference by the plaintiff; that although the defendant had fully performed the contract of lease on his part, yet the plaintiff had wholly disregarded and broken the same. The pleas then set forth in detail the most flagrant acts by the plaintiff of trespass upon the leased premises and violation of the defendant's rights, whereby his business was broken up and destroyed. The damage thus sustained is pleaded as offset to the plaintiff's demand.

The result of the trial was a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant for $429.38.

Considering the assignments of error in the order set forth by the plaintiff in its petition to this court, we are of opinion that the contention that the defendant's claim for damages was res adjudicata is not well founded.

It is insisted that this claim for damages had been settled in two chancery suits theretofore terminated in the circuit court of Elizabeth City county. The same judge who sat in the causes mentioned conducted the trial of the case at bar, and held, we think properly, that the matters set up in these pleas were not settled or intended to be concluded by the decrees in the chancery causes vouched by the plaintiff. One of these causes was a suit for specific performance, which compelled the plaintiff to renew this lease with the defendant for the year 1904. It was terminated before the acts complained of were committed by plaintiff, and therefore could not have adjudicated the present controversy. The other cause was a bill filed by the defendant asking that the plaintiff be enjoined from placing guards at the gates to the fence around the leased property and from interfering with the defendant's management thereof. A temporary injunction was granted, which was subsequently dissolved in vacation, upon the ground that the matters involved were then under the control and direction of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. It is clear that these chancery causes did not conclude the rights of the defendant with respect to the matters involved in this controversy.

We are further of opinion that there was no error in the refusal of the circuit court to require the defendant to file a statement giving the particulars of his defense.

The object of section 3249 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1709] was to provide that the plaintiff in any action or motion should have notice of the defense to be relied on. The pleas filed by the defendant in this case gave with detailed particularity every ground of defense relied on, and no matter of defense was brought forward at the trial that was not fully described in the pleas. Under these circumstances, to have required a statement to be filed in addition would have been an idle ceremony.

We are further of opinion that there was no error in the refusal of the circuit court to strike out the special pleas filed by the defendant.

These pleas are objected to upon the ground that, if their averments were true, they constituted torts committed by the plaintiff, independent of the contract sued on, and because it was improper to permit a claim for unliquidated damages to be set off against a liquidated debt.

It is not permissible to settle in one action all differences that may exist between litigants. Section 3299 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1740], however, contemplates the settlement of all differences that are connected with the subject-matter of the plaintiff's claim. It is immaterial whether the defendant's claim is in tort or for unliquidated damages. If it be based upon matters directly connected with, and injuries growing out of, the contract sued on by the plaintiff, it can be asserted as an offset under section 3299.

In the case of Kinzie v. Riely's Ex'r, 100 Va. 709, 42 S. E. 872, it is held that a grantee of real estate, when sued at law by his grantor for the purchase price, may, under Code 1887, § 3299 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1740], file a special plea claiming damages for a breach of warranty or covenant for title by his grantor, unless the defense would require the contract to be rescinded and the grantor to be reinstated with the title conveyed; citing Watkins v. West Wytheville Land Co., 92 Va. 1-9, 22 S. E. 554; Mangus v. McClelland, 93 Va. 786, 789, 22 S. E. 364, and other cases.

In the case of Am. Mang. Co. v. Va. Mang. Co., 91 Va. 272, 21 S. E. 466, this court said, citing Huff v. Broyles, 26 Grat. 283, that the plain purpose of the Legislature in enacting section 3299 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 3299] was "to give precisely the same measure of relief on a plea filed under the same, as could be obtained in an independent action brought for the same cause, and to prevent one cause of action from being divided into two." It is further said that, "the term, 'or for any other matter,' was added so that such purpose could be fully accomplished by allowing, not only the defenses particularly and specifically named in the preceding part of the section, but to allow all defenses of that character or kind based upon such contract or for injuries growing out of it, to be disposed of in one case." In this case a special plea under section 3299 was held to be objectionable because it was based upon the breach of a contract other than the contract sued on by the plaintiff.

Exactly the reverse is true in the case at bar. Every item of the plaintiff's account sued on arises under and grows out of the contract of lease mentioned, and each of the defendant's pleas is a claim for damages for breach by the plaintiff of the lease contract and for the inexcusable, if not wanton, violation by the plaintiff of the defendant's rights thereunder. These are matters directly connected with and injuries growing out of the contract which is the basis of the plaintiff's action, and the defendant has the right to assert such a claim as an offset under section 3299.

There is no merit in the contention that these pleas of offset cannot be filed in a proceeding by motion under the statute, because such a proceeding is not an action at law. This court has held that a motion for a judgment for money, under the statute, is an action at law. Reed & McCormick v. Gold, 102 Va. 37, 40, 45 S. E. 868.

We are further of opinion that there was no error in the action of the circuit court in overruling the plaintiff's motion in arrest of judgment, because of error on the face of the verdict.

The foundation of this motion was that the verdict was for $14.50 less than its face showed the defendant entitled to. This error to the prejudice of the defendant is no ground of complaint on the part of the plaintiff.

In a brief filed on behalf of the plaintiff in error after the brief of the defendant in error was filed, a number of other errors are suggested, which, if tenable, could not be considered under the repeated ruling of this court. Orr v. Pennington, 93 Va. 268, 24 S. E. 928; N. & W. R. Co. v. Perrow, 101 Va. 345, 43 S. E. 614; Hawpe v. Bumgardner, 103 Va. 91, 48 S. E. 554.

For these reasons the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Bills by Alice C. Day against H. H. Fay and others and by the state against Alice C. Day and others. Decree for Alice C. Day against A. G. Williams, and bill by the state dismissed; and the state and said Williams appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, and bill of Alice C. Day dismissed.

Williams & Dice, for appellants. John W. Arbuckle, Henry Gilmer, W. G. Mathews, and Watts, Gaines, Davis & Mathews, for appellees.

SANDERS, J. On December 19, 1857, John Williams, the father of A. G. Williams, the appellant, granted to the father of the appellee, A. G. Chenoweth, a tract of 400 acres of land, situated in Greenbrier county. A.

G. Chenoweth was a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for some time prior to the War between the States was stationed at Frankford, in Greenbrier county, but removed from that place, and died intestate in the year 1864, in the state of Indiana, leaving a widow and several children. The widow, Ann C. Chenoweth, died testate in the year 1881, devising all her property, both real and personal, to her daughter, the appellee here. This tract of 400 acres of land was returned delinquent for the non-payment of taxes thereon for the years 1885 and 1886, and sold on the 7th day of November, 1887, and purchased by the appellant, A. G. Williams; and the clerk of the county court of Greenbrier county, on the 17th day of May, 1889, made him a deed for it. On the 22d day of December, 1890, Williams conveyed said tract of land to H. H. Fay and others, trustee of the Gauley Coal Land Association. On the 4th day of February, 1903, the plaintiff, Alice C. Day, filed her bill in the circuit court of Greenbrier county, alleging that during the lifetime of her father, A. G. Chenoweth, the taxes on this land had been regularly paid, and that after his death her mother made arrangements with the appellant, A. G. Williams, by which he was to pay the taxes on this tract of land, and that her mother sent to him at stated times money to cover the amounts paid by him on said taxes, and that up to the death of Mrs. Chenoweth. In the year 1881, Williams faithfully and conscientiously attended to the matter for her; that after the death of her mother, she wrote to the Auditor of this state, and also to the clerk of the circuit court of Greenbrier county, for information, and through information derived from this correspondence she was placed in communication with J. H. and S. B. Williams, brothers of A. G. Williams, and wrote to them in regard to the matter; that she received a reply from S. B. Williams, telling her that A. G. Williams had been paying the taxes on the land for Mrs. Chenoweth; and that, acting upon this letter she, in 1882, wrote to A. G. Williams in regard to the land and the payment of taxes thereon; and, growing out of the correspondence thus begun, and what is shown of the previous dealings between Mrs. Chenoweth and the appellant, A. G. Williams, Mrs. Day claims that Williams became her agent to pay the taxes, and that the purchase of the land by him at the tax sale in 1887 should be held to be a purchase for her, and that the conveyance to the Gauley Coal Land Association should be set aside. Plaintiff's bill is drawn with a double aspect, and seeks: First, to have the various deeds constituting the title of the Gauley Coal Land Company, to which company this land was conveyed by the Gauley Coal Land Association, set aside, and to recover the land, for the alleged reason that the sheriff's affidavit to his return of the list of land sold in November, 1887, is fatally defective. But this is not insisted upon in this court. Second, it seeks to recover the land on the alleged ground that A. G. Williams was the agent of plaintiff for the purpose of paying her tax on this land, and that he failed to pay said taxes, and suffered the land to be returned delinquent, and purchased it at the tax sale in his own name, in violation of his trust, and that the Gauley Coal Land Association purchased the land from him with knowledge of said alleged agency. And, in the event plaintiff should fail to establish the fact that said company took the land with notice of such agency, the bill prays that she may be decreed the value of said land against the plaintiff.

The state of West Virginia, at October rules, 1903, filed a bill setting up that a tract of 400 acres of land, situated in Meadow Bluff district, in Greenbrier county, was forfeited in the name of A. G. Chenoweth for failure to enter the same for taxation after the year 1900, and was liable to be sold for the benefit of the school fund. The defendant, Alice C. Day, filed her answer, denying that said land was forfeited, on the ground that Williams was her agent to pay the taxes; but, in the event that the court should hold that said title was forfeited, she asked to be allowed to redeem. The final decree shows that these two causes were heard together, and the bill filed by the state was dismissed, and a recovery taken in favor of the plaintiff, Alice C. Day, against the defendant, A. G. Williams, for $9,000; and from such decree the state and A. G. Williams have appealed.

The claim made by the plaintiff, Alice C. Day, in her bill, that the tax deed from Buster, clerk, to Williams, is void for irregularities in the proceedings under which it was made, has been abandoned, or, at least, is not insisted upon in this court, and it will only be necessary to state that it is no longer an open question in this state that such irregularities as are complained of will not vitiate a tax deed, but are cured by the provisions of section 25, c. 31, Code 1899. Bogges v. Scott, 48 W. Va. 316, 37 S. E. 661; State v. McElDowney, 54 W. Va. 696, 47 S. E. 650; Kendall v. Scott, 48 W. Va. 251, 37 S. E. 531; State v. McElDowney (W. Va.) 47 S. E. 653; Hornage et al. v. Imboden et al. (decided at this term) 49 S. E. 1036.

This brings us to the consideration of the claim made by the plaintiff, Alice C. Day, that A. G. Williams was her agent to pay the taxes on the 400-acre tract, and that he failed to do so, and suffered the land to be returned delinquent, and purchased it at the tax sale in his own name, in violation of his trust with her. The burden is upon Mrs. Day to show such agency, or the existence of such relations, between herself and Williams, as rendered it improper for Williams to become the purchaser. Has she done so? This question can be very clearly answered in the negative, and it is hardly necessary, when a case turns purely upon a question of fact, for this court to undertake in detail to point out the reasons for its conclusions; but a brief reference to the facts in this case will be made to show the false clamor of the plaintiff, Mrs. Day. A. G. Chenoweth died in 1804, and Mrs. Chenoweth in 1881. Mrs. Day claims that A. G. Williams was the agent of her mother, during her lifetime, to pay the taxes on this land, but the only evidence tending to show this is that A. G. Williams himself admits that at one time he received some money from his brother, S. B. Williams, which had been sent to S. B. Williams by Mrs. Chenoweth to apply on the taxes, and that he (A. G. Williams) paid it to the sheriff. This is the only money shown to have come into his hands from Mrs. Chenoweth, and it is also shown that he applied it as he was requested to do. By Mrs. Chenoweth's will Mrs. Day was made her sole devisee; yet, if such ever existed, she has utterly failed to produce any correspondence between her mother and A. H. Williams in reference to this land, or the payment of taxes thereon. At the time of the death of her mother, Mrs. Day was living in Michigan, and soon thereafter she wrote to the Auditor of this state, and to the clerk of the county court of Greenbrier county, in reference to this 400-acre tract, and as a result of this correspondence she was put in communication with J. H. and S. B. Williams, brothers of A. G. Williams, and wrote to them, and on October 12, 1881, she received a reply from S. B. Williams, telling her that A. G. Williams said he had received money from her mother, and had kept the taxes paid up until that time. This letter, of course, is not evidence against A. G. Williams. Mrs. Day paid no further attention to the matter until November 23, 1882, more than a year after she received the letter from S. B. Williams, when she wrote to A. G. Williams in regard to the land and the payment of taxes thereon. This letter is significant in view of the alleged agency of A. G. Williams, as the whole tenor of the letter is that Mrs. Day desires to know the amount of the taxes, and when they fall due, so that she can attend to it. She says: "Will you be so kind as to let me know when they fall due, and how much it is, so that I can relieve you in future?" There is no intimation that she wanted him to continue as her agent, admitting that he had been the agent of her mother. In reply to this letter, Mrs. Day received a postal card, dated December 14, 1882, and signed by A. G. Williams, but which is admittedly not in his handwriting. A great deal of evidence was taken in an endeavor to establish the fact that this postal is in the handwriting of one James A. Donnally, a stepson of Williams, and who attended to a great deal of business for him; and Williams himself says that it looks to be in Donnally's handwriting, and that he does not believe that Donnally would have written it without being authorized so to do.

Counsel for Mrs. Day attach great importance to this postal, and interpret the words, "I will attend to the business for your mother," as meaning that Williams would attend to it for Mrs. Day on account of her mother. But Mrs. Day herself places a different interpretation upon it. In her deposition she says: "The reference in the card to his attending to the business for my mother means the method he would use in transferring the legal title of the land from my mother or otherwise to me." And, while it is now admitted that the postal was written by some one other than Williams, she says, in her deposition: "I am familiar with A. G. Williams' signature and handwriting, having frequently read letters from him to my mother, and also from having received letters from him, and I identify the writing on the postal card and the signature as his." But Williams goes further in the postal card, and says: "James Knight, a good friend, is the sheriff, and is perfectly safe. If you write him at Lewisburg, all will be right." Here he gives her the name and address of the tax collector, and suggests that she write him in regard to the matter. What more could Mrs. Day expect from Williams in the payment of taxes, or looking after this land for her, after he had given her the information for which she asked in her letter? After the receipt of the postal card, Mrs. Day says that she wrote to A. G. Williams to pay the taxes and keep an account of the amount, and send same to her, and she would reimburse him, and that she received a reply from him, in which he stated that the amount was a mere trifle, that he would pay it along with his own taxes, that the amount was so small it had not impressed itself upon him, but that at some time he would furnish her such statement. She files neither this letter nor the reply thereto. The letter written by Mrs. Day of date November 28, 1882, and the postal reply thereto, is the only correspondence that is shown to have passed between the parties prior to the time that the land was returned delinquent, purchased by Williams, and conveyed to him. Upon this correspondence, and the letter which she claims to have received from Williams saying that he would pay the taxes, Mrs. Day predicates the agency which is the foundation for her suit. She nowhere shows, or attempts to show, that Williams ever received one cent of money from her to be applied on the payment of these taxes. The burden of proof is upon her to establish agency, and she endeavors to do so mainly on the contents of a letter, which she does not file, but the loss of which she accounts for by the fact that, owing to the ill health of herself and her first husband, Smart, she was almost continually traveling, and also by the fact that she was an authoress and magazine editor, with a great many manuscripts to examine, and a large correspondence in many countries. Williams denies that he ever wrote the letter which she claims to have received from him saying that the taxes were a mere trifle, but, on the contrary, says that he himself was hard pressed, during the time that this transaction is alleged to have occurred, to keep the taxes paid on the land owned by him.

After the year 1882, nothing further appears to have been done by Mrs. Day until 1891, when she wrote to A. G. Williams that she was coming to Ronceverte, and for him to meet her there. She came to Ronceverte, and met Williams for the first time at a county fair held at Lewisburg, at which time she says that Williams told her that the land had been sold and purchased by him, but that it was a benefit to her that he had done so; that he would buy the land from her, and a price of $3,000 was named, or convey her another tract in lieu thereof, or reconvey to her the tract purchased. Williams denies that he ever offered to reconvey the land to her, but says that he at that time told her that he had sold and conveyed the land to the Gauley Coal Land Association; but he admits that he offered to convey her another tract in lieu of the one purchased by him, and says that he always intended to convey the land itself, or other lands of equal value, to the proper claimant, but that Mrs. Day, when she came to see him in 1902 in regard to the matter, claimed that he was her agent to pay the taxes, and, inasmuch as he did not consider that he was under any legal obligation to her, he refused to do anything in the premises. Williams' claim that he told Mrs. Day in 1891 that he had conveyed the land to the Gauley Coal Land Association is borne out by the fact that when, in 1892, her husband, Smart, visited Williams with a view to looking at the land which Williams was to convey to her, Williams wrote her a letter, in which he stated that, "if you will make me such title as will remove all clouds from the present one, then I will make you in consideration thereof a deed to 250 acres of my land." This letter was sufficient, on its face, to notify her that either he had disposed of the land and could not convey it to her, or that, if he still had it, he would not convey it to her. In either event, it was her duty to proceed promptly to recover it; but, instead, she did nothing further until the year 1902, 10 years thereafter, when she came to Greenbrier county, and, as she claims, learned for the first time that Williams had disposed of the land.

There were no taxes paid on this land for the years 1881 to 1886, inclusive, by any one, until after it had been returned delinquent and sold. Mrs. Day alleges in her bill that the taxes for the years 1881 to 1884, inclusive, were paid by Williams, and this is true; but these taxes were not paid until 1890, after the land had been returned delinquent and sold for the taxes of 1895 and 1896, and purchased by him. Williams says that the only reason he paid these taxes was that the sheriff still held the tickets, and would have lost the amount represented by them had he not done so. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that A. G. Williams was the agent of Mrs. Chenoweth, during her lifetime, to pay the taxes, which the plaintiff, Mrs. Day, has wholly failed to establish, yet the agency terminated upon the death of Mrs. Chenoweth; and even if it were true that Mrs. Chenoweth furnished the money with which to pay the taxes up until the year 1880, it is equally true that during the entire time of the alleged transaction between Mrs. Day and Williams, extending over a period of more than 20 years, not one cent of money was ever paid by her on these taxes, and nowhere has she shown that Williams was her agent to pay them for her. On the contrary, in the only letter which she wrote to Williams before the tax sale and the purchase by him of the land, she asks him to give her the amount of the taxes and when they became due, so that she could take the matter in her own hands and relieve him in future.

Mrs. Day, in her deposition, says: "I have read letters written by my mother to the Williamses, and especially A. G. Williams, and also letters from the latter to my mother with reference to the payment of taxes on this land, and know from my own knowledge that mother sent Albert G. Williams money from time to time before her death in 1881 to pay taxes on this land." Where are these letters? Being the sole devisee of her mother, it is only reasonable to suppose that, after her death, Mrs. Day came into possession of all her papers. Yet she does not produce the letters to which she refers in her testimony, and gives no excuse for not doing so. And again, this testimony is not consistent, when viewed in the light of her actions after the death of her mother. If A. G. Williams had been attending to the matter of paying her taxes for her mother, as she says, and she was aware of the fact, it would hardly have been necessary for her to have written to the Secretary of State and to the clerk of the county court of Greenbrier county to ascertain whether or not the taxes had been paid, and, if so, by whom. Then it is shown by her own testimony that she wrote first to S. B. Williams, and not until 1882 did she communicate with A. G. Williams, the man who, according to her contention, had been paying the taxes all those years. Viewed in the light of all the circumstances, and given the greatest weight possible for Mrs. Day, the evidence wholly fails to show that A. G. Williams was the agent for either Mrs. Chenoweth or Mrs. Day in the matter of paying taxes on this land.

We recognize the rule laid down by this court that, if the evidence is conflicting and contradictory to such an extent that reasonable men may differ as to the true preponderance thereof, this court will not reverse the finding of the circuit court; but to secure such reversal the evidence, when shifted, must plainly preponderate against the decree. Naughton v. Taylor, 50 W. Va. 233, 40 S. E. 352; Kennewig Co. v. Moore, 49 W. Va. 323, 38 S. E. 558; Bailey v. Calfee, 49 W. Va. 630, 39 S. E. 642; Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 37 S. E. 600; Camden v. Dewing, 47 W. Va. 310, 34 S. E. 911, 81 Am. St. Rep. 797; Whipkey v. Nicholas, 47 W. Va. 35, 34 S. E. 751; McIntosh v. Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 382, 35 S. E. 860; Spurgin v. Spurgin, 47 W. Va. 38, 34 S. E. 750; and many other cases laying down the same rule. But this rule does not apply to the case we have here, and should only apply where the evidence is conflicting, and when, upon the whole evidence, it is doubtful as to what decree should be entered; and then, again, it certainly does not apply where the decree has been rendered in favor of one who has not made out a prima facie case. A prima facie case must always be made out, and in the establishment thereof, and in the proof rebutting such prima facie case, if there is such a conflict in the evidence as to render it doubtful what conclusion should be reached, then this court should accept the conclusions of the trial judge. But the plaintiff, Mrs. Day, has wholly failed, in our opinion, to establish even a prima facie case; and, this being so, the question of conflict of testimony does not arise. As before noted, the very basic principle relied on for recovery is that Williams was her agent, and in her endeavor to show this we can but conclude that she has entirely failed. Counsel for Mrs. Day cite the case of Ruffner, Donally & Co. v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 604, to show that an agent may be ordinarily appointed by parol, in the broad sense of that term, at the common law—that is, by verbal declaration, in writing not under seal, or by acts and implications—and also cite Story on Agency, §§ 15, 54, to sustain the view that an agency may be created by express words or acts of the principal, or may be implied from his conduct or acquiescence, and that the nature and extent of the authority of an agent may be implied or inferred from the circumstances, and that the usual mode of the appointment of an agent is by an unwritten request, or by implication from the recognition of the principal, or from his acquiescence in the acts of his agent. The correctness of these authorities is not and cannot be disputed, because they enunciate plain legal principles; but the facts of this case are not such as to make Williams the agent of Mrs. Day, under the application of this doctrine.

Then, again, a great deal of authority is cited to support the view that, when an agency has been once established to act with reference to the case of and payment of taxes on real estate, such an agency cannot be terminated without proper and legal notice to the principal of such termination, and the burden is upon the agent to show the termination; and particularly is it necessary when the agent obtains property with which he is intrusted without the knowledge and consent of the principal. Murdoch v. Miller, 84 Mo. 96. "Nor will an agent be allowed to make use of his position and information thereby obtained to acquire an interest adverse to his principal, and any interest so obtained will be decreed to be held in trust for the principal. And an agent employed to manage property cannot acquire title thereto by purchase at a sale for taxes or sheriff's sale," etc. 1 Am. & Eng. Encyc. Law (2d Ed.) 1085, and citing many cases. These authorities are not questioned, and it is not necessary for us to discuss them, inasmuch as we hold that no agency has been established.

This brings us to the question as to whether or not the court decreed properly in dismissing the bill of the state in the second above-mentioned cause. The decree in this respect is so plainly right that it is hardly necessary to make any comment upon it. The land was returned delinquent for the non-payment of taxes in the name of A. G. Chenoweth, sold by the state, purchased by Williams in 1887, and conveyed to him by the clerk of the county court. This conveyed to him all the right, title, and interest of A. G. Chenoweth, thereby leaving no title in him to be forfeited, and since the purchase by Williams the taxes have been paid by him and those claiming under him.

The decree of the circuit court, dismissing the bill of the state, is affirmed; but it was error to refuse to dismiss the bill of the plaintiff, Alice C. Day, and in taking a recovery in her favor. Therefore in this respect the decree is reversed, and her bill is dismissed.

McWHORTER, J. dissenting.

(59 W. Va. 75)

LEWIS, HUBBARD & CO. v. MONTGOMERY SUPPLY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 20, 1906.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES — PRESENTATION OF CHECKS—DILIGENCE.

A person receiving a check, on a fund in the hands of a bank, for the amount of a demand against the drawer thereof, is bound to exercise reasonable diligence in making presentment thereof for payment, if he wishes to avoid risk of loss by insolvency of the drawee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1067, 1091.]

2. SAME—TIME FOR PRESENTING.

If the payee of the check and the drawee reside, or have their places of business, in the same city or town, presentment must be made before the expiration of business hours of the day next after the day of the receipt thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1095–1099.]

3. SAME—FORWARDING BY MAIL.

If the person receiving a check and the bank on which it is drawn are in different places, it must be forwarded, for presentment, by mail or other usual mode of transmission, on the next day after the receipt thereof at the place in which the payee resides or does business, if reasonably and conveniently practicable; and, if it is not so practicable, then by the next mail, or other similar means of conveyance, leaving after said date.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1095–1099.]

4. SAME.

Neither payee nor his agent is required to transmit such check by the only, or last, mail of the day next after its receipt, if such mail closes or departs at an hour so early as to render it inconvenient for the holder to avail himself of it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1095–1099.]

5. SAME.

What is an unreasonably early hour in such case depends upon all the circumstances of the transaction and situation of the parties, and, the facts being free from controversy and doubt, is a question of law for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1095–1099, 1882, 1883.]

6. SAME—COLLECTION THROUGH BANK.

In the absence of any agreement to the contrary, and of any circumstance, known to the payee, making imprudent to do so, he may indorse and deliver the check to a bank for collection; but this does not extend the time within which it must be forwarded for presentment. The bank, however, in such case, is not required to forward it on the next day after its receipt by the payee, if there be no reasonably convenient means of doing so, within the banking hours of that day.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1091–1099.]

7. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Though the courts of this state cannot have judicial knowledge of the existence of any particular bank, or of any mode of business peculiar to a given bank, they will take judicial notice that, in all cities and towns of large population and extensive business, within their jurisdiction, banks exist, and of the facts that their operations are governed by reasonable rules and regulations, to which parties dealing with them, or in commercial paper, are deemed to have subjected themselves.

8. SAME.

Courts cannot take judicial notice of the business hours of any particular bank, but the courts of this state judicially know that ordinarily banks in the cities and larger towns of the state do not open their doors for business at an hour earlier than 9 o'clock a. m.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 4, 24, 25.]

9. BILLS AND NOTES — PRESENTATION OF CHECK.

The parties to a check drawn on a bank and sent to a distant place to be forwarded for presentation are deemed in law to have acted with knowledge of the usual diligent method of making such presentment through a bank at the place to which it is sent, and to have agreed to suffer any reasonable delay incident to such mode of presentment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1095–1103.]

10. SAME—LIABILITIES OF DRAWER.

In such case, the drawer, by allowing his funds to remain in the drawee bank, and the payee, by accepting the check, evince belief in the solvency of the bank, and the former voluntarily takes the risk of its solvency during the reasonable period necessary for presentment of the check in the usual manner.

11. SAME.

The drawer, in delivering a check to an agent of the payee, having no authority to indorse it, at the place of business of the drawer, impliedly agrees to allow such additional time for presentment as may be necessary for the transmission of the check to the principal of the agent.

12. SAME.

Failure to present a check does not bar recovery from the drawer, if the time intervening between delivery thereof and the failure of the bank is not sufficient for presentment by the exercise of such diligence as the law requires.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, §§ 1029, 1067, 1095-1099, 1104.]

13. APPEAL — REVERSIBLE ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

It is reversible error to give an instruction presenting an hypothesis which has no foundation in the evidence adduced, unless the court can clearly see that it did not prejudice the acceptor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 4220.]

14. TRIAL—OFFER OF EVIDENCE—REJECTION.

An offer of evidence, not appearing in any way to be relevant and material, is properly rejected.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by Lewis, Hubbard & Co. against the Montgomery Supply Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Berkeley Minor, Jr., and Payne & Hamilton, for plaintiffs in error. Dillon & Nuckolls, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. A question of commercial law arises on this record. Lewis, Hubbard & Co., of the city of Charleston, doing a wholesale business in groceries, had, prior to the 24th day of September, 1900, sold goods to the Montgomery Supply Company, doing a retail grocery business in the town of Montgomery, and on that day there was due from said last-mentioned concern the sum of $183.69. On that day W. G. Hubbard, a traveling salesman for Lewis, Hubbard & Co., was at Montgomery, called upon the Montgomery Supply Company, received from it, not earlier than 4 o'clock p. m. of that day, a check for the amount of the bill, payable to Lewis, Hubbard & Co., drawn on the Montgomery Banking & Trust Company, a bank in Montgomery, neglected or failed to forward the same to his principal, and went on from Montgomery to call upon other customers of his house, taking the check with him. He received the check on Monday, the 24th day of September, and on Friday, September 28th, the Montgomery Banking & Trust Company failed to open its doors for business, went into the hands of a receiver, and finally paid a small percentage to its depositors. The drawer of the check had ample funds in the bank to pay it, and it presumably would have been paid, had it been presented for payment at any time during banking hours on Thursday the 27th. It was afterwards sent to the bank through proper channels and protested.

This action was brought by Lewis, Hubbard & Co. against the drawer of the check, in a justice's court, and went from that court to the circuit court of Fayette county, where judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $23.60, the amount received by the defendant as a dividend on its deposits from the assets of the defunct bank. This judgment being substantially one for the defendant, the plaintiff has brought the case to this court on a writ of error.

From the testimony in the case, it appears that Hubbard had authority to collect and to give receipts for his collections, but did not have authority to indorse checks in the name of his principal and receive money thereon. It further appears that, had he promptly mailed the check to his principal, it would have been received by it the following day, and, if discounted at Charleston on the same day and promptly forwarded back to Montgomery within business hours of that day, it would have reached the latter place not earlier than Wednesday morning. The mails left Montgomery for Charleston three times a day, namely, about noon, between 3 o'clock and 5 o'clock p. m., and between 7 o'clock and 8 o'clock p. m. The first two reached Charleston in about one hour's time. By the last one delivery was made in Charleston the next day. The east-bound train took western mail at Montgomery, carried it east, and delivered it to a west-bound train which passed Charleston at about 3 a. m. the next morning. The mails from Charleston reached Montgomery twice a day, one at about 6 a. m. and the other between 10 and 11 a. m. It was by the latter one that mail could be posted at Charleston and be received at Montgomery on the same day. If, therefore, the plaintiff was bound by law to exercise the utmost diligence possible under the circumstances to obtain the money on the check, and is precluded from recovery by its failure to exercise such diligence, its case would clearly fail; for it could have had the check presented for payment at Montgomery on Thursday. But, if the law does not demand of the holder of a check the utmost diligence and haste in procuring payment of a check by the drawee, the question depends upon the degree of diligence that is required. If such diligence did not require the discounting or depositing of the check at Charleston on the day of its reception at that place by the plaintiff, and it was allowable to deposit at a Charleston bank on the next day, namely, Wednesday, it could not have reached Montgomery until Thursday, unless deposited and forwarded early in the morning, for the last mail from Charleston to Montgomery on that day left not later than 10 o'clock a. m., for it arrived at Montgomery between 10 and 11 o'clock a. m. The mail for that train would probably close by 9:30 o'clock a. m. If the plaintiff was bound to put the check in the hands of the bank in time for that mail on Wednesday, it was necessary, therefore, to do so on Tuesday or at an early hour on Wednesday. If the plaintiff was bound to deposit it on the same day of its reception, and the Charleston bank was not required to forward it until the next day, it would not have reached Montgomery until Thursday, unless mailed at an early hour on Wednesday. If so, and the Charleston bank had the whole of the business day in which to mail it, it would not have reached Montgomery until Thursday. If it had been received at Montgomery by the agent or correspondent of the Charleston bank on Thursday, then the question arises whether the agent or correspondent was bound to present it on the day of its reception, or was entitled to hold it until the next day, Friday. Upon the answers to these questions, to be found in the principles declared by the courts, the correctness of some of the positions taken by the attorneys in the case depends.

In some respects, the rights of the parties to a check, drawn by an individual on a bank, are governed by the principles applicable to the parties to an inland bill of exchange, but not in all respects. Notice of dishonor and nonpayment of a check, and diligence in the presentation thereof, are required only when it is necessary to protect the drawer from loss by reason of the failure of the drawee, holding funds of the drawer sufficient to pay the check. Presumably the check is drawn upon funds in the hands of the drawee belonging to the drawer, and amounts to an appropriation thereof in favor of the payee of the check, and he owes to the drawer the duty of exercising a certain amount of diligence to obtain payment in order to prevent a loss to the drawer by reason of failure of the bank. In other words, if he fails to perform such duty, the loss falls upon himself, and he is barred by law of any right to recover against the maker of the check. If, by delay in presentation, a loss occurs, the payee or holder is deemed to have extended credit to the bank, and must suffer the consequences. Cox v. Boone, 8 W. Va. 500, 23 Am. Rep. 627; Compton v. Gilman, 19 W. Va. 312, 42 Am. Rep. 776; Purcell v. Allemon & Son, 22 Grat. 739; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 1030; Parsons on Notes and Bills, vol. 2 pp. 58, 59; Bank v. Bank, 10 Wall. 647, 19 L. Ed. 1008.

For the reasons above stated, presentation of the check for payment, at the bank on which it is drawn, must be made within a reasonable time, and what is a reasonable time depends upon the situation of the parties with reference to one another and with reference to the bank and all other material facts and circumstances entering into the transaction. When the drawee and payee are in the same town or city, presentation must be made not later than the next day after the reception of the check, unless there is some understanding or agreement to the contrary, or some circumstance intervenes or is connected with the transaction sufficient to vary the rule; but it is sufficient to present it at any time on the next day within business hours. Alexander v. Birchfield, 1 Car. & Marsh. 75, 41 E. C. L. 47. In that case Tindal, C. J., said: "The only way in which I can state the rule to you is this, that, if a party receive a check on a particular day, he may present it at any time during banking hours on the following day to that on which he received it." See, also, to the same effect, Moule v. Brown, 4 Bing. N. C. 266, 33 E. C. L. 347; Cox v. Boone, 8 W. Va. 500, 23 Am. Rep. 627; Simpson v. Insurance Co., 44 Cal. 139; Cawein v. Browninski, 6 Bush: (Ky.) 457, 99 Am. Dec. 684; Schoonfield v. Moon, 9 Helsk. (Tenn.) 171; Boddington v. Schlenker, 4 Barn. & A. 752; Holmes v. Roe, 62 Mich. 199, 28 N. W. 864, 4 Am. St. Rep. 844; Lloyd v. Osborne, 92 Wis. 93, 65 N. W. 859; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 1042. But when the person receiving the check is at a place different from that of the place of business of the drawee, additional time is allowed. The person receiving it need not forward it for presentation on the day of its reception, but may do so on the next day thereafter, and the person to whom it is forwarded for presentation need not present it on the day of its reception, but may do so on the next day after he receives it. In this case two extra days are allowed, while in the other but one is allowed. 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 1042; Moule v. Brown, 4 Bing. N. C. 266; Holmes v. Roe, 62 Mich. 199, 28 N. W. 864, 4 Am. St. Rep. 844; Erideaux v. Criddle, L. R. 4 Q. B. 455; Griffin v. Kemp, 48 Ind. 172, 176; Burkhalter v. Bank, 42 N. Y. 538; Parsons on Notes and Bills, 72. The reason for this indulgence is well stated by Story on Bills (section 290), in discussing the law of notice of dishonor and protest, in which the principle is generally held to be the same. He says: "In the first place, then, it is not by our law necessary in any case to give notice, either by post or otherwise, on the very day on which the dishonor and protest took place, although the holder is at liberty to do so at his option. He is always allowed by law a whole day for this purpose, and is not compellable to lay aside all other business to devote himself to that particular purpose. For it would be most inconvenient and unreasonable to require such strictness, as it might interfere with other business and duties quite as pressing and important; and therefore it is sufficient if he sends notice by the post or otherwise by the next day." The same reason which suffices to give two days, one for reception and the other for presentation, when the payee and drawee are at the same place, justifies the general rule allowing four days when they are at different places.

In view of these principles, the way to a conclusion would seem to be perfectly clear, but for the circumstance of there being no mail from Charleston to Montgomery on the afternoon of Wednesday, the last day allowed by the rule for forwarding the check to Montgomery. Did this circumstance make it necessary to forward the check in the mail leaving Charleston at about 9 or 10 o'clock a. m.? If not, and it was allowable to deposit it in the post office within business hours on Wednesday, it could not have reached Montgomery until Thursday. Enough has been stated to clearly demonstrate that the utmost diligence possible is not required. The payee is bound to exercise only reasonable diligence, and need not do that which is contrary to, or variant from, the ordinary and prudent mode of transacting business. But the law does seem to require such action, within reasonable limitations, determined by considerations of convenience, but not of leisure, as is calculated, in view of the possibility of loss by delay, to prevent it. Hence, the two-day rule, allowed for forwarding notices or paper for presentment, is subject to this qualification, namely, that it must be sent by the mail of the second day. If there be more than one mail on that day, it need not go by the first; but, if there be but one, it must go by it, unless it leaves or closes at an unreasonably early hour. The whole of the second day is not allowed, unless the last mail of that day goes at the close of business.

To this point the American authorities seem to be unanimous. They are ably reviewed, and the result clearly stated, by Chief Justice Green, in Burgess v. Vreeland, 24 N. J. Law, 71, 59 Am. Dec. 408. In that case the controversy related to presentment, nonpayment, and protest of a note and notice thereof, but the principles governing that subject are applicable to checks, when loss occurs by failure to promptly present them. "In the more recent edition of Kent's Commentaries, the rule is stated thus: 'According to the modern doctrine, the notice must be given by the first direct and regular conveyance. * * * This means the first mail that goes after the next to the third day of grace; so that, if the third day of grace be on Thursday, and the drawer or indorser reside out of town, the notice may, indeed, be sent on Thursday, but must be put into the post office or mailed on Friday, so as to be forwarded as soon as possible thereafter.' 3 Kent's Com. (6th Ed.) 105, 106. And in note "a" to page 106 the author further states that the rule was laid down too strictly in Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. 373, 4 L. Ed. 264, viz., that notice of dishonor must be put into the post office early enough to be sent by the mail of the day succeeding the last day of grace; and that the rule, as it is now generally and best understood in England and in the commercial part of the United States, is that notice put into the post office on the next day after the third day of grace, at any time of the day so as to be ready for the first mail that goes thereafter, is due notice, though it may not be mailed in season to go by the mail of the day after the default. This is certainly very high authority on a question of commercial law, and the change in the statement of the principle shows that it was made deliberately and upon examination and reflection. Yet it is worthy of notice that this authority was before this court at the time of the decision in Sussex Bank v. Baldwin, 17 N. J. Law, 487. It has since undergone the examination of other American courts without securing their concurrence of approbation. Downs v. Planters' Bank, 1 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 261, 40 Am. Dec. 92; Wemple v. Dangerfield, 2 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 445. In both these cases the rule was held to be that the notice must be in the post office in time to go by the mail of the day next after the day of protest, if a mail goes on that day, unless it leaves at an unreasonably early hour. In Beckwith v. Smith, 22 Me. 125, 38 Am. Dec. 290, it was held that the notice must be in the post office in season to be carried by the mail of the next day after the note is dishonored. In Chick v. Pillsbury, 24 Me. 458, 41 Am. Dec. 394, it was held by a majority of the court that it is sufficient if notice of the dishonor of a promissory note be put into the mail within a convenient time after the commencement of business on the day succeeding that of the dishonor. In that case the note was protested in the city of New York on the 29th of November, and on the same day notice was given to the agent of the plaintiff. On the next day notice of dishonor, directed to the defendant at his residence in Bangor, Me., was put into the post office in the city of New York, between 12 o'clock at noon and 8 o'clock at night. So far the facts correspond precisely with the facts of the present case. But it was further proved in the case that there was but one daily mail from the city of New York by which letters would go to Bangor; that this mail closed at 6, and left the city at 7 in the morning, which in the month of November would be soon after daylight. The counsel of the defendant insisted that the notice was not mailed in season; that it must be put into the post office in season to go by the mail of the next day after dishonor, however early it might depart. And of this opinion was Shepley, J., who, in an elaborate opinion after an able review of the cases, held that the strictest rule, requiring in all cases that the notice should be mailed in season for the mail of the day next after the dishonor of the note, was sustained by the weight of the authority. And it is remarkable that Justice Kent, notwithstanding the opinion previously expressed that the party had the whole of the day following the third day of grace in which to mail notice of protest, concludes the note to which allusion has been made by saying that he apprehends that the weight of authority is in favor of the view of the rule as taken by Mr. Justice Shepley. But the majority of the court in Chick v. Pillsbury held that the rule does not require that the notice should be mailed in season to go by the mail of the next day, however early it might close, but that it extends to the allowance of a convenient time after the commencement of business hours on the next day to prepare and despatch the notice; and, inasmuch as the notice was mailed in season to go by the next mail, which left on the day succeeding that of the dishonor after business hours had commenced, the notice in that case was adjudged sufficient. This principle is precisely in accordance with the ruling of this court in the case of Sussex Bank v. Baldwin, 17 N. J. Law, 487. There is, it is believed, no well considered adjudication that carries the doctrine further." Burgess v. Vreeland, 24 N. J. Law, 71, 77-80, 59 Am. Dec. 408.

Morse on Banking, in treating of the law of diligence in respect to the presentment of checks, says, in substance, at section 421, the same rules and principles are alike applicable to them and the giving of notice of protest. In the absence of agreement or special circumstances, the time allowed is as it has been hereinbefore stated. In subsection (c) 2, of said section 421, he says: "The drawer cannot (except by agreement or under special circumstances as above) be held absolutely beyond the business hours of the day following his delivery of the check, if the bank is in the same place, or, if the bank is in another place, the period of his liability will be until the close of business hours on the first secular day following the receipt of the check by some one in the bank's locus; the check having been mailed upon the day following its delivery by the drawer." At section 423 he states the qualification of the rule, under the special circumstances of the departure of the mail at an unreasonably early hour, citing Cox v. Boone, 8 W. Va. 500, 23 Am. Rep. 627, in which the failure of the holder to send the check by the only mail of the day on which ordinarily it should have been sent was excused because it departed at 7:30 o'clock a. m. in the month of February. Had it departed at a reasonable hour, the decision would have been different. It would have been his duty to forward it on the next day after its reception.

The reason for requiring the check or notice to be forwarded on the second day, if it be practicable to do so, is apparent; for otherwise the effect would be to give the party three days instead of two and without any substantial reason therefor. The holder of a check cannot extend the time allowed him by depositing it in a bank for collection. Alexander v. Birchfield, 1 Cat. & Marsh. 75. It must be forwarded or presented on the next day after receipt, if reasonably practicable, whether it be done in person or by agent.

What is an unreasonable hour depends upon circumstances. If the court could say, as matter of law, that 9 o'clock or half past 9 o'clock a. m. is an unreasonable hour, within the meaning of this law, then we could say it would have been sufficient to have forwarded it in the mail of Thursday by depositing it in the post office at some time on Wednesday. No evidence was introduced showing the business hours of the banks in Charleston, nor the situation, with reference to the post office, of the bank with which the plaintiff transacted its business. Therefore the question submitted to the jury was whether the time of departure of the mail, shown by the evidence, was, under ordinary circumstances unaffected by any local custom or mode of business, an unreasonable hour. It did not involve any inquiry as to whether, under a given state of facts, a thing could reasonably be done or accomplished. It seems therefore to have presented very little matter of fact, if any at all, for the consideration of the jury, and to have been substantially a question of law. It has been frequently held that when the only question is the reasonableness of the time, the facts being undisputed, it is one of law for the court. It is rather a question of commercial law than one of mere fact; the exigencies of commercial transactions, and the peculiarities of that kind of business, having established certain rules and regulations by which both court and jury are bound. Taylor v. Sip, 30 N. J. Law, 284. Rosenthal v. Ehrlicher, 154 Pa. 399, 26 Atl. 435, holds that: "When the only question is that of diligence, and the facts are uncontroverted, it is one of law for the court." See, also, Cawein v. Browinski, 6 Bush (Ky.) 457, 99 Am. Dec. 684; Walker v. Stetson, 14 Ohio St. 89, 84 Am. Dec. 362; Linville v. Welch, 29 Mo. 203. In Downs v. Bank, 1 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 261, 277, 40 Am. Dec. 92, it is said the question is not what inference the jury might draw, but what testimony does the law require in the case? In Prescott Bank v. Caverly, 7 Gray (Mass.) 217, 66 Am. Dec. 473, Bigelow, J., said: "Ordinarily, the question whether a presentment was within a reasonable time is a mixed question of law and fact, to be decided by the jury, under proper instructions from the court. And it may vary very much, according to the particular circumstances of each case. If the facts are doubtful or in dispute, it is the clear duty of the court to submit them to the jury. But when they are clear and uncontradicted, then it is competent for the court to determine whether the time required by law for the presentment has been exceeded or not." Parsons on Notes and Bills, p. 340, says: "Where the facts are few and simple, and the acts or admissions of parties clear and unequivocal, the question is one of law for the court. But where the rights and liabilities of parties depend on contracts, and a variety of transactions and dealings arising therefrom, or where the facts are contradictory and complicated, it is a question for the jury to determine."

In the exercise of the power to determine what is a reasonable time, or whether an act is done within a reasonable time, according to the law merchant, the courts have always taken judicial notice of some of those customs, habits, and practices which may be deemed to be a part of the knowledge and information of the people generally, and also of customs and practices peculiar to banks and other financial and commercial institutions. They have determined repeatedly what is a reasonable hour for presentation of a bill for acceptance at the place of business of a trader, as well as for the presentation of a note or other negotiable instrument at a bank, marking a distinction between the two classes of institutions due to the known difference in their hours of business. What is a sufficient presentation in point of time at the place of business of a merchant might not be sufficient in the case of a bank. Numerous illustrations of this will be found in the reported cases. In making such distinctions the courts necessarily take judicial notice of the difference in methods of transacting business. In some instances they have expressly declared their power to take judicial notice of such matters. Thus, in Davis & Co. v. Hanly, 12 Ark. 645, it is said: "This court will take judicial notice of 'the general customs and usages of merchants' as well as of the 'general customs of our own country,' as matters that are generally known." Wigmore on Ev., at section 2580, says: "Courts are found noticing, from time to time, a varied array of unquestionable facts, ranging throughout the data of commerce, industry, history, and natural science. It is unprofitable, as well as impracticable, to seek to connect them by generalities and distinctions; for the notoriety of a truth varies much with differences of period and of place." In the note to this section the author cites a vast number of instances illustrating the proposition. As indicated by his language, the basis of judicial notice is the common notoriety of the thing which the courts judicially observe. While a court cannot take judicial notice of the existence of a bank in any particular place, nor of the peculiar methods of business adopted by any bank, they must presume that every bank operates under some reasonable rules and regulations in the transaction of their business; and that parties, in dealing with them or making themselves parties to commercial paper, contemplated the delay incident to, as well as the promptness designed to be effectuated by, such rules and regulations. They do not expect a bank, handling a large number of important securities or commercial instruments each business day, to give to one any particular or special attention not ordinarily given to others of the same class. It is notorious that, for business purposes, banks open their doors later, and close them earlier, than other institutions, and that, as a rule, in cities and towns of considerable size, they are never open earlier than 9 o'clock a. m. Charleston is a city of considerable proportions, in which there must necessarily be a number of banks, doing business after the manner and customs adopted by banks generally throughout the country. Hence, it requires no strain of judicial cognizance to say that they are not open for business before 9 o'clock a. m. As the evidence discloses that the last mail leaving Charleston for Montgomery must have gone very soon after the banks opened in September, 1900, the forwarding of the check by that mail would have required more than ordinary diligence. A bank is entitled to a reasonable time after the commencement of business in which to perform any given duty. It cannot be expected to lay aside all other matters and give its attention to that one. "Banks would be kept in continual fever if they were obliged to send out a check the moment it was paid in." Lord Ellenborough, in Rickford v. Ridge, 2 Campb. 537. It is not a question of what it is possible for banks to do, but one of what they do, and of what the parties to the paper know to be the custom and practice of banks. Since the mail must have left Charleston between 9 and 10 o'clock a. m., it must have been closed at the post office very soon after the banks opened; for some time is required for the preparation of it and for carrying it from the post office to the railway station. It is highly probable that this mail closed just about the time the banks opened, and it is reasonably certain that it was closed within a few minutes after the opening of the banks. All this the drawer of the check must be deemed to have contemplated. He was bound to know that the usual method of collecting checks is to indorse them to the banks to be forwarded by mail for presentment. Both parties, in view of their knowledge of this method of transacting such business, are deemed to have agreed to be bound by the delays incident to this mode of demanding payment. It may be said that both contemplated the possible insolvency of the bank on which the check was drawn, or were bound to know that such a thing might happen; but the drawer, by allowing his money to remain in that bank, and the payee, by accepting the check upon it, each evinced belief in its solvency, and the former a willingness to take the risk thereof, during the reasonable period of time necessary for the presentation of the check in due course of business, by the means which both parties knew the banks generally employ for that purpose.

As long ago as 1853, the Supreme Court of New Jersey, in Burgess v. Vreeland, 24 N. J. Law, 71, 59 Am. Dec. 408, expressed the opinion that a mail closing at half past 9 in the morning would be before usual business hours. If since that time there has been any change in this respect, it cannot be deemed to have been to the contrary of, or in conflict with, this proposition. The tendency is to limit, rather than extend, the business day in all branches of industry and commerce. A bank is not required to take advantage of a mail which closes before, or at the time of, the opening of business. In Chick v. Pillsbury, 24 Me. 458, 41 Am. Dec. 394, it was expressly decided that a convenient time after the commencement of business hours of the day is allowed for the mailing of a notice of dishonor. In Haskell v. Boardman, 8 Allen (Mass.) 38, it was held that the mailing of a notice of protest at 10 o'clock a. m. was not due diligence; it appearing that the only mail for that day departed at 10 o'clock. It was sent by an individual to a prior indorser for the purpose of binding him. The rule in such case would be different, for the reason that there is no presumption that an individual engaged in business other than banking does not commence business at an early hour. On the contrary, it is a matter of common knowledge that merchants and traders open their places of business at an earlier hour than banks. Moreover, in this instance, the evidence shows the mail must have closed long before 10 o'clock. "What is a reasonable time must depend upon circumstances, and in many cases upon the time, the mode, and the place of receiving the bills, and upon the relations of the parties between whom the question arises." Dan. Neg. Instr. § 605. That the check in this case was not actually put in course of presentment can make no difference. It is enough to make the drawer liable, that, if it had been, the time allowed by the rule of diligence was not sufficient. Cox v. Boone, 8 W. Va. 500, 23 Am. Rep. 627.

In view of these principles the court clearly erred in giving the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe the plaintiff could by due diligence have presented the check in question to the bank upon which it was drawn before it failed, it was the duty of plaintiff to do so; and, if the jury further believe the plaintiff failed to use due diligence in such respect, and its lack of diligence caused the loss of the amount of the check to the defendant, the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff for the amount of the check, but may find for the plaintiff for the sum of $22.60, interest from November 15, 1901." There was no evidence of lack of diligence. On the contrary, the evidence showed that, by the exercise of due diligence, the loss would not have been averted.

An assignment of error is predicated on the action of the court in giving the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that W. G. Hubbard was the collector of the plaintiff and had authority to collect as agent, and as such agent and collector accepted the check of the defendant, his act in so accepting the said check was the act of the plaintiffs." This, however, is a proper instruction. It was the duty of the agent to forward the check to his principal, and delivery to him was delivery to the principal; but it must have been contemplated that he would promptly forward it, and that the time allowed for presentment would be correspondingly extended. Rosenthal v. Ehrlicher, 154 Pa. 396, 26 Atl. 435; Bank of Grafton v. Buckannon Bank, 80 Md. 475, 31 Atl. 302, 27 L. R. A. 332; Balkwill v. Bridgeport, etc., Co., 62 Ill. App. 603; Gifford v. Hardell, 88 Wis. 538, 60 N. W. 1064, 43 Am. St. Rep. 925.

The rejection of the following offer of evidence is also complained of: "Here plaintiff offered to prove by witness (W. G. Hubbard) that he stated to S. B. Morgan (manager of defendant), and that Morgan knew, his regular course to be leaving Montgomery on Monday and go up on the C. & O. railroad and back on Friday evening on the same week to Charleston." In this no error was committed, for the materiality of the proposed evidence was not shown. If Morgan knew of this practice, it does not follow that he knew the agent habitually carried checks with him over this route, delivering them to his principal on Friday. Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. 575.

It is hardly necessary to say that, if a different state of evidence should appear on the new trial to be allowed, the rulings of the court will have to be varied so as to conform thereto. The law here declared is applicable only to the evidence in the trial which resulted in the judgment now under review.

For the reasons stated, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, a new trial allowed, and the case remanded.

1. TRUST—RESULTING TRUST.

One taking a deed for land knowing that another has a valid equitable title to the same land from the same vendor is held in equity as holding the legal title in trust for the benefit of the first purchaser, and equity will compel him to pass the legal title to such first purchaser.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by James Reel against William C. Reel and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Bent & Spears, for appellants. Talbott & Hoover, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. James Reel filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Randolph county against William C. Reel and Andrew Fansler, setting up that he was over 51 years of age, and until the winter of 1903 had lived with his father and mother on the farm; that his mother was dead, and one of two sisters was dead, and the other was the wife of Andrew Fansler; that the daughters, upon marriage, had left home, but he remained; that, when 21, he told his father that he was going away from home to earn money for himself; that his father told him that he was his only son, and, if he would remain at home with his father and mother and aid in supporting and caring for them, he would give all the lands he might own at his death to him, James Reel; that he and his father made a definite agreement to that effect, the father agreeing to convey the lands to him at his death; that in execution of the agreement he remained at home with his father and mother, and worked on the farm with his father, clearing land, cropping the land, building a house on it for the family, paying the taxes, and sometimes working elsewhere for wages, and devoting his earnings to the support of the family; that his father, in execution of said agreement, went to Amos Canfield, and had him to draw a deed conveying two tracts of land, one of 31½ acres, the other 56 acres, to said James Reel, and signed and acknowledged it; that his father brought the deed home, and informed the plaintiff that he had placed said deed in a chest or drawer, and told plaintiff to take it and have it recorded, but, as plaintiff seldom went to the county seat, he left the deed where his father had placed it; that afterwards, September 1, 1902, his father had conveyed to Andrew Fansler the same tracts in consideration of support and maintenance during life; that the deed was made and put on record, without the knowledge of the plaintiff; that Fansler was fully informed through years of the said agreement between William C. Reel and the plaintiff, and when he took the deed Fansler knew that William C. Reel had made the deed to the plaintiff, and had delivered it to him, though it had never been in the hands of the plaintiff or put on record; that Fansler had moved on the farm, driven plaintiff away, and was living on the farm with William C. Reel; that Fansler had fraudulently and corruptly induced William C. Reel to make the deed to him. The bill claims that the placing of the deed in the drawer was in law a delivery of it, and it sought to compel the defendants to surrender it to him, if in their possession, and, if not, to compel them to convey the land to the plaintiff, reserving a lien for the father's support; and, if that could not be done, that the lands be charged with $1,000 compensation for work and labor done and money spent by James Reel for his father, as a judgment for it would be unavailing against his father, as he was insolvent. William C. Reel and Fansler demurred to the bill for want of equity jurisdiction, and answered, denying that James Reel had supported him. William C. Reel admitted that for a short time prior to the year 1900 he did propose to make his son a deed for the land in consideration of support of himself and his wife, and that for a time James Reel agreed to the proposition, and it was a mutual understanding that such deed would be made; but the answer averred that finally the plaintiff refused to accept any such deed for the support and maintenance of his father and mother. The answer stated that James Reel simply lived at home, sharing in the product of the little farm along with other members of the family, until about the year 1900, when he (the father) did agree to convey to the son the land in consideration of such maintenance, but the son refused to consummate the agreement. The answer admits that on the 19th of January, 1900, William C. Reel did sign and acknowledge a deed whereby he intended to convey to his son the land, and that he informed his son that he had made the deed and offered it to him, and his son declined to accept it, and never did accept it, and authorized his father to convey the land to Fansler, and authorized him to make the deed to Fansler which he did make. Fansler admits that, when he took the deed for the land, he was aware of the existence of the said deed to James Reel; but that before the deed was made to him (Fansler) James Reel had declined to accept said deed, had declined to assume the obligation of supporting his father and mother, and that James Reel got possession of the said deed from his father to him, and delivered it to Fansler, and urged him to undertake the support of his father and mother, and after hesitation he (Fansler) agreed to do so, and accepted a deed for the land, which was executed with the full knowledge and consent of James Reel, and that he took possession under this deed, paid back taxes on the land, and ever since had been complying with his obligation to support William C. Reel. Fansler filed the said deed to James Reel from his father; it being in his possession. A decree in the case declared that the deed from William C. Reel to James Reel had been delivered to James Reel, and, the deed being filed in the papers, it was decreed that the legal title to the land was in James Reel, and gave him leave to withdraw said deed and place it on record. The deed to Fansler was canceled as in fraud of the right of James Reel. William C. Reel and Fansler appeal.

Equity jurisdiction is denied because, on the theory of the bill that the deed to James Reel was perfected by delivery, he could sue in ejectment, and, being out of possession, must sue at law, and not in equity, to remove a cloud; citing Smith v. O'Keefe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353. If we held that the deed to James Reel was consummated by delivery, we must needs decide the question whether one holding legal title out of possession can sue in equity to remove a cloud arising from a second deed by the same grantor, taken with knowledge of the first; but we are of the opinion said deed was not perfected by delivery, which is an indispensable element in the elementary definition of a deed. Therefore we have a suit in equity by one claiming to have first an oral contract for the conveyance of land by a father to a son on consideration of work and labor at home for the support of the father and his family, and then the contract evidenced by a deed executed in all respects, except by delivery, and the bill seeking enforcement of such contract as against the father, or the right to enforce involved in the suit as a necessary element and seeking to annul a deed accepted by another person from the same vendor for the same land, with notice of the right of him claiming under such contract, and seeking its cancellation, or to compel him to pass the legal title by deed. I suppose it would be immaterial whether a decree of relief be to enforce the contract by compelling a deed from the father and canceling the deed to Fansler, or compelling Fansler to pass the legal title to James Reel, the latter being the more usual mode of decree, simply treating him as holding title as a quasi trustee for James Reel. Surely this state of facts presents a case of equity jurisdiction of frequent occurrence. Equity follows the legal title into the hands of its fraudulent holder, and makes him hold that title as held in trust, and compels him to execute the trust by conveyance. Davis v. Settle, 43 W. Va. 17, 26 S. E. 557. He takes the shoes of the vendor, and equity will make him do what it would have made the vendor do. 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. § 346; 2 Pomeroy, Eq. (3d Ed.) § 591. It is a clear case of jurisdiction in equity. Though I think it contrary to the weight of authority, yet under Bowles v. Woodson, 6 Grat. (Va.) 78, and Parrill v. McKinley, 9 Grat. (Va.) 1, 58 Am. Dec. 212, the undelivered deed would be good as a memorandum to answer the demand of the statute of frauds that a contract for sale of land be in writing, and we would have to say whether the mere oral contract would be enough. For myself, I do not see why it is not just as requisite that the memorandum of the sale contract be delivered as that a deed be; and so, I think, say the authorities. But I concede that these cases eliminate the question of a writing. As we find that James Reel refused to accept the deed—repudiated it—it might be said that he would fall back on his oral contract. No; because refusing to support his father, renouncing the contract, authorizing Fansler to assume the burden of his father's support, and take a conveyance, would operate to repudiate also the oral contract, and estop James Reel from claiming against Fansler. I am, however, free to say that the oral agreement is not enforceable by specific performance, as it was not executed by a transfer of possession. There was no change as to possession. The contract was not to take effect by possession until the father's death. The father remained in possession. Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 556, 15 S. E. 87; Ratliff v. Sommers, 55 W. Va. 30, 46 S. E. 712. As the oral contract is not good, James Reel can have no right as against his father. Nor can he against Fansler, so far as that oral contract goes; for there was nothing in it, no vested right under it, with which to affect Fansler with notice. Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 32 W. Va. 134, 9 S. E. 61, 3 L. R. A. 826, 25 Am. St. Rep. 797.

A deciding question in the case is, was that deed delivered to James Reel? If so, it passed title, though not recorded, and Fansler having notice of it would take no title by his deed. On the other hand, if that deed was not delivered, James Reel got no title, and Fansler took good title. This turns on evidence, and we cannot—ought not—enter into details. The father seems to be an intelligent, plain country man, of 78 years. He swears that he talked several years of deeding the land to his son, and had a deed drawn and acknowledged, brought it home, and said: "Says I to Jim, 'Here is the deed,' and patted my hand on the deed, and says I, 'It is no account to you till you take it and get it recorded.' Says he, 'I don't want the deed'—swore he would'n't have it." He repeats several times that his son declined to accept the deed, and cursed and abused him for making it. He swears that his son told him to convey the land to Fansler. He adds: "Says I to Jim, 'If I make a deed to Fansler,' says I, 'If I do this now, the very first time you get out of humor you will swear that I have no right to make it to him, and it was against his orders, and you get the least bit mad you will be for killing me, and may be will do it.'" This is the old man's statement, reiterated in several forms during his examination. Fansler, Sallie Courtney, and Sarah Wood were present and heard the conversation, and pointedly confirm him. All four say he repeated at different times this refusal to accept the deed. All say that, when the father and Fansler were about to start to Elkins to have the deed to Fansler written, James delivered his deed to Fansler, and consented to his father conveying the land to Fansler, and that, when they returned in the evening with the deed, he was informed that the deed had been made to Fansler, and approved it. He waited 15 months before suing. It is argued that it is unreasonable to say that James Reel at the age of 51 would thus relinquish his life long home. Not so when we reflect that his father was an aged man, his power to labor gone, frail of body, somewhat fretful, and the son himself without means, coming to an age when his own power to labor was decreasing, he childless and wifeless. Who would perform the arduous housework which the assumption of this heavy burden of supporting his father, perhaps for many years in the feebleness of old age, would impose? Quite reasonable that James Reel would prefer that Fansler and his wife, the old man's daughter, should bear this heavy burden. James talked about going elsewhere. If he should do so, how could he take care of his father? As a matter of law, if the old man did deposit the deed in a chest, giving leave to James to take it, that would be clear delivery. If he retained power and dominion over it, it was not. Ward v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 1, 26 S. E. 542; Gaines v. Keener, 48 W. Va. 56, 35 S. E. 856; Adams v. Baker, 50 W. Va. 249, 40 S. E. 856. But in this case there was refusal to accept—a disaffirmance. It requires not only delivery by the grantor to make a deed, but acceptance by the grantee. No matter how distinct the offer or words of delivery on the grantor's part, if the deed is refused by the grantee, there is no deed. Guggenheimer v. Lockridge, 39 W. Va. 457, 19 S. E. 874. When a deed is for one's benefit, there is a presumption of acceptance; but why speak of that in the face of express rejection?

James Reel's version is different, but inconsistent and unreasonable. He says that, when his father brought his deed home, he did not tell him it was a deed, but said: "It was a little script of paper, and put it in the chest. I never seen it. He said to take it and put in the clerk's office. I can neither read nor write." How unreasonable! Is it probable his father would call it a "script" of paper? And is it reasonable that James Reel could believe it to be a script of paper, when his father told him to take it to the clerk's office? But his bill does not hint that his father called it a "script," as it pointedly says that his father got Canfield to write "a deed conveying to plaintiff the 31½ acres and 56 acres of land, and after the deed was written it was signed by William O. Reel, acknowledged, and said Reel brought the deed from the residence of said Canfield to the residence of said Reel, and when he came home he informed plaintiff that he had placed said deed in a chest and told plaintiff to take it and have it placed on record." Utterly inconsistent with his statement that he did not know it was a deed. He admits that Canfield told him that it was a deed for the land. He told Everett that his father had made him a deed. Also, he told Canfield that his father had so informed him. All this shows that he knew it was a deed. And he pointedly swears as to that paper that he did not accept it. The defense in volume and force of testimony has the better of the case greatly. Therefore the deed in question never took effect.

As to the claim for a lien on the land for work and labor, I know of no law to create it, and none is shown.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

WADE v. McDOUGLE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 20, 1906.)

1. EJECTMENT—RIGHT OF RECOVERY.

A plaintiff in ejectment must locate his own land and recover upon his own title, and the fact that the defendant's land does not cover the land in dispute or lie where the defendant claims it to lie, or that his title is not good, is immaterial and irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Ejectment, §§ 16-20.]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE—EVIDENCE—COMMISSIONER'S DEED.

A deed from a special commissioner purporting to be made under authority of a decree is admissible in evidence to give color of title for adverse possession, though such decree is not shown.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, §§ 445, 446.]

3. EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS OF THIRD PERSONS.

Statements by a person cutting timber on land or cultivating it, that he is so doing under authority of a certain person as owner, made while so doing, are admissible, when the question of possession by such owner is involved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 1111.]

4. EJECTMENT—JUDGMENT—EFFECT.

A verdict and judgment in ejectment, by which the plaintiff recovers land in fee, of their own force vest title in him, and take title from the defendant, if he had any.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Ejectment, § 379.]

5. SAME—ADJUDICATION AS TO BOUNDARY.

A verdict and judgment in ejectment fixing a line are final and conclusive between the parties and their privies in estate as to the location of such line.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Ejectment, § 379.]

6. SAME—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

A verdict and judgment in ejectment by which the plaintiff recovers the contested land destroy all title in the defendant at the date of the judgment. The defendant, by adverse possession beginning after judgment, may acquire title; but possession prior to the judgment cannot be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Ejectment, § 379.]

7. BOUNDARIES—AGREED LINE—VALIDITY OF AGREEMENT.

To make valid an oral agreement to fix a line between two contiguous tracts of land there must be doubt and uncertainty as to the true place of the line, else the agreement is void. Where there is, in fact, such doubt and uncertainty, such oral agreement, if at once carried into execution by actual possession, is valid without other consideration than the settlement of disputed boundary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, §§ 215-218.]

8. SAME—REQUISITES—TAKING POSSESSION.

A mutual express agreement between adjoining owners fixing their dividing line is of no force, unless actually executed immediately by taking possession actual up to it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, §§ 217-226.]

9. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT — OFFER — EFFECT.

A person is not bound by an admission in an offer to compromise not accepted by the other party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 745-753.]

10. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS AS TO TITLE—EFFECT.

Where legal title to land is vested in one, his mere oral disclaimer or admission of no title cannot divest his title. It binds him not.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Estoppel, §§ 173, 174.]

11. BOUNDARIES — ESTABLISHMENT BY ACQUIESCENCE.

To establish a line between adjoining owners, in absence of express agreement fixing it, by acquiescence and recognition, there must be possession actual up to it by the party claiming the benefit of the line, at least for a time prescribed by the statute of limitations, with acquiescence and recognition of such line by the other party, he knowing of such claim by his adversary.

12. ADVERSE POSSESSION — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Mere occasional grazing cattle or cutting timber or sod on land does not constitute adverse possession under the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, §§ 111-115.]

13. SAME—NECESSITY OF INCLOSURE.

Actual inclosure by fence is not indispensable for adverse possession under the statute of limitations. It is sufficient if the possession be marked or held by inclosure by fence, by cultivation, residence, clearing, or any plainly visible and notorious manifestation of sole, exclusive possession, according to the nature of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, §§ 99-104.]

14. SAME—ABSENCE OF COLOR OF TITLE.

Where there is no color of title, possession, for the purpose of adverse possession, is confined to the land in actual, open, notorious, exclusive occupation by inclosure by fence, residence, clearing, cultivation, or such other act, notorious and open, according to the nature of the case, telling the world of adverse possession under his own claim.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, § 77-81, 123-125.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County.

Action by C. A. Wade, as sheriff, against A. H. McDougale. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

H. P. Camden, for plaintiff in error. Merri-rick & Smith, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, P. Daniel R. Neal brought an action in ejectment in the circuit court of Wood county against A. H. McDougale counting in his declaration for a tract of 60 acres. A disclaimer was made by the defendant for all of the tract except a parcel of specified boundary containing about 15 acres. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff.

Defendant's first assignment of error is that the plaintiff was allowed to prove a survey, made under an order of survey in the case, of the land covered by defendant's deed. The plaintiff claimed that the deed under which the defendant claimed does not include the land in contest. The plaintiff introduced a deed for the 60 acres dated 1st February, 1867, from William Logan to Daniel R. Neal, under which the plaintiff claimed, but traced no title back to the state. On the strength of paper title, the plaintiff showed no title; for to recover on paper as per se giving superior title, it must trace back to the state, unless the title of the contestants comes from a common grantor. Ronk v. Higginbotham, 54 W. Va. 137, 46 S. E. 123. No show to recovery by the plaintiff on paper title was made in this case. The plaintiff did not even give evidence of the boundaries of the Logan deed to show that it covers the land in controversy. If the plaintiff showed no title in himself, what matters it where the land embraced within the defendant's deed lies? In ejectment, the plaintiff must, if he claims under paper title, locate his exterior boundary so as to show that his title takes in the disputed land. Miller v. Holt, 47 W. Va. 12, 34 S. E. 956. What matters it whether the defendant has title or not, if the plaintiff himself has no title? He must gain on the strength of his own title, not on the weakness of the defendant's title. Low v. Settle, 32 W. Va. 600, 9 S. E. 922. Thus, it would seem that this evidence of the defendant's location would be immaterial, and introduce a matter, and call on the defendant to meet it, not pertinent to the case, and calculated to hurt his defense before the jury. It could not locate the plaintiff's land, as he had no title to locate. If it is said that to locate the defendant's deed would locate the Logan deed, as the Logan deed calls for the "Neal and Stokely line," the reply is, the Logan deed is not surveyed, and the deed to Beckwith does not call for the line.

A second assignment of error is the admission of evidence of surveying a line between a tract owned by the city, known as the "city hospital ground," and a tract of Sarah Neal. I do not see what light this could throw on the case. It could add to the intricacy and difficulty of the case and confuse the jury. It was not relevant. Neither claimed under or derived title from the owners of those tracts. Their location would not settle the location of the claims of the plaintiff or defendant. The call in a deed to which the Lauch deed referred for the Neal line was not binding on the defendant; it was res alios acta.

A third assignment of error is that plaintiff gave evidence to prove that defendant's deed would not reach the disputed land is well taken under principles stated above, that the plaintiff must show that his own right covered the land. And mere call for distance is not material when a fixed line is called for.

A fourth assignment of error is the admission of a deed from Taylor, commissioner, to Sanders; no authority to make it being shown, and no connection being shown between the title of one Davis, whose title the deed purports to convey, and the plaintiff. As passing title, it was not admissible; but the plaintiff, after giving that deed in evidence, gave in evidence a deed from said Sanders to William Logan, and a deed from Logan to the plaintiff. As color of title for adverse possession, I see no objection to the deed. Mullan's Adm'r v. Carper, 37 W. Va. 215, 16 S. E. 527.

A fifth assignment of error is the admission in evidence of a deed from Sanders to Logan. It is admissible for color of title in connection with the deed from Logan to plaintiff. It is said the descriptions in the two deeds vary. If it were plain that they relate to different land, this would be a good objection; but that seems to me to be a question of identity as a fact for the jury, that is whether it could give any color as to the land in contest. The fact that no surveying was done to show the location of the land described in the deed only went to make it weak as affording color of title for the land.

The sixth assignment of error is the admission in evidence of a deed from Lauck and Logan to Logan and Leach. It is not claimed that the plaintiff claimed the land in this deed, or had any privity with it, or that it bounded on the land conveyed to him by Logan. It was in no sense in controversy. It was irrelevant, producing confusion before the jury. The argument for it is that Logan's deed to the plaintiff refers to this deed, and this deed calls for the Neal and Stokely line. What if it does? Is it used to locate that line? It cannot do so. It is a declaration by its parties that that line was there; but does their declaration or assertion bind the defendant? No surveying of its bounds proves that declaration true.

The seventh assignment of error is in the admission in evidence of a deed from Logan and Leach to Parkersburg. What has been said under the sixth assignment here applies.

The eighth assignment of error is the admission in evidence of a decree of partition and plat of lands of Bradford's estate. They were transactions between strangers to this suit, not involving the land in dispute. It is claimed that these papers are admissible, as Beckwith's deed, under which defendant claims, calls for this Bradford land. That would tend to locate the land of defendant; but the plaintiff is suing, and must show where his land is, no matter where may be the defendant's. Possibly, if the plaintiff had had his tract under the deed from Logan to him surveyed and proven, his right to go to a line the same as the line of Bradford, the call in Beckwith's deed might be an admission of the location of Beckwith's line; this is doubtful, because the defendant was not a party to the partition so as to give it force to establish the true place of the Bradford line. Surely, the action of parties to the partition of the Bradford land could not fix its bounds so as to bind Beckwith to a particular line as being the true place of that line called for in his deed. It is res inter alios acta. Action of one party does not bind strangers. But this Bradford land was not surveyed, but laid down by protraction.

Where are its lines on the ground? I do not see that the Bradford land can locate the defendant's land. Would that show that the defendant's land is in a particular place? It is an effort, by the partition of other people's land, not in controversy here, to show that the defendant does not own the land in controversy without showing that the plaintiff owns it. This partition has no connection with this suit.

The ninth assignment of error is the admission in evidence of a deed from Phelps to Bradford. What does it show shedding light on this case? It is between strangers to it. Can their acts locate the land involved? No survey of the land mentioned in that deed gave it local habitation, as may be also said of other papers admitted, even of the deed of Logan to the plaintiff. It does not purport to and could not locate the plaintiff's boundary. Not every paper can be introduced in ejectment. Irrelevant ones cannot be.

The tenth assignment of error is that witness McConnell was allowed for the plaintiff to prove that Crummitt and Leary, whom he saw cutting timber and sod and cultivating, told him they were doing so under Neal. They were on the ground when so stating. Declarations of one in possession explanatory of the character of his possession—that is, how he claimed, under whom—are admissible. They are part of the act of possession, part of res gestæ. Cannot a tenant admit that he holds under a certain person? High's Heirs v. Pancake, 42 W. Va. 602, 26 S. E. 536; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 688-690; note to Marcy v. Stone (Mass.) 54 Am. Dec. 741; Leger v. Doyle (S. C.) 70 Am. Dec. 240.

The eleventh assignment of error involves principles important in the case. It is the giving of an instruction to the effect that, if Logan, at the date of his deed to the plaintiff Neal, February 1, 1867, had been prior to that date, and claiming under the deed from Sanders to Logan, in actual possession for 10 years of any part of the land in controversy in this suit, and the deed to Neal included the land in controversy, and the defendant during said period did not have actual possession of any portion of the land in controversy, then Logan acquired a good title to the land in controversy and by his deed conveyed the same to Neal. Conceding, as the plaintiff must, and practically does, that he showed no title by documents, his claim is that his title became perfect under the statute of limitations. Let us suppose that Logan had, and by his deed conveyed to Neal, good title so acquired. As will appear from the report of the case of Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 103, in 1871, Beckwith brought an ejectment against Thompson and others to recover a tract of land of 225 acres, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for Beckwith, affirmed by this court 14th May, 1881. It was claimed in that suit by its defendants that the two surveys, below mentioned, did not adjoin on their first two lines; but that there was vacant land between them, which was patented and claimed by defendants. Thus the case involved that question, and if adjoining, the question, where is the Neal-Stokely line? Beckwith, the plaintiff in that suit, is the same person whose title vested in McDougle, as executor with his will annexed, defendant in the present suit; and Neal, a defendant in that former suit, is the same person, who was plaintiff in this suit, and whose title vested in Wade, as executor with his will annexed, the plaintiff by revival in the present suit. Neal claimed derivatively under a grant from Virginia to James Neal, dating 14th September, 1785, for 400 acres, beginning at a sugar tree standing on the bank of the Ohio, and running S. 24° E. 117 perches and S. 39° W. 243 perches. Beckwith claimed derivatively under a grant from Virginia for 1,200 acres, dating 9th May, 1804, to John Stokely, "beginning at a sugar tree, corner to James Neal's survey, a small distance from the mouth of the Little Kanawha river, and on the bank of the Ohio river, running thence with two of his lines, South 24° E. 117 poles to a white oak; S. 39° W. 243 poles to a black oak," etc. The controversy in the present case is as to land on the second line dividing these adjoining old surveys. The jury in the former case fixed both lines. It ran them from C to D and from D to E on the plat of surveyor, Farrow, made under an order or survey in that case, and used on its trial. Where is that line D, E? Wherever it is, it is a finality to fix that line between Neal and Beckwith, and those claiming under them, binding on the parties to this case. Neal claims that it was fixed wrong in that case. Whether it was fixed wrong or right by that jury, and the circuit court and Supreme Court, is now no difference, as it has passed into final judgment and must give peace. No matter whether Beckwith's deed really covered the land or not. The judgment is his deed. That verdict and judgment operated to vest title in Beckwith as against Neal up to that line just as effectually as if Neal had conveyed or released the land to Beckwith to that line. If Logan had in anywise, by deed or by limitation, acquired title, at the date of his deed to Neal, beyond that line, and passed it to Neal by that deed, that title was lost to Neal by force of that verdict and judgment. It needs no authority for this old proposition of the law of finality of verdicts carried into judgment. Code 1899, c. 90, § 35, gives a judgment in ejectment such effect. Otherwise, what is the use of a suit, verdict, and judgment? But the instruction in hand says that possession would give title to Logan, and he passed it to Neal, leaving the inference that Neal thus got legal title, and still held it, regardless of the effect of the subsequent verdict and judgment. The instruction forgets that element of the case. Any title existing before in Logan or Neal was gone, and immaterial in the present case. It is useless to discuss whether there was such possession anterior to Logan's deed as to give him title. After that judgment, Neal must get a new title by possession, or otherwise, for land on the Beckwith side of the line fixed by the jury. He has no title by conveyance, as none appears. He must, then, get it by new possession; a new title by possession after judgment in the former suit. The finality of said trial is another reason why it was error to allow evidence of a survey of the land in the deed from Stokely to Beckwith. The verdict located that deed; the verdict is the deed; its boundaries are the only test without the deed. Where are they? What land does the verdict give Beckwith? These are the questions. The plaintiff's declaration calls for bounding his claim on the Stokely-Neal line. That line is where the verdict laid it down on the ground. I would say not where the deed placed it, if I could say that the verdict differed as to its place from the deed, as I do not say. Such is the force of the verdict and judgment in the old suit.

I do not think this oblivion in this instruction of the judgment is cured by the instruction spoken of under the next assignment of error, which puts recovery by Beckwith from Neal in as an element of its hypothesis. This instruction is so strong in stating that Logan acquired title by possession before he conveyed to Neal, that it was calculated to confuse the jury, and inspire belief that such title was still in Neal, and it would not be going very far to say that they conveyed inconsistent impressions. How any jury could avoid confusion amid so many instructions as were involved in the case, we cannot realize. Hence the need of clearness. This instruction, I repeat, is faulty in not incorporating the former judgment in its hypothesis. If that judgment covered the land in contest, Logan's or Neal's title before its date was utterly immaterial, and foreign to the case. If that verdict fixed the line as the Beckwith side claims, it is immaterial whether he had possession before it or not of his tract. Defendant's counsel says that the uncontradicted testimony shows that the old verdict found for Beckwith the land in controversy, and for this reason the instruction was improper. Just where the line fixed by the verdict is is a question of fact, on which we cannot properly express an opinion, in view of a new trial. We say, however, that if the verdict in the former case gave the land to Beckwith, that is an end to Neal's claim to its date.

The twelfth assignment of error is an instruction that if good title was conveyed to the land in controversy by Logan's deed to Neal, the jury should find for the plaintiff, unless Beckwith thereafter, in a court of proper jurisdiction, recovered the land from Neal, and if such recovery was shown, the plaintiff could prove title to himself acquired after such recovery by adverse possession "under color or claim of title other than that adjudicated in such suit, or otherwise." It is not easy to say what the instruction means. The deed from Logan to Neal was in evidence in this case. It was not in the Beckwith-Thompson action. This instruction would say that that suit did not affect Neal's title under the Logan deed, because not adjudicated. This would leave that deed to have force notwithstanding the former suit. So the jury might say. But that is not correct. That judgment wiped away all title of Neal acquired under his deed from Logan. The instruction says that Neal could acquire title by possession "or otherwise." How otherwise? Under the evidence there is no appearance of claim except under the Logan deed or possession. It seems indefinite and misleading. And plaintiff could not go beyond the Neal-Stokely line, as his declaration only claims to it.

The thirteenth assignment of error is that the court instructed that if Beckwith by said former suit recovered of Neal land adjoining the land described in the deed from Logan to Neal, 1st February, 1867, and after such recovery Beckwith had the lines between his lands so recovered and the land of Neal "run and established as now claimed by the plaintiff, and recognized and treated such line as the line between the said line of Beckwith and Neal, acquiesced therein thereafter, and for 10 years prior to the institution of this suit, said Neal had actual adverse possession of the land in controversy, claiming to the line so run, and established by said Beckwith, then the jury should find for the plaintiff." This instruction, after conceding recovery by Beckwith in the former suit, whereby clear title would vest in him, and which would give certainty and remove all doubt as to the line, says that mere agreement, acquiescence by Beckwith and possession by Neal would pass and transfer Beckwith's title fresh from victory.

The law says that it takes a deed to pass land. If it is to be done by agreement on a line, there must be doubt and uncertainty as to the true line. Here, there was no doubt, no uncertainty. The old suit removed uncertainty and doubt. Doubt and uncertainty constitute the consideration for the agreement to stand on. Le Comte v. Freshwater, 56 W. Va. 336, 49 S. E. 238; 5 Cyc. 932; Turner v. Baker (Mo.) 27 Am. Rep. 226. Therefore, such agreement, if proven, would be void. And there must be controversy; and the agreement made as a compromise. These elements are omitted in the instruction. This instruction confuses right by mutual agreement upon a line, and right by adverse possession, two different things; as the one is friendly, growing out of agreement, and the other a hostile relation, unconnected with agreement. Whilst such agreement must be executed at once by actual possession to the line, 10 years' occupancy is not required—only time enough to show intent. Turner v. Baker (Mo.) 27 Am. Rep. 235. Without such agreement, Neal could get title by adverse possession, if proven, and of a character to be adverse possession, and of sufficient continuous duration. Perhaps the defendant could not complain of this confusion. This instruction is, however, intended to say that such an agreement would do away with the effect of said verdict and judgment. It would not, if fully proven, for want of doubt and uncertainty as to the line. The decisions say that the only reason why such agreement can hold as not violating the statute of frauds is, that it does not originate or create a line, but simply ascertains its place amid doubt and uncertainty. But it was fixed free from doubt and uncertainty, in the eye of the law, by that verdict and judgment. And to make such agreement binding, it must be definitely agreed, and very clearly proven.

The evidence of Stout, the surveyor on whose survey the alleged agreed boundary line rests chiefly, says, without any evidence to contradict his statement, that he did run a line at Beckwith's request, and that Beckwith indicated to Paul Neal, son of Daniel R. Neal, the latter not there, his willingness to agree to the line, and they went to Parkersburg to execute an agreement, but Neal declined to execute the agreement; Paul saying they had changed their minds since they were on the ground the day before, and Beckwith declared that "they will never get me to agree to that again." Here is no consummated agreement—a mere disposition to compromise. This was not 10 years before suit. And Beckwith's executor went on the land in 1904, claiming it, recognizing no such agreement. "A party is not bound by any admission in an offer tending to a compromise, which was not accepted." Williams v. Price, 5 Munf. (Va.) 507. On this unconsummated agreement, an instruction giving it full force was based.

It is said that Beckwith in surveying stopped short of the line claimed by his administrator in this suit. This was because distance gave out; but perhaps he did not know that calls for an ascertainable line or marked corner take precedence over mere distance. Beckwith never admitted that this line was the true Neal-Stokely line. Suppose he had; suppose he had even admitted that he did not own the disputed land. It would not take away his title or estop him from afterwards claiming it. When the statute of frauds requires a deed to pass title, it would be absurd to say that an unaccepted proposal for compromise, or mere knowledge that one is cutting timber or sod on one's land, or claiming it, and he remains silent, or does not sue, or even concedes by words the right of his adversary, his title is gone. The law denies this. He may have done so for mere peace, and freedom from annoyance. 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1061. It is well settled that the true owner may change his mind, and assert his right. It is no estoppel. What pay does the party get for his land? It is not proven that Beckwith ever induced Neal to act on his conduct, or change his condition, or spend money in faith of it. If Neal chose to act on it—and what loss did he incur by it or outlay did he make?—it was his own risk. And had he not the same means of knowing where the jury had fixed the line as Beckwith. By no such oral admissions or conduct, as shown in this case, can a man lose his title on ground of estoppel, or otherwise. Suttle v. Railroad, 76 Va. 284. In High's Heirs v. Pancake, 42 W. Va. 607, 26 S. E. 537, we said: "Mere oral declarations to destroy title are inadmissible, because parol disclaimers cannot affect a vested title in the face of the statute of frauds." The authorities there cited, and 3 Cyc. 725, 784, show this. And to make an agreed boundary, if not written, there must not only be a finished agreement, but it must be carried into execution by the parties by full actual possession to the line. Gwynn v. Schwartz, 32 W. Va. 487, 9 S. E. 880. And as the declaration in this case only claims to the Neal-Stokely line, the plaintiff can go no farther, even if there had been a valid agreement to fix a line.

The fourteenth assignment of error is that the court instructed that if, after judgment in said action of Beckwith v. Thompson, Neal was in actual possession by residence, inclosure, clearing, pasturing, sodding, or cultivation of the land in controversy up to a line marked on the new plat, in this action under claim of title other than that adjudicated in said suit, the jury must find for the defendant. We do not say whether the evidence proves possession under Neal. There is great question whether any foot of the land in controversy was in such occupation by residence, inclosure, cultivation, or clearing, as to give title by limitation. We do not decide in view of a new trial.* I make such remark for this reason: The plaintiff gave evidence of occasional acts of cutting sod and timber and pasturing cows. Now, as cutting sod, and pasturing cows which wandered from the Beckwith tract across the line for want of a fence were in evidence, the jury might have concluded that such pasturing, cutting sod and timber, in and of themselves, were adverse possession; whereas they are not. Turpin v. Saunders, 32 Grat. (Va.) 27. When there is otherwise actual occupation, they may go along helping to show actual possession. The defendant claimed that there was no residence on this land, no clearing, no continuous inclosure, and that such inclosure as there was went down, the rails carried away and burnt, and the inclosure lost. In view of this the instruction should have mentioned the occasional pasturage of cows, cutting sod and timber only in connection with other acts, residence, and inclosure, not as of themselves constituting adverse possession. They are mentioned in the disjunctive; the instruction is that each of those occasional acts makes such possession. This is not the case. They do not shut out the owner. Mere claim of title and occasional act of trespass will not make adverse possession. They want continuity. Wilson v. Braden, 56 W. Va. 372, 49 S. E. 409; Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 34. Instructions should be clear as applied to the evidence and claims in the case, not such as may mislead. Parkersburg Indus. Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255.

The sixteenth assignment of error is that the court refused to give defendant an instruction that if the verdict and judgment in the former action gave Beckwith the land in controversy, they were conclusive against the plaintiff. The court gave it, but with a modification, "unless the jury believe that the plaintiff is entitled to recovery under other and different title, and right under color or claim of title, as hereinbefore set forth in instructions for plaintiff." I think the instruction, as offered, was objectionable, in not saying, unless Neal had, by possession since the judgment, got title; but how as to the modification? What are "the other and different title or rights under color or claim of title" on which plaintiff could recover? They are those specified in other instructions. Could a jury grope amid a maze of complicated instructions to get specification of such title or right? Is the Logan deed relied on for color? Where does it go? Surveying did not define it, and therefore possession of part under it would not be possession of the whole. As color is stopped at the old line, as settled by the verdict, the declaration stops there also. Does it refer to right acquired by limitation? It imports possession giving right to the whole; whereas the evidence of adverse possession, if any, presents the question of possession of part or all. I think the modification was vague and obscure.

The seventeenth assignment of error is the refusal of an instruction that, if the verdict in the former action fixed the line D, E, as the Neal-Stokely line, then that line defined the extent of the boundary specified in the plaintiff's deed, and it did not constitute afterwards color of title to any land, beyond said line, and that possession, thereafter, by plaintiff beyond said line, would be adverse only to the extent of an actual and exclusive inclosure, and would not give plaintiff adverse possession to any land beyond that line "outside of his actual inclosure." The court changed the word, "Inclosure," to "possession," and, as thus modified, gave the instruction. Here it is proper to repeat that plaintiff showed no paper title; and, further, that his deed from Logan, as mere color of title for adverse possession, could not go over the line fixed by the verdict, because it fixed the Neal and Stokely line, and the deed is limited to it, does not pretend to go over it, and the declaration does not. No color of title, therefore, appears beyond that line, and hence any possession by Neal over it must be confined to actual occupation. Now, what could the substitution of the word "possession" for "Inclosure" mean? There was evidence of occasional cutting sod and timber and pasturing cows wandering across the line for want of a fence, and of a poor fence standing a short time on a line, then destroyed by persons carrying off and burning the rails, leaving only a line of posts, as proven by plaintiff's witnesses. Perhaps it would mislead under the circumstances developed by the evidence, would be the argument against the modification. As stated above, those things do not, in law, constitute "actual possession" under the statute. There was evidence claimed by the plaintiff to show cultivation of a field of three acres. It was a question whether it was on the land in dispute. That was not defined in bounds by plat or definite evidence, yet the recovery was of all the land. Even if it had been defined, and possession of it had been sufficient to hold it, this would give no right under the statute beyond its limit. But that evidence, on the theory that if there be any evidence tending to show the facts of an instruction justifies it, probably makes the instruction too narrow. It is true that many cases do say that where there is no color of title, but only claim, possession does not go beyond inclosure. Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 238; Parkersburg Indus. Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255; Va. Midland R. Co. v. Barbour, 97 Va. 118, 33 S. E. 554. But others use broader language. Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 238, Syl., point 239. Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 34, uses the words actual possession "by enclosing it under fence, or by clearing it, or in some other visible or notorious manner." Ewing v. Burnet, 11

Pet. 41, 9 L. Ed. 624; Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. 412, 9 L. Ed. 475; Tyler on Eject 892. See Swann v. Young, 36 W. Va. 57, 14 S. E. 426, and 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 847. Fencing is not necessary if there is cultivation or other sufficient act. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 827, 828. I think that if one cultivate a field for the period, with claim, it is enough. The word substituted is "possession," making the instruction read "actual possession." Various things make actual possession, and it may be said this change does not clarify, but is bad, because it does not define what makes it. It has a meaning, however. If the instruction had gone on to define it, and defined it wrong, it would be error; but I cannot say that the change merely is error. A party has right to an instruction, if good, in his own words; but I think the word "Inclosure" made the instruction too narrow, under the theories presented by the case, and I do not see that the change is bad. But it is proper to say that this instruction cannot be applied to make occasional cutting of sod or timber, pasturing cows, or a fence once built, but suffered to go to decay, or destroyed by persons stealing and burning its rails, leaving nothing but a line of posts, thus breaking the continuity of possession, sufficient to show adverse possession. Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 34, 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 827, 828; 1 Cyc. 990. I remark that where the word "Inclosure" was used in the Parkersburg Industrial Case, we were discussing the efficiency of the fence as an inclosure. And it is prudent to say, lest this instruction mislead on another trial, that the plaintiff shows no paper title; and further that his deed from Logan, as mere color of title for adverse possession, could not go over the line fixed by the verdict, because that fixed the Neal-Stokely line, and Logan's deed is limited to that line, and also the declaration in the present case claims to go no farther. No color of title appearing beyond that line, Neal could go no further than actual occupation by inclosure, cultivation, residence, clearing, or other open, notorious manifestation of hostile possession, according to the nature of the case. It could not go to the extent of the controverted land, though Neal claimed it all. Heavner v. Morgan, 41 W. Va. 428, 23 S. E. 874. The rule that possession of part is possession of the whole does not apply where there is no color, but only claim of title. There is no whole in such case, as there is no writing to call for or bound such whole.

The eighteenth assignment of error is refusal of an instruction of defendant that Beckwith's possession of any part of the land within the boundary defined in the verdict map would, after the affirmance of the judgment in the former action, give Beckwith possession of the whole up to the limits of said boundary, "except such parts thereof as may have been in the actual adverse possession of the plaintiff by inclosure sufficient to exclude Beckwith therefrom." The court struck out the words "by an inclosure," and inserted before the word "possession" the words "right of." Here the old rule of possession of part is possession of the whole applies. If Beckwith had possession of any part of the land he recovered, he had possession of all; not mere dry right of possession, because that judgment gave him title to what he recovered. Indeed, if he had possession anywhere in his tract, his recovery would give him possession of all the land recovered as part of his tract. Where is the use of inserting the words, so as to say he had no possession, but only right of possession?

The nineteenth assignment of error is the refusal of an instruction. The court struck out "inclosure," substituted "possession," so it read "actual possession." As stated above, we see no error in this. It is above discussed.

The twentieth assignment of error is the refusal of an instruction asked by defendant, that to justify the jury in inferring an oral agreement establishing an agreed line, in absence of evidence of an actual oral agreement, there must be clear evidence of acquiescence by the parties against whom it is claimed in the actual possession for 10 years up to the well-defined line, and in the continuous cultivation by the adjoining landowner for 10 years up to the line, if the land is capable of cultivation, or, if in woods, by the adjoining owner, who established such line, with knowledge of the owner against whom it is claimed, always clearing up to the line, and with his knowledge, cutting timber, and permitting other acts of visible ownership for 10 years up to such line, and that the period of 10 years must have a definite beginning, and such acts must be continuous and uninterrupted for 10 years. This instruction does not refer to a line made by express agreement, but to a line claimed to be established by acquiescence. A man's land is to be lost to him by mere silence, indisposition to sue, neglect! The statute of limitations demands 10 years of hostile, open, notorious, continuous, exclusive possession, with claim of title. Why should the rule be otherwise, where silence is to take away title? Should mere acquiescence convey title in less time or with less essentials than the statute? It is said that by this instruction the party is put to the burden of proving beginning of possession. Why not? He has to do so under the statute of limitations. The authorities show that this instruction ought to have been given. It was peculiarly proper to present the defendant's theory under evidence relied on by the plaintiff for acquiescence. To make a binding line by acquiescence, it must be for the statutory period. 4 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 863, Gwynn v. Schwartz, 32 W. Va. 487, 9 S. E. 880, and 5 Cyc. 942, will sustain this view. See Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 285. I fail to discern any line of difference between acquisition by one man of another's land by what is called "practical location"; that is, by acquiescence, and acquisition by adverse possession by the statute of limitations. The line of difference is shadowy. There must be in both possession for the statutory period with certain beginning. That must be actual. Can it be by signs less signal than the statute requires? Must not this claim of line by acquiescence come up to the measure demanded by the statute of limitations?

The twenty-first assignment of error is the rejection of evidence of Bailey, tending to prove possession of Beckwith of his tract. It is stated that he was "understood" to be a grandson of Beckwith. It was not shown that his mother was dead. He might never be interested in his grandfather's estate. He was only heir apparent. Nemo est hæres viventis. And his evidence did not prove a personal transaction between him and his grandfather, even if that would exclude. But he was not giving evidence against Neal's administrator of a personal transaction with Neal. Why not competent?

McADEN v. PALMER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

LIMITATIONS—EQUITABLE ACTIONS.

Where plaintiff claims land under a grant registered in 1894, and defendant under an earlier entry and grant registered in 1896, and shows no possession and no disability, his claim of equity to have plaintiff declared trustee of the legal title for him is barred by Code, § 158, providing that an action for relief, not otherwise provided for, must be commenced within 10 years after the cause of action accrues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cherokee County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by J. H. McAden, trustee, against John Palmer and others for damages for cutting timber on certain land claimed by the plaintiff. The jury found that defendants Barnes, Williams, and Van Roden had wrongfully trespassed, and assessed the damages at $261.72, and from the judgment rendered defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. B. Norvell, for appellants. Dillard & Bell, for appellee.

BROWN, J. 1. The principal question appearing upon the record, which it is necessary for us to consider, is that presented by the eighth issue: "Is the defendant's claim of equity to have the plaintiff declared trustee of the legal title for them barred by the statute of limitations?" The defendants claim the locus in quo under an entry laid by one John P. Puett November 3, 1854. The survey was made on February 22, 1855, and the entry price paid on or before September 9, 1858. John Puett transferred his entry to D. S. Puett, who, on December 21, 1896, obtained a grant and registered it. The plaintiff claims under entries by J. R. Dyck, laid in April and May, 1859, surveyed May 27, 1859, grant issued November, 1867, and registered June 6, 1884.

This action was commenced December 6, 1902. We think the defendants barred, under section 158 of the Code, which provides that an action for relief, not otherwise provided for, must be commenced within 10 years after the cause of action accrues. The learned counsel for the defendants, Mr. Norvell, admitted in his able argument that Ritchie v. Fowler, 132 N. C. 790, 44 S. E. 616, is a direct authority against him, and we are unable ourselves to distinguish between the cases. Under that authority these defendants' cause of action accrued June 6, 1884, when the grant issued upon the Dyck entries was registered. In that case the present Chief Justice, speaking for the court, says: "The registration of the Herrin grants in 1872 was constructive notice to the plaintiff and those under whom he claims, and, in the absence of evidence showing that the statute did not run by reason of coverture, infancy, etc., the plaintiff is barred by failure to take this action within 10 years from October, 1872. Code § 158." Puett perfected his equity and right to call for the grant by paying to the state the purchase money in 1858, but he and his assignee, D. S. Puett, waited until 1896 before calling for the grant. During these 38 years there is no evidence of any possession upon the part of the defendants or of those under whom they claim. In fact there is no evidence of possession until about 1902, when the defendants Barnes, Williams, and Van Roden entered and cut timber upon the land.

Section 158 of the Code is so broad and comprehensive in its terms that it covers all causes of action, equitable or legal, not otherwise provided for. It bars the assertion of an equity, as well as any other cause of action, unless there are circumstances which take the case out of the statute. The grant, registered in 1884, vested the legal title in the grantee. Registration has been held heretofore by this court to be constructive notice to all the world that the grantee claimed the land as his own. Ritchie v. Fowler, supra. "The legal title vesting in the first grantee drew the constructive possession which continued until there was an ouster." Janney v. Blackwell, 138 N. C. 442, 50 S. E. 857. The attempted ouster did not take place until 1902 (as we gather from the meagerly reported evidence), 18 years from the registration of the plaintiff's grant. During this period the plaintiff was exposed to an action by Puett and his assignees, and could have been converted into a trustee for their benefit, had they not slept on their rights. The kind of trust which the defendants seek to impress upon the legal title to the land in the plaintiff is not an express trust created by the language of the parties, the terms of which were agreed to and assumed voluntarily. It is in the nature of an implied trust, and requires the affirmative action of a court of equity to give it vitality. Bispham, Eq. pp. 99, 125. Independently of statutes of limitation, courts of equity uniformly decline to assist a person who has slept on his rights and shows no excuse for his delay in asserting them. "Laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and, therefore, from the beginning of this jurisdiction there was always a limitation to suits in this court." Smith v. Clay, 3 Bro. Ch. 640; Spedel v. Henric, 120 U. S. 387, 7 Sup. Ct. 610, 30 L. Ed. 718. We note this to show that the time within which an equity will be enforced has always been subject to a limitation, independent of acts of legislation. "That one may preclude himself by his laches from asserting a right which otherwise a court would help him enforce, there are abundant authorities to show; but to do so in any case there must be something on his part which looks like an abandonment of the right, or an acquiescence in its enjoyment by another. Inconsistent with his own claim. We have searched in vain for a single instance in which the court has withheld its aid in the enforcement of an equity on the ground of the lapse of time, when the party seeking it has himself been in the continued possession of the estate to which that equity was incident."

If the defendants had shown possession of this land, or such acts of ownership as indicates and establishes possession, their delay in suing would not have precluded them, even now, from seeking the aid of the court in converting the plaintiff into a trustee for their benefit; but, as they show no such possession, they have slept on their rights too long. There being no suggestion of coverture or infancy or other disability, and no possession, we can discover no reason why section 158 should not apply to the defendants' cause of action, although equitable in its nature, as well as any other. As between the state and himself, having paid the purchase price, Puett could call for a grant at any time. The lapse of time would not hurt him. Gilchrist v. Middleton, 107 N. C. 678, 12 S. E. 85. But as between himself and the state's grantee for value he must assert his equity within the time fixed by the statute, or lose it. It is suggested in the defendants' brief that the decision in Ritchie v. Fowler, supra, will unsettle "fully one-third to one-half the land title in western North Carolina." While we regret this, we are not responsible for the acts of the lawmaking power. Statutes of limitation are statutes of repose, and intended for the prevention of litigation and the security of titles. They are subject to the authority and wisdom of the General Assembly.

2. It is stated in the defendant's brief that "the court erred in admitting the evidence of Hays and Keener, relative to locating any of these lands." The brief does not point out the particulars in which his honor is alleged to have erred, nevertheless we have examined the evidence and fail to discover any error upon the question of location of the plaintiff's grants. In the language of their counsel's brief, "upon the question of location, the judge followed the law as laid down by a long line of time-honored precedents."

Affirmed.

FRAZIER v. GIBSON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS — ENTRY ON CHEROKEE LANDS—FORFEITURE.

Under Code, c. 11, §§ 2466, 2356, providing that persons entering the Cherokee lands shall file their bonds with the entry taker, payable to the state in four equal annual installments, which, when paid, shall be in full of the purchase money, and the Secretary of the State shall issue a grant, and declaring that, on failure to pay the whole when due, if the money cannot be collected by judgment on the bond, the land shall revert to the state, where bonds were filed by an enterer on Cherokee lands in February, 1880, and payment made in December, 1884, the failure to make full payment in four years did not work a forfeiture of the entry, so as to impress the legal title, which rested with the grant, with a trust for the benefit of a junior enterer, who paid the purchase money in 1883 and took grants for the land.

2. SAME—JUNIOR ENTERER—TRUSTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action by a junior enterer to have defendants declared to hold the legal title to land in trust for him, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the senior entry was invalid for indefiniteness.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Where the grant under which defendant claimed land was issued and recorded in 1883, plaintiff's action in 1903 to have the defendants declared to hold the legal title impressed with a trust was barred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Swain County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by W. W. Frazier against Franklin Gibson and others to have defendants declared to hold the legal title to certain land in trust. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fry & Rowe, for appellant. Bryson & Black, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. This action was disposed of by his honor below upon a demurrer ore tenus to the complaint, which disclosed the following facts: On December 11, 1879, defendant J. D. S. McMahan entered in the office of the entry taker of Swain county 640 acres of land on the waters of Ocona Luffy river in said county; said entry being No. 826. He filed his bonds for the purchase money on the 20th day of February, 1880, and paid same on the 1st day of December, 1884, obtaining grant numbered 7,294 on August 17, 1885. On March 15, 1880, one S. Everett, without notice of the McMahan entry, entered in the entry taker's office of said county eight tracts of 640 acres each, and filed his bonds for same, as required by law. A portion of such entries cover the entry made by McMahan as aforesaid. Said Everett assigned said entries to one D. Lester, who paid the purchase money on June 27, 1883, and took grants for said lands on November 4, 1891; a portion of said grants covering the aforesaid McMahan entry and grant. The defendants, Gibson and others, claim the land entered by McMahan by virtue of conveyances therefor. The plaintiff is the owner of such right and title as Lester obtained under the grant issued to him, No. 7,294. Defendant Frank Gibson is in the possession of said land. That said land is located in that portion of the state to which the statute in regard to the Cherokee lands applies. Plaintiff demanded judgment that the defendants be declared to hold the legal title to said land in trust, and that they be decreed to convey the same to him. Defendants, among other defenses, pleaded the statute of limitations. When the cause came on for trial, defendants relied upon the statute of limitations as a bar to the plaintiff's action and further demurred ore tenus to the complaint for that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that he was not entitled to the relief prayed for. The court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the action, from which plaintiff appealed.

The defendants claim title under a senior grant, issued upon a senior entry, by which they have a perfect title from the state, unless, for the reason assigned by plaintiff, the entry made by McMahan had lapsed at the date of the grant issued thereon. He contends that by McMahan's failure to file the bonds at the time of making the entry, and paying them within four years thereafter, the entry, with such rights as accrued therefrom, was forfeited. It will be noted that the entry was made on December 11, 1879, the bonds filed February 20, 1880, and paid December 1, 1884. If, as contended by the plaintiff, the bonds should have been filed within four years from that date, then more than that period elapsed before their payment. If, as contended by defendants, the enterer had three months within which to file them, the same result in respect to time follows, it is therefore immaterial which view we take of that question. The question is therefore fairly presented whether the failure to make full payment within four years from either date works a forfeiture of the entry, so that the legal title which vested by the grant is impressed with a trust for the benefit of the Everett entry. This contention is the basis of the plaintiff's action. When we refer to chapter 17 of the Code, relating to "Entries and Grants" it is clear that by the express terms of section 2766, which was in force at the date of both entries (Rev. Code, c. 42), the failure to pay the purchase money within the time prescribed, after entry, works an absolute forfeiture of the entry or, in the language of the statute, "all entries of land not thus paid for shall become null and void, and may be entered by any other person." The lands in controversy are a portion of the "Cherokee Lands" and in respect to the manner of entry, terms of payment, etc., are governed by the provisions of chapter 11 of the Code. The plaintiff contends that the same rule prevails in regard to the failure to pay the purchase money when due, as in case of other public lands. If he is correct in this, and the McMahan entry of December 11, 1879, lapsed by reason of the failure to pay the bonds when due, then upon the authority of the uniform decisions of this court the entry of Everett of March 15, 1880, followed by the payment of the bonds on June 27, 1883, entitles the plaintiff, succeeding to his rights, to have the defendants claiming thereunder declared trustees for his benefit, and decreed to convey to him the legal title. Gilchrist v. Middleton, 107 N. C. 663, 12 S. E. 85, in which the authorities are cited.

The defendants, however, contend that no language can be found in chapter 11 of the Code, declaring a forfeiture of an entry by reason of the failure of the enterer to pay the purchase money within the prescribed period. This contention invites us to an examination of the statutes compiled in and constituting chapter 11 of the Code, entitled "Cherokee Lands." Without entering into a discussion of this interesting subject by referring in detail to the several statutes enacted by our General Assembly beginning with the act of 1783, it is sufficient with some slight exceptions, to the decision of this appeal to note that at the session of 1852 an act was passed, being chapter 119 (Code, § 2464 et seq.), providing for the entry and purchase of such portions of the Cherokee lands as had not been sold pursuant to preceding statutes. After providing for the appointment of an entry taker and a scale of prices regulated by the date of the entry, it was provided: "It shall be lawful for all persons entering lands in said county of Cherokee to file their bonds, with approved security, with the entry taker, payable to the state in four equal annual installments which shall, when paid, be in full of the purchase money of the tract or tracts so entered, and, upon proof of such payment as herein provided, the Secretary of State shall issue a grant or grants according to the entry and survey thereon, etc." Section 2466. By the same statute (Code, § 2468) it is provided that all money received from the sale of vacant lands in the counties of Cherokee, Macon, and Haywood shall be paid to contractors for making the Western Turnpike Road, etc. The remaining sections of this act provide for the construction, etc., of this turnpike. At the same session, by chapter 120, § 2 (Code, § 2476), it is made the duty of the agent appointed for the collection of the bonds to proceed to collect by suit or otherwise, and pay the proceeds over as directed. It will be observed that nothing is to be found in the act of 1852 (chapters 119 and 120), as incorporated in the Code, declaring the effect, upon the rights of the enterer, of a failure to pay the bonds at maturity. We find, however, that in other acts relating to the sale of these lands it is expressly provided that no grant shall issue until the entire amount of the purchase money is paid. A careful examination of the legislation upon the subject of the Cherokee lands discovers on the part of the state a policy in respect to them different from that adopted in regard to other vacant and unappropriated lands. Prior to 1819 no part of the lands described in section 2346 of the Code (Act 1783) was subject to entry. By Act 1819 provision was made for surveying such portion of said land as was acquired by treaty with the Cherokees, and selling parts of it at public auction, etc. Entries were forbidden and declared void. Purchasers were required to pay one-eighth part of the purchase money in cash, and to execute bonds with security for the remainder, payable in installments. No grant was to issue until the amount was paid in full "and in case of failure to pay the whole when due and the money cannot be collected by a judgment on the bond, then the land shall revert to the state and be liable again to be sold for the benefit of the state." Section 2356. In 1836 legislation looking to further sales of the Cherokee lands by commissioners, etc., was enacted. Section 2402 (Act 1836) makes the same provision for collecting the bonds as section 2356. Provision is made in several other acts for bringing suit on the bonds, etc. It was not until 1852 that any portion of these lands were open to entry, and then, as we have seen, the enterer was required to give bond with security, etc.

Reverting to the legislation regarding other public lands, we find an entirely different plan and policy outlined. Subject to certain exceptions, any citizen of the state may enter the public lands as provided by statutes enacted at different dates, and incorporated in chapter 17 of the Code. By the provisions of these statutes no contract is entered into with the state to buy the land entered, nor does the state assume any other obligation than to secure to the enterer a right or option to pay the amount and call for a grant within the period fixed. In Hall v. Hollifield, 76 N. C. 476, it is said: "The public lands of the state are open to entry by any of its citizens, and the first declaration of intention is made on the books of the entry taker in the county where the land lies, and this gives priority, called a 'pre-emption right.' No estate or interest in the land is thereby acquired. No consideration is paid, and none of the requisites for that purpose are performed, but simply the right to be preferred when the money is paid and the other formalities required by the statute complied with." A mere enterer is not entitled to an injunction to restrain another claimant from cutting timber. Newton v. Brown, 134 N. C. 439, 46 S. E. 994. A status is established between the state and an enterer of the Cherokee lands by which he becomes a purchaser. The enterer of other lands acquires a mere option to buy. In the first instance, he enters into a contract with the state, obligating himself, with approved security, to pay for the land, in four equal annual installments, giving his bond therefor. In the other he is a mere proposer assuming no obligation, and acquiring no other right than a preferred bidder—an option to take the land or not, as he sees fit, or as it may be to his interest. This difference shows clearly why the language of section 2768 is not found in any of the statutes relating to the sale of the Cherokee lands. The relation in respect to the purchase of these lands between the state and the enterer or purchaser is that of vendor and vendee, with all of the rights and equities incident thereto. The distinction between the several statutes is recognized by this court in Kimsey v. Munday, 112 N. C. 816, 17 S. E. 583. In that case it is said by MacRae, J., that the enterer should, within a reasonable time, pay the bonds and call for his grant, or he would be presumed to have abandoned his claim. No time was fixed by the court. It was held that 30 years was unreasonable. It is not necessary for us to say what would be a reasonable time within which he should pay his bonds and assert his right. Certainly he would be entitled to as much as 3 years, which had not elapsed in this case. It would seem that by analogy to contracts between individuals the period fixed by the Code, 10 years, would be reasonable. We are therefore of the opinion that by a correct construction of chapter 11 of the Code, considering it as an act, the entry made by McMahan, under which defendants claim, had not elapsed at the date of the grant.

The terms upon which the land would revert to the state are stated in the statute to be "in case of failure to pay the whole when due and the money cannot be obtained by judgment on their bonds." This condition could not have existed, because within a short time after maturity the bonds were paid. Forfeitures are not favored by the law, and, when incurred, can only be enforced in the manner pointed out in the contract to enforce them. The plaintiff insists that, notwithstanding this view, he is entitled to relief, because the demurrer admits that Everett had no notice of the McMahan entry when he made his entry. We understand the allegation to be that he had no actual or express notice, because upon the facts alleged the entry, followed by the survey, was constructive notice. Neither the entry nor grant are in evidence. The plaintiff's counsel, in his well-considered brief, says that the entry is too indefinite to constitute notice. We are not able to say how this is, but, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, we must assume that the entry and survey conformed to the statute in this respect. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show that the entry was invalid for indefiniteness. The defendants pleaded the statute of limitations, which we held in Ritchie v. Fowler, 132 N. C. 788, 44 S. E. 616, barred an action of this kind in 10 years from the registration of the grant. The question has been again discussed before us at this term, and that case, after full consideration, approved. McAden v. Palmer (at this term) 52 S. E. 1034.

The grant under which defendants claim was issued and recorded in 1883. This action was instituted January, 1903. This is a striking illustration of the wisdom of the statute. The welfare of the state demands that within a reasonable time titles to land shall be protected from litigation. For some reason the plaintiff waits nearly 18 years after the public records give him notice that the defendants' grantor has a grant from the state for this land. Viewed from either aspect, we concur with his honor that the plaintiff cannot recover.

The judgment must be affirmed.

(124 Ga. 957)

STEELE v. GEORGIA IRON & COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1906.)

TRIAL—NONSUIT—GROUNDS.

When this case came before this court the first time (49 S. E. 291, 121 Ga. 459), it was held that the original petition was "subject to demurrer," but that the defect was cured by the amendments which had been tendered and allowed. Upon the trial of the cause, however, as the record discloses there was no evidence to support the material and essential allegations in the amendments, it was, therefore, not error for the court to sustain a motion to nonsuit the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 360.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Dade County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Wyatt Steele against the Georgia Iron & Coal Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

B. T. Brock and R. J. & J. M. McCamy, for plaintiff in error. Watkins & Thompson and Du Bignon & Alston, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. This case was before the Supreme Court at the October term, 1904, and it was then held that "the original petition was no doubt subject to demurrer. As drawn, it referred to defects which were apparently of a kind open to the sight of the employé. Construing the petition against the pleader, it also indicated that the periodical dimness of the light was that usual in arc lights, occasioned by the imperfect connection, but naturally caused by the gradual consumption of the carbon. But these matters were cured by the positive allegations of the amendment that the deceased did not know thereof, could not learn thereof, and that they were known to the company." 121 Ga. 459, 49 S. E. 291. When the case came on for trial in the court below, there was an entire lack of evidence to support the essential averments which had been added to the petition by the amendments referred to, and which were necessary to make the petition good as against a general demurrer; and, of course, in the absence of that evidence, the court did not err in sustaining the motion to nonsuit the plaintiff's case.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.
